"Heaven!" she exclaimed in dismay, thinking of the possibilities, "you cannot be in earnest!"

"As earnest in this as you were not in your little game, my lady," Belmont replied.

"Will no one——" her voice died away as she saw only grim faces, "Mr. Kitterage——"

"Yes!" the man exclaimed.

"No, you don't! Be in the game or out of it, Mac! Hero stunts don't go," and Singer whipped out a gun and thrust it into Mac's face.

The whole thing was so melodramatic, so like a dream that Millicent couldn't really believe that they meant to make her marry one of them.

"Now, lady of many aliases, pick your future husband!" and Belmont held out the hat to her.

She grabbed one of the papers, opened it up and in the dusk read in a voice devoid of emotion: "Mac Kitterage."

"I?" Kitterage's eyes lighted up.

"Yes, you as well as any," she replied.

"That's over," Belmont said disgustedly. "Well, we must take our defeat decently. Get into your roadster, Miss Wright, Mac sit up alongside of her, and we'll tow you into town."

Meekly Millicent obeyed, while the men hitched the horses to the car by means of the tow-rope and soon they were on their way to Bison Gulch.

Darkness had fallen. Millicent stole cautious glances at the man at her side. If nothing happened, she must marry him. She wondered what his thoughts were.

In the distance, they could see the night Fourth of July display in Bison Gulch. How differently the day was ending.

"Please don't cart me through the streets; be a little merciful even though I was not," Millicent begged, as they neared town. How like a marquise of the French Revolution going to the guillotine in a tumbril, she felt!

The men heeded her suggestion and when the border of town was reached, they allowed her to alight, and while four of them kept guard of her and Mac (whom they did not quite trust now), two of them took the car to the town's garage, and shortly joined their comrades.

Their progress up the street bore the semblance of a triumphal march, for red, blue and green fire was constantly burning, rockets whizzed into the air and burst with their onomatopoeic "tock!" "nigger chasers" darted under their feet, and and torpedoes smashed all about them.

Millicent felt her face paling; often she glanced at Mac, but he avoided her looks.

Would nothing happen? No, nothing did; the minister's house was reached, they entered, the license was produced, and they were married!

When they came out again, they walked between a cordon of burning colored fire to Stillwagon's Cafe where the wedding supper was laid ready. The men had ordered individually, but with the turn of events, Stillwagon had been bidden to put the whole together, making quite a sumptuous banquet.

Millicent was seated at the head of the table with her husband—how suddenly she had acquired him!—beside her, while the men arranged themselves two on each of the remaining three sides of the table.

Millicent kept her eyes upon her plate, eating but little, drinking nothing, and utterly mute.

"I say, Mrs. Kitterage, won't you give us a toast!" asked S. I. G. Rance.

"Yes," she cried, suddenly stirred to life, "yes!"

She seized a glass of water, and rose from her chair.

"Here it is: To my independence! Gone, snatched from me on our country's Day of Independence!"

That practically broke up the little party, and Mac brought Millicent her light coat and hat. The men accompanied him to Mrs. Green's boarding-house, and then with a cheer, they left.

Mac stood on the porch of the house, his hand resting gently on Millicent's arm.

"Don't be afraid, Miss Wright," he said, with emphasis on the "Miss." "Your heart was not in

Your Child's Eyesight

By Dr. J. W. Miller

Copyright, 1917, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

IT is unfortunate that poor eyesight may not be recognized at once in every home, but the truth is that there are many little symptoms which no one would connect with poor eyesight, and so few symptoms that foretell poor eyesight, that many a child gets so bad that permanent glasses are necessary before the trouble is suspected.

The careful parent will always be on the lookout for these things. Probably a million or more mothers have asked, "Do your eyes hurt you?" and the child, really believing he is truthful, has answered in the negative when in reality his eyes were weak and needed prompt attention.

It isn't the child's fault. Poor eyesight does not give much of a warning when it approaches—that is, a warning such as a child would understand,—and so the mother must keep a careful watch.

Perhaps your child seems unreasonably nervous, or cross, or restless; perhaps he has many little headaches, and you think it is his stomach or his "nerves," or just a bad temper (inherited from the other side of the house, of course). Watch him carefully. See if he does not squint a little when looking off, or hold his books too close to his face, or say that he hates to study because his lessons are so hard they give him a headache. Watch his report cards and see if he is not getting higher marks in the studies in which he does not need to use his eyes as much as in the studies where he must use his eyes constantly.

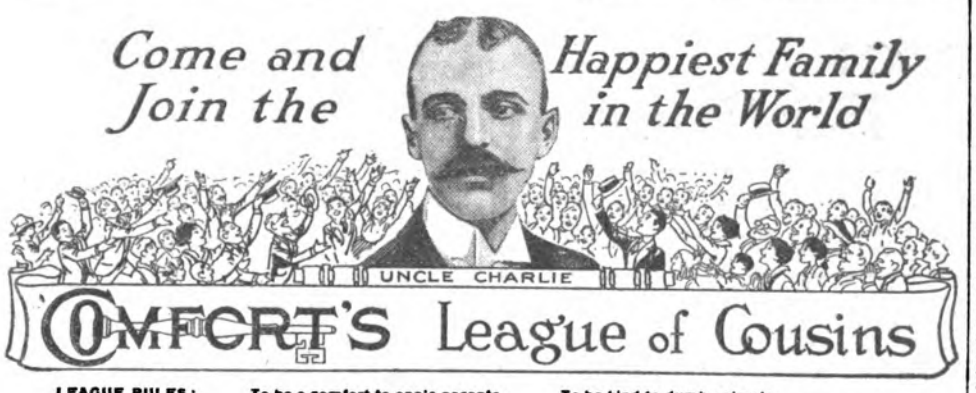
All these things, or anyone of them, may mean that your child has poor eyesight. And when a child has poor eyesight, it is never going to improve, of itself. The best of treatment must be given, and at once. At such a time the little eyes may be so treated that they will regain their strength. If delayed too long the youngster will have to go his way through the world depending upon glasses all his days.

Always go to a good opthalmolgist. Be sure he is a skilled man of experience. The best is the cheapest, the safest and the surest. If you have no specialist in your town, go to your family doctor. Family doctors are great men, not always appreciated. Your family doctor may not be an opthalmologist, but you may be certain that he knows enough about eyes to detect trouble in your child's eyesight upon examination, if trouble is there. And furthermore, your family physician will tell you just what to do about it and where to go. If it is a case where a specialist is needed, he will tell you.

If you are in a big town or city, better go to the eye specialist direct, without delay and have the youngster's eyes examined. If he says to get glasses for the child, have his prescription filled at once and no matter how much the child may weep and wail and protest, see that he wears them. This is the most important precaution a mother can take.

Of course the eyes should be given the greatest of care from birth. Probably half the cases of blindness thirty or less years ago were caused by that terrible disease called "opthalmia neonatorum." There was always danger that the child's eyes at birth might harbor some of the germs of this disease which, in a few days, caused the infant's eyes to grow red, discharge pus, the eyelids to swell and fall over the eyes, the eyeballs become infected and then partial or total incurable blindness followed.

The cure for this is so simple that it is regarded as a crime today for anyone to allow the disease to attack an infant. This cure consists of dropping into each eye of the new born child a two per cent solution of nitrate of silver. This is a powerful antiseptic, it kills the germs instantly, yet does not harm the eyes. Make sure that your physician does this when baby arrives. See to it that it is done to your grandchildren. And after that, the eyes need constant care for several weeks. This care consists of keeping baby's eyes clean. To do this properly use a solution made by dissolving in a cup of boiled and cooled water a teaspoonful of boric acid. See that the acid is the guaranteed chemically pure kind and that the water does not get cold but just lukewarm when applied.



Every time you cleanse the infant's eyes, first sterilize your hands by washing them thoroughly with Castile soap and warm water and then dipping them into a half pint of water in which has been mixed a gill of peroxide of hydrogen. Now dip a bit of absorbent cotton, sterilized (it can be purchased all ready) into the boric acid solution and wash or swab out baby's eyes, wiping from the nose away toward the side, then throw away the cotton. Use a different piece of cotton for each eye and dry with a little piece of fine linen.

When your child goes to school, look at the schoolroom. If it is too dark for your child it is too dark for your neighbor's children. See them and have the room lightened. It can be done. Do not allow your child to bring home his book and do "home work" at night until he is at least fourteen years old, then allow him only half an hour. The modern method of crowding children with studies in so many of our public schools, just to make a good showing for the school "efficiency" has necessitated much home work at night and many and many a ruined eyesight.

Above all, be patient with your youngster when he seems nervous and cross, when he complains that going to school makes him sick, when he squints too much. Do not say right away that he is lazy and trying to get out of school, or that he is unduly cross. Of course few children really love school, but before you condemn the child, make quite sure that it isn't weakened eyesight that makes him squint, makes him hate school because school gives him a pain in the head, makes him irritable, makes him play truant, and various other things.

Better pay an expert a few dollars to tell you that your child's eyesight is excellent, than to wait and pay it anyway, and three times as much more for glasses, and endure the sorrow of seeing your child going about with glasses.

Above all, remember that the first symptom of bad eyesight in most children is irritation.

HOP up onto my lap and snuggle down close, big children and little children, and especially all you children born abroad, or of foreign parents. Do you know this is the last Fourth of July you may ever be allowed to celebrate in these United States? Well it may be, and don't forget that. If it were not for our allies, there would be no Fourth of July for you this year and probably for any year. To be perfectly frank the present generation has done nothing to deserve a Fourth of July and less still to deserve the splendid heritage the men of '76 and '61 passed on to us.

Directly Congress declared war on the Central Powers, every man, woman and child in America should have been ready to do their bit for the land of their birth or adoption. But were they ready? No, they were scandalously and shamefully unready, ignorant of and even indifferent to the issues at stake in this great world war. In addition a lot of hen-brained, provincial, dull-witted Congressmen were striving desperately to defeat a universal military service law, which aimed to place the burden of national defense squarely on the shoulders of all, instead of a willing, patriotic few, insisting the while that we fight the most perfect and most terrible war machine the world has ever seen with a discredited, wickedly unjust system of unfair volunteering. We might as well try to fight Germany with a feather duster as with volunteers.

On "Wake Up America" day in New York there were over sixty thousand paraders. The whole city was a mass of waving flags. The blare of trumpets and the roll of drums could be heard for miles and the people screamed themselves hoarse, so chock full were they with "let-George-do-it" patriotism. That afternoon I got Maria to take a look at the Borough of Brooklyn, which has a population of two million people. In the heart of that vast city she discovered a mob of between five and ten thousand people screaming themselves hoarse over the baseball returns as they were displayed outside the newspaper offices. Six people only were watching the war bulletin boards, and in two hours of careful observation, not one person was seen to enter a nearby recruiting station. These facts I at once forwarded to various members of congress, to aid them in their fight for conscription, a real army and real protection.

The day following the great "Wake Up America" celebration in the whole of New York State only one hundred and seventy odd people enlisted. Instead of waking up they went to sleep. In the city of London, with a population not very much greater than that of New York within forty-eight hours after war was declared and volunteers were called for, 288,000 men responded. In the whole United States, three weeks after war was declared only 33,000 men had entered the army while it has taken us nine weeks to get 100,000 men. On April 25 in the states of Delaware, Maine, North Dakota and Vermont, not a single man enlisted. Vermont in 34 days has enlisted 22 men. It took this once glorious state five days to enlist two men. In spite of the immense number of men who volunteered in England, conscription had to be resorted to, and now thank God we too have adopted it and have saved ourselves not only from disgrace, but from becoming contemptible in the eyes of the world. It was the French conscripts that hurled the German hordes back at the Marne and not only saved Europe, but probably America as well. In '61 the South adopted conscription and the North had to follow suit. Our Civil War was won, not by volunteers, but by drafted men. In our war with Spain, we never succeeded in getting all the volunteers that were called for, and of those we did get over seventeen thousand deserted. We could fool with impotent Spain but not with mighty Prussia. If ever a nation needed universal military training and universal military service under Federal control, the young men of these United States need it. They need the discipline and the physical training, for not one in ten is found physically fit for the fighting line. Our youth, too, need to be taught that there is something more in life than auto rides, cabarets, movies and the pursuit of idle pleasure. They must be taught that sacrifice and service, not pleasure and good times are what make men and nations noble and great. Hundreds of young men are rushing to get married so as to hide behind the skirts of women, but those skirts will not save them. Hundreds more are going to the recruiting offices without any idea of enlisting, so as to get medical examinations free of charge.

The New York American commenting editorially on the war situation says: "Here it is a full month since the President decided upon war—and not one single, decisive step toward real preparedness has been taken. The army that ought to have been on the way to the training camps is still a matter of academic debate. The chances are better than even that the European war will be ended before our citizen army has been collected into drilling camps."

Here is the kind of thing that flares out in bold type from every newspaper and makes one sick at heart: "Indirectly criticizing the war department, Representative Tilson of Connecticut said that only 66,000 service rifles have been made by the United States since the outbreak of the European war." When it was suggested, says the New York Times that information of this sort possibly should not be made public, Mr. Tilson replied: "Everybody knows it except ourselves. Our enemies know it. We need not try and keep it a secret now. We cannot increase our capacity to manufacture that rifle because of the difficulty of procuring gauges. We have waited too long."

The precious weeks that have been wasted may result disastrously for us, and if for us then for our allies, and all mankind. Monarchies and autocracies are ever ready for war, that is their business. Democracies fool with war as a child fools with its toys, and not until national extinction threatens will free governments and free peoples wield the sword efficiently. At present it looks as if Russia must crumble. German agents, sympathizers and propagandists have gained complete control of the socialist movement in the United States. Decent Americans have left the party by the thousands. The same contemptible game is now being worked in Russia, and the Russians are falling as easy victims to the Kaiser's agents as did the simple American comrades who knew nothing of the traitorous scheme that was being put over them. If Russia goes only our aid in men and munitions can save our allies France and Britain, and whether we shall be able to help or not largely depends on whether we can meet the menace of the submarine, and it is very doubtful if it can be met. No nation can stand starvation, and with our allies starved out we shall have to feel the full force of the mailed fist, and if you don't know what that means, look at bleeding Belgium, starved, crushed, annihilated and left with only her eyes to weep with. The wooden ships which were to break the submarine blockade will avail but little, unless we, too, can build unsinkable ships. Italy must have coal and supplies or she will soon be crushed, and if she too goes, democracy dies in the old world, and we who still think the war is a huge joke, will have to fight the battle of humanity alone against an all powerful foe, and at present we are incapable of fighting even a fried chicken. Germany's fleet is double ours and if England is starved out she will have to surrender her mighty fleet, then such an armada as the world has never seen will probably cross the seas. What will happen then? You may guess when I tell you that one of Germany's leading statesmen declared in the Reichstag the other day that they would make President Wilson "bite granite." Dr. Hahn too in the Reichstag shouted "Germany's future is a future of battle and conquest." While the Kaiser in 1908 at Potsdam said: "Germany over everything in the world, the first power on earth both in peace and war—that is the place which I have been ordered by God to conquer for him. This is my irrevocable decision. Whoever opposes my will, him will I break."

If the President has to be put on a granite diet you may know what is in store for the rest of us. Those poor pacifist idiots, many of them in the pay of or the victims of the Kaiser's agents, who have pestered me with their traitorous piffle for the last three years, have declared they would not have the United States turned into an armed camp. The poor boobs did not realize that it was far better for us to have an armed camp of our own than an armed camp full of our enemies. It had to be one or the other. For years I have warned you to cut out fireworks and flag waving on the Fourth and get down to serious thinking. I warned you that the storm was coming, but you would not believe me. But Uncle Charlie was right was he not? Everyone, man, woman or child, must do his or her bit in this great struggle if this nation is to survive. In these days war is not a mere matter of armies against armies, but nations against nations. In this conflict we are going to lose our roll and gain our soul. We are going to quit being a mob of idle, pleasure-loving profit seekers and become a nation. If this war brings the rod of affliction to every home in the land, so much the better for the land and those who inhabit it, for out of the fiery crucible of war will emerge a people united and purified by suffering, sorrow and adversity.

Every citizen of this country must be ready to offer himself a willing sacrifice on the altar of freedom and democracy. No thought of selfish interest must swerve him from this high and lofty purpose for today America holds in her hand the destinies of mankind. The world cannot be half free and half slave. The Almighty has decreed that our strong right arms must make it all free and we must do His bidding.

And now let me finish this article by quoting a few words from President Wilson's address to Congress:

"The world must be made safe for democracy. We have no selfish ends to serve. We desire no conquest, no dominion * * * * * no material compensation for the sacrifices we shall make. Our object is to vindicate the principles of peace and justice in the life of the world as against selfish and autocratic power. We are at the beginning of an age in which it will be insisted that the same standards of conduct and of responsibility for wrong done shall be observed among nations and their Governments that are observd among the individual citizens of civilized states. Only free peoples can hold their purpose and their honor. Right is more precious than peace, and we shall fight for the things which we have always carried nearest our hearts * * * * for democracy, for the right of those who submit to authority, to have a voice in their governments. To such a task we can dedicate our lives and our fortunes, everything that we are and everything that we have, with the pride of those who know that the day has come when America is privileged to spend her blood and her might for the principles that gave her birth and happiness and the peace which she has treasured. God helping her she can do no other."

Let these extracts from our President's speech be read daily in every school and home in the land until the whole nation can quote them at will. These are words of fire and it is such sentiments as these and not firecrackers and foolishness that we need on Independence Day, for it is these sentiments alone that can keep freedom and liberty alive in this stormy, war cursed world.

Don't forget that Uncle Charlie's four wonderful books may still be had. Start in at once to obtain them,—they cost you no money, only a very little time and effort,—and keep at it until you have the entire set. The book of Poems is beautifully bound in ribbed silk stiff covers; the Story Book is bound in two styles, the one in ribbed silk stiff covers like the Poems, the other in paper covers; the Song Book is bound only in heavy paper covers and the Picture Book in handsome stiff covers. Poems or the Story Book in ribbed silk stiff covers, either one for a club of four subscriptions; the Song Book or the Story Book in handsome paper covers or the Picture Book in pretty stiff covers for a club of only two subscriptions. These four books are a library of endless joy and merriment, the best medicine to drive away the blues and the best gifts in the world.

My picture book, too, has started a deluge of inquiries: Is Billy the Goat my daughter, is Maria her Ma? Is there an Aunt Charlie? Is the big boy in the picture book my only baby? I have had a little leaflet specially printed answering all these questions fully, and those who are interested will find the same in every copy of the four Uncle Charlie Books sent out this season.

Now for the letters.

COURTOIS, MO.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

We live on a large farm and raise chickens, turkeys and ducks. We are half a mile from the schoolhouse. I am in the sixth grade at school. I have gray eyes, light hair and fair complexion, four feet nine inches tall, and twelve years old. Uncle Charlie do you think it any harm for a girl of my age to use face powder. Other girls my age use it around here, and they think it no harm. I would like to see this in print and also would like to exchange letters with some of the cousins.

With sincere good wishes, NAOMI BLUNT.

I have expressed my opinion time and again, and my intense disapproval of the disgusting habit so prevalent the country o'er, especially among young girls, of disfiguring their faces with make up. I do not believe in using force if reason and argument can get results, but I can tell you this, Naomi, if you were a daughter of mine and I saw you trying to ruin your complexion and face, by trying to convert it into a flour barrel, you'd get the licking of your life. If I were your teacher and you came to school wearing a mask of chalk you'd be sent hiking home so swiftly it would make your head swim, I am glad that mother scolds, for there are a lot of mothers who would not even do that. Better still, mother should command, and if you don't obey you should be drastically disciplined and punished. Powder at twelve means paint at thirteen and a vain, spoiled, silly, frivolous, useless girl at fifteen and a ruined life and broken-hearted parents at sixteen. Life largely depends on how you start it, and you, Naomi, are starting it all wrong, and a bad start generally means a bad ending, and life is too precious, valuable and useful a thing to be ruined. If you plug the pores of your skin with chalk, in another five years your face will look more like a patch of alligator hide than that of a human being. Because those other girls make idiots of themselves and have fool mothers who have not sense enough to correct or discipline them, is no reason why you should make an idiot of yourself. The face that needs powder at twelve must be a mighty homely face, and the owner of that face must be desperate and foolish indeed to think that plastering it with chalk is going to improve it. It is about time you American mothers got busy with the slipper, the hair brush and the fence rail. These are the things that should be applied to your daughters, not face powders.

EAST BERLIN, Locust St., PA.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I am a high school student and am in my sophomore year. I study the following branches: Spelling, rhetoric, algebra, Latin, zoology and that detested history. They do not teach penmanship, which is an excuse for my poor writing. Our large organized class consists of four.

I am five feet one inch tall on two-inch heels, have dark hair, eyes and complexion. I am on my way to sweet sixteen and have never had a beau.

I wonder whether every person is such a day-dreamer as I am. I don't have such horrible dreams in the daytime as I have at night.

Our town has about six hundred inhabitants, three churches, two blacksmith shops and one school building. If you keep Billy tied so he does not get this I may write again. I would like to hear from someone living in the Sunny South. I am greatly in love with that place, although I don't know very much about it.

I will close as it is bedtime.

Your niece, PHOEBE I. JOSEPH.

Phoebe, like yourself, I am a tremendous dreamer. Some foolish people regard dreamers with contempt. They seem to forget that without the dreamer there would be little worth while in the world. The greatest dreamer of all was Christ. He dreamed of the brotherhood of men, and His dreaming cost Him His life. All He dreamed however, will some day be realized. Emerson says: "What the tender and poetic youth dreams today and conjures up in articulate speech, is tomorrow the vociferated result of public opinion, and the day after is the character of nations." What we dream about today is the thing that will happen tomorrow, what we do today is the thing we dreamed about yesterday. Everything worth while in the world today is the result of dreams and imagination. But remember, dreams are no good unless you translate them into action. Many men dreamed of a great Western continent, but it took Columbus to demonstrate that the continent really existed. Many men dreamed that the sun revolved around the earth instead of the earth revolving round the sun, but it took Galileo to prove it. The world is divided into three classes, those who are behind the times, those who are ahead of the times, and those who are neither ahead nor behind the times. The people who are behind the times are people who never dream and have no imagination. They are the nuts and the nuts who make life hard for everyone. The man ahead of the times is the pioneer of civilization. He is immensely useful, but he can be very dangerous. The architect, the sculptor, the painter can realize their dreams, for they deal largely with material things. When, however, our dreams deal with human beings, we are up against an entirely different proposition. We humans are all alike and yet all different, and if we are not careful, conservative and level headed, our dreams are liable to become nightmares and drench the world in blood. If you want to watch the danger of a certain type of dreaming, keep your eye on Russia, where the socialists and a bunch of radical extremists are in control. All socialists are dreamers—most are sane dreamers, but every reform movement is cursed with its cranks and crack brained, dangerous visionaries, and usually the extreme and dangerous elements succeed in gaining control and spoil everything. The sane dreamer knows what can be realized now and what can't be realized for another fifty years. He deals with facts rather than theories. The insane dreamer, nihilist and anarchist wants to build right on the jump an ideal world out of impossible material and wants to do it under the very guns of the German war machine, the worst military despotism the world has ever seen, and is willing to bring the whole of civilization down about his ears and shipwreck all the hopes of humanity if he can but for five minutes see his dreams in action and realize something for which humanity will not be ready for a generation. The world needs practical dreamers, but the impractical, non-resisting, pacifist dreamer of the Cousin C. type, is a menace and should be placed in padded cells, while practical men deal with things as they are, building one step at a time until we reach the land of our dreams, the world as it ought to be, and as we want it to be.

JANNEY, FLA.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

My mother owns a farm of three hundred and sixty acres. We can raise almost anything down here. Uncle, if you will come I will give you all the chickens hatched and not hatched and milk you want. I am in the eighth grade and am the oldest girl at home as my oldest sister is married. I have four brothers and four sisters. One sister is dead. I live five miles from the Suwanee River, in Levy county. I can sew iron cook wash, scour and climb trees, make beds cut wood and clerk in our store for mamma. I was climbing in a persimmon tree after Simmons and fell out and broke my arm one time and I have never liked Simmons since.

We have peach trees, pear trees, pecan trees and bananas. We raise cane and grind it with a gasoline engine.

I am five feet two inches short, weigh ninety-four pounds. Have brown hair, gray eyes and suntanned complexion, so you see I am not very pretty.

Your niece, ORPHA JANNEY.

Thank you for your offer of chickens, eggs and milk, Orpha. It would not, however, be fair of me to impose on your generosity. Many weeks ago we placed ourselves on a war diet. We have meatless days and we have substituted rice for potatoes. I have cut my egg allowance in halves—two eggs one day and one egg the next. Then too, we have corn bread every other day, so that there may be more wheat for those who are shedding their blood and fighting our battles in order that liberty and freedom may be kept alive on this earth. This is the only practical assistance I can give, and this much assistance to the cause of humanity all can give. God knows it is little compared to what some have had to give. Millions have had to give all they had in the world, and their lives into the bargain. Less so far has been demanded of us, but no one knows what the future holds. Orphar, we are all sorry that we cannot see you when you are sewing ironing cooking washing and climbing trees, and we are just tickled to bits to know that you can make beds cut wood and clerk in the store for Mamma. In these days when help is scarce and expensive it must be a real joy to see feather beds serving out the molasses in Mamma's store. Take my advice and leave Mr. Simmons alone. It is not dignified, correct nor proper for young ladies to be chasing gentlemen with arboreal inclinations, from the branches of the persimmon tree. If there is any chasing to be done let Mr. Simmons do it.

CHINA SPRINGS, TEXAS.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I am twenty-four years old, about five feet and three inches tall, weigh one hundred and twelve pounds, have black hair and brown eyes. I live on a farm with my father and mother, three sisters and two brothers. I like farm life fine. I like to work in the field. We raise cotton, corn and oats. Uncle, we have a nice garden. We have onions, mustard, radishes and English peas up, and growing fine. We also have Irish potatoes planted, so if you will come out here this summer we will feed you on vegetables. Uncle, I know you love Irish potatoes so I will try to have some when you come.

I feel sorry for the poor fellows who are going to have to leave home and friends and go to the war, and also for the poor people left at home.

From your new niece and cousin,

LILLIE ANDERSON, League No. 42,563.

P. S. I received my card and button and think they are pretty.

Lily, I am very much interested in the stuff you are raising in your garden, but if you take my advice you will never try and raise English peas and Irish potatoes within a thousand miles of each other. Once on a time I tried to raise these two vegetables side by side and with the most disastrous results. The Irish potatoes were always sassing the English peas and demanding Home Rule. The potatoes claimed the peas were a stuck-up bunch, and the English peas retorted by saying that the Irish potatoes were a low-down lot. The Irish potatoes always had their eyes on the English peas. One day there was a dreadful racket in the garden, and when I rushed out to find what had happened, I discovered that the potatoes were shelling the peas, and if Bryan hadn't come along in a Ford and delivered a lecture on peace, that would have been the finish of my garden. Racialism and nationalism are hard things to handle, but when this war is over a lot of the things that caused racial animosities will be straightened out, and in another century and that is a short time in racial evolution, everything will be working smoothly and we shall all be one big, happy family.

SAN JOSE, CAL.

UNCLE CHARLIE:

I hardly think you should live in the U. S. the way you slam it! I read in the March COMFORT the many things you said against the United States and I have read the same in other copies that you wrote. I should think you would be ashamed of yourself dishonoring your own land! If you do dishonor it, do not make your evil thoughts known. Please read the book, "A Man Without a Country."

Yours truly,

One who has more respect for their native land than you.

The writer of this note respects his native land so much that he has not even the courage when acting as its champion to sign his name. He is as courageous as the little boy who rings a bell then runs away. I have never said a word against the United States. On the contrary I have always said it was the grandest and most glorious country on earth. I have however, found fault with the American people for their self-centered provincialism, their indifference to their own interests, their lack of vision, foresight and forethought, their tolerance of lawlessness, graft and vice, and their political blindness, which burdens the legislatures of this great country with self-seeking, axe-grinding, pork-hunting nonentities instead of patriots and statesmen. The only worth-while patriot is not the man who waves flags, beats drums and runs away from the recruiting sergeant, and dreads criticism, but the man who dares to look his countrymen in the eye and tell them their faults and their shortcomings. This I have dared to do and shall continue to do. The only way to get people to right a wrong is to get them dissatisfied. I have fought for parcel post, income tax, popular election of senators, woman suffrage, abolition of child labor and the liquor traffic, also the white slave traffic and everything else that has made for progress and human betterment, and have been instrumental in helping to bring about many reforms. Above all else I have fought for preparedness and I have waged war

The Truth About Corns

You have read much fiction about corns. Were that not so there would be no corns. All people would use Blue-jay.

Here is the truth, as stated by a chemist who spent 25 years on this corn problem. And as proved already on almost a billion corns.

"This invention—Blue-jay—makes corn troubles needless. It stops the pain instantly, and stops it forever. In 48 hours the whole corn disappears, save in rare cases which take a little longer."

That is the truth, and millions of people know it. Every month it is being proved on nearly two million corns.

So long as you doubt it you'll suffer. The day that you prove it will see your last corn-ache.

It costs so little—is so easy and quick and painless—that you owe yourself this proof. Try Blue-jay tonight.

and bottles which were wont to adorn her toilet table.

"She is very pretty," he assented. "And, then, she has a way of dressing," he added, thoughtfully.

"She lent me a pearl necklace and a big white fan to go to the dance. Fancy!"

"She must like you. As a rule, she affects boys rather than girls."

"Yes, she has been more than kind to Maurice," she answered, with a simplicity rather crushing, and so near to an astute snub as to please Mr. Fairfax vastly.

"She rides beautifully," he said, meekly. "Did you ever see her on a horse? When you go to stay with her she will teach you in no time."

"I don't know," doubtfully. "I think I am too old to learn."

"You are nearly twenty-five years younger than she is."

"But I shall never be half as clever," she replied, with calm directness.

Mr. Fairfax reflected on Lady Satterlee's career for a silent minute.

"Perhaps not," he assented, with honesty. "But about learning to ride. If you would let me bring over a horse, I could teach you while you are here."

"I have no habit." She drew her chair out of the way as the maid came in to set the tea-table. "I must wait, you see, till Mr. Mayne departs from Lispenard House. Then," triumphantly, "we are going to do everything we have never been allowed to do."

"I am going to stay with her by and by," said Joan, who had entered the room in the wake of the maid. "We are going to be all alone, and I am going to pour out tea at breakfast."

"Agatha will be married before Mr. Mayne leaves," Nerine observed, rather forlornly. "I wish people did not get married."

"I have wished so, often."

"Tea is ready," Joan announced cheerfully. "I'll call May. She is being washed, because she would help Mrs. Palmer makes cakes for tea."

But May appeared as she spoke, and the four sat down to tea. Mr. Fairfax felt secretly amused as he took the seat pointed out by Joan, which put him at the foot of the table, opposite Miss Lispenard and the tea tray. How lovely she was in her plain black frock with its little muslin collar and cuffs; and what a quaintly domestic flavor belonged to the whole scene.

"Nerine says she is always going to have a sit-down tea when she has a house. You can eat so much more," May observed kindly over her bread and butter.

"Miss Lispenard is quite right. A 'sit-down tea' has double the opportunities," he replied, gravely.

"You can eat more if there is more to eat," Joan remarked, with sound common sense. "There is plenty here, but at home we've bread and milk, and I always try to get mother to let me come to the drawng-room at tea time."

"So do I," responded May. "She never lets us stay, you know, but she always gives us a piece of cake, and then tells us to run away."

Fairfax laughed outright as he helped the jam with a prodigal hand.

"Mr. Fairfax will think you are remarkably greedy," Nerine said, with severity, "and you know you are not at all."

"No, we're not," said Joan, "but we'd like to be. Don't you remember, Nerine, the first morning you came to Belton? I was waiting behind the door for marmalade when you saw me."

"What is that she calls you, Miss Lispenard?" Fairfax looked up from Mrs. Palmer's excellent hot cakes. "Nerine, is that it?"

"Yes. It is an odd name, is it not?"

"It is quite uncommon; I never knew any one else called Nerine."

It certainly suited the girl admirably. Somehow it would have seemed out of place worn by any other girl than this, with her quick changes from child-like mirth to a cold, sweet dignity all her own.

The Kingdom of Our Birthright

In running this series we are not advocating belief in astrology or faith in the pretended talismanic charm of birth-stones, although these beliefs have persisted from remote antiquity and have not a few devotees even in this present age of reason. Yet as myths and superstitions that have dominated through the ages they possess historic interest and educational value. Miss August will appear with a pleasing message next month.—EDITOR.

MISS JULY.

THE sign Leo (The Lion) governs the heart, the love and the emotions, being very marked from July 22nd to August 22nd. The heart might be likened unto a spring, from which all the fountains of life flow; it is popularly regarded as the seat of the affections and sensibilities, and the source from which characters are shaped. Persons born under these influences may have a variety of inclinations and tendencies which, if unrestrained, will result in over-adaptability. They are aspiring and energetic, and their decisions will be based on propriety, justice and order. They are likely to be a little blinded by their love and admiration of things beautiful, and in their dealings with people should look into them as well as at them. Their successes are in the intellectual spheres of life, being free thinkers, finely sensitive and emotional.

Women influenced by this sign make the finest of mothers. They possess self-control, and have a superior power over those whom they love. They are endowed with a faculty for creation, making them superior in all the departments of housekeeping and home-making.

When children, they are prone to imitate the life and habits of others; also to be influenced by their mental and physical condition. Because they live in an ideal world, and speak and act from their first impulse, they will often be misunderstood, and learn the hard facts of life from sad experience. Parents should carefully observe these children, lest the making of splendid men and women be lost. They require a broad education, and will profit by having the traits that in others make or mar pointed out. Nature intended them to be frank, trusting and loving, but if their fine sensibilities are constantly being injured, they will become doubtful whether reality or sincerity exists, and in self-defense they themselves may become tricky. Parents must not transgress from the rules and regulations laid down for such children, for they are naturally very observant, and will detect any changeableness and be influenced by it. They are very inventive and will succeed in a variety of spheres.

Ruby, the July Birth-stone

It appears most fitting that this precious gem, the Ruby, should symbolize Charity, which is by far the most precious trait in humanity. Charity in its truest sense is not typified by almsgiving; it is the disposition to think favorably of others; to do them good. It is the language that the deaf can hear, and the dumb understand. The fair interpretation, and the gentlest sentence, even if lost on the one bestowed, will work grace and beauty upon the heart of the giver.

Magic suggests mystery, yet, mystery is not magic but something of which we know that it is, though we do not know how it is. We are neither all-seeing nor all-knowing, and the power of influence, personal or otherwise, plays an important part in our lives. And thus it is, that a simple birth-stone ring, once its mission is understood, will have a guiding influence upon the wearer.

Miss July, dressed as the Goddess of Liberty, is in harmony with right guidance, for, "True liberty consists only in the power of doing what we ought to will, and in not being constrained to do what we ought not to will."

How to Give a Liberty Party

Miss July thinks that some of the COMFORT'S readers might like to give a Liberty party, and if so, offers these suggestions:

Make four sleevebands, marked Cuba, Porto Rico, Hawaii, Philippines. Have four ushers, each wearing one of these bands on the left arm. As the guests arrive, the ushers will escort them to their hostess, The Goddess of Liberty, who will receive, and will present them with a card, pencil attached, which on one side has written one question connected with Washington, D. C., socially, officially or politically. These questions may be very interesting, amusing and original. The other side of the card is written as follows:

Sscene—Cradle of Liberty (Faneuil Hall, Boston.-

Peace—Peace Heroic and sacrificial is the New Vision which only young men can believe in.—Faunce.

Below is written a list of the guests' names.

Miss July, the hostess, is dressed in national colors. A white skirt, a flag draped about the shoulders, and the Liberty cap made of red crepe paper.

The guests will hasten to meet, and inform themselves of each other's question, and the one guessing correctly the largest number of answers will receive an American flag as a reward. Have each question numbered, and the number and answer must be written on cards, which are in due time collected and passed upon.

Nature of some questions and answers:

What statement made by President Wilson has been most discussed? Ans. "Too proud to fight."

What does William J. Bryan most love? Ans. A silver dollar.

What White House visitor said, "You think you know. Guess again." Ans. Carrie Nation.

What is Roosevelt's favorite head-dress? Ans. Rough Rider's Hat.

What might be called a national fruit? Ans. Cherries.

What president's initials stand for a phrase which made him famous? Ans. U. S. (Unconditional Surrender) Grant.

"I always heave a thankful sigh when I find out that a lady's Christian name is not Gladys," he observed as Joan handed his cup to be refilled.

"I would rather be a Sarah than a Gladys or a Hilda," said Nerine, laughing. "Everybody is Gladys and Hilda nowadays. But when the fashion changes we shall be Susan and Deborah and Jane."

She stretched out her hand for one of Joan's sweets as she spoke, and Fairfax watched her covertly as she bit it with her small white teeth. What a lovely mouth she had, and how sweet and good a smile! He wondered if she had really minded about Satterlee, and what was exactly the story of that dance, for certainly there was one. Could that young duffer, Bobby, have made a mistake and proposed to this one first, and then got out of it? It sounded impossible, but few things—from the height of his thirty-three years—were impossible to subalterns of twenty-odd!

Nerine rose while he was pondering on the question, and after a few minutes he took his leave. But the reflection lasted him throughout his solitary walk home through the wet fields. He had eaten too much, and destroyed his appetite for his dinner. Perhaps that was why his big house felt so lonely that evening, and his box of new books proved so dull.

He thought it might be a good plan to marry and rid himself of these lonely evenings for the rest of his life. But a less serious way would be to leave England, and set out on a new course of globle-trotting. Mr. Fairfax was so bored and dull that he actually brought forth an atlas and began to search for a corner of the world he had not yet visited. He found nothing quite absolutely new but Patagonia, and pushed away his maps in disgust. Yet perhaps even Patagonia would be less dangerous than a quiet country life and propinquity to Miss Nerine Lispenard, who could look white and dazed at a ball on account of a nice boy like Bobby. Hang Bobby! And Mr. Fairfax smoked viciously till he went to bed.

CHAPTER XXI.

ON THE EDGE OF A MYSTERY.

Early on Tuesday afternoon, according to promise, Miss Lispenard knocked at the window of the lonely cottage.

There was dead silence. Presently, from somewhere at the back of the house, the fox terrier flew out barking; he sniffed at the girl, and then let her pat him.

"Where's your mistress, Snap? Gone out?" The dog whined. Nerine knocked at the window again, and this time a voice replied.

"Who's there?"

"It is I. You told me to come today."

There was a movement inside, then a groan.

"Come in by the kitchen. This door's locked, and I can't get up to open it."

"Where you came out, Snap, can I get in?" the girl wondered.

She walked round the house, the dog running before her. The back door stood ajar, and she went into a desolate kitchen, with no furniture but one chair and a cracked and fireless stove. With a return of her old terrors of the place, she made her way into the passage, and stood aghast. The dirt and disorder, worst of all the deadly closeness and chill of the atmosphere, nearly made her sick. The floor of the passage was strewed with bones, potatoes, boxes, empty bottles, and the smell was overpowering. Handkerchief to nose, the girl hurried on to the sitting-room.

Stretched on a low chair, with her feet on another, her face drawn with pain, sat the mistress of the house. Her dress was more frowsy than ever, but the room had been cleared up, as regarded the bottles, by throwing them out into the passage.

"You've really come. I didn't think you would. Oh, I'm so glad to see you."

"What is the matter—are you ill?"

The woman nodded.

AUGUST COMFORT

the Mid-Summer Short-Story Number, will entertain our readers with six delectable stories, all complete, besides a pretty episode of the Dapperling story for the children, large installments of the two serial stories and interesting and instructive special articles.

Take no chance of missing it. If the number over your name on the wrapper on this paper is 346 or any less number, it means that your subscription must be renewed at once if you want August COMFORT.

August Stories

"Van Allen's Circus Nightmare"

Under the lingering obsession of a Mid-Summer Night fantasy a young gentleman commits a social solecism that compels him to practise an embarrassing deception on the fair idol of his heart resulting in unexpected consequences.

"The Message"

A war story describing the soldier in the rage of battle, and how his grieving wife at home does her part bravely.

"The Sign of the Corner"

Amusing story of how a fatalist in love is led on by signs, in which he has faith, to meet his fate.

"Thorndike's Quest"

Story of the ludicrous and almost tragic outcome of the theological student's mistake in acting the too ardent lover.

"The Sheltering Hand"

The perilous adventure of an inexperienced society girl possessed with the notion of doing rescue work in the city slums.

"The Pawn"

The tragedy of a trusting girl's misplaced confidence in a pretended lover teaches a lesson and holds out a warning to girls.

"The Dapperling Episode"

Will delight the children, telling the naughty tricks by Simmie-Sammie and how the Dapperlings gave Pittysing a wonderful surprise.

"Home-Made Iceless Refrigerator"

A refrigerator that will keep food in hot weather without ice is a practical and almost indispensable utility where ice can not be obtained. How to make and operate one on the farm will be described and pictured in August COMFORT.

The Pretty Girls' Club

Conducted by Katherine Booth

The Careful Toilet

HAVE you ever noticed how often, in a gathering of people, the girl who gives the impression of being most attractive is really not pretty when you examine her features attentively, but only seems pretty or charming because of the care given to her toilet?

Louise, with her big blue eyes and real golden hair, may have twice her beauty, but Louise always looks a little sloppy about the waistline and her skirt never hangs evenly. Agnes is neat as to dress but pins her hair up unbecomingly, so that her really beautiful profile is entirely spoiled. Margaret, with the short stringy locks that will fall into her eyes, always looks untidy. While Frances, with very plain features, has such an atmosphere of freshness and daintiness, her hair is so painstakingly kept from straggling into her neck or about her ears, her waistline is so trim, her hose so smooth, her shoes so trig and smart-looking, that people go away from meeting her, under the impression that she is a pretty girl—when she isn't, at all.

You all know somebody just like Frances! Take the lesson to heart, and make up your mind always to make a careful toilet.

Be generous with invisible hairpins, and take time to see that every lock is where it should be and that it will stay there.

Never omit your morning body bath, and if you are going out in the evening take at least a quick all-over sponge before dressing, if you cannot conveniently arrange for a body bath.

Keep your nails well-shaped and above suspicion as to cleanliness, your eyebrows smooth and glossy.

Never wear a shoe with run-over heels—your cobbler will straighten them over night for twenty-five cents. Have the shoes trim and smooth-fitting about the ankle, and, if laced, see that they are laced evenly and snugly all the way from toe to top. Wear at least three side garters for each stocking, one on the inside of leg, one on the outside, and one in the back. These garters should be fastened to your corset, and be strapped short enough to keep your stocking absolutely free from wrinkles.

Have your waistline trim, and examine yourself in the mirror always before going out, to be sure skirt hangs evenly; that no bunch of corset strings or other under fastening makes a lump on the back of skirt or waist; and that your shirt-waist or your waist does not pull out from belt with more fullness at one point than another.

Of course I do not need to emphasize the value of beautifully kept teeth—your regard for your health and your comfort would make you brush them five times a day, in any case—yet perhaps it won't do any harm to remind you that perfectly white even teeth add a hundred per cent to the charm of a smile and the beauty of a face.

Don't let your eyelids get red or irritated. Washing out daily with boric acid solution and an occasional annointing of the lids with melted vaseline or olive oil will take care of this.

With your suit jacket wear broad white collar and cuffs—stiff—and be sure they are absolutely fresh and spotless. Carefully dressed hair, immaculate collar and cuffs, a hat pinned on carefully at the most becoming angle, shoes freshly polished, trim hose and waistline, will give you an air of smartness that will eclipse the prettiest peaches-and-cream complexion or the most perfect profile.

If you don't think you are especially pretty try the plan of the careful toilet, and see if it doesn't make up for any shortcomings you thought you possessed.

Answers to Questions

Smiles, M. E. K.—For your height, five feet six inches, you should weigh about one hundred and forty-three. Your bust and hips should measure thirty-nine inches, so you are a little over measurement. If you do not eat breakfast or supper, I am afraid you are apt to eat more than you should for dinner—that is the usual result. I should advise, instead, eating a breakfast of fruit and toast only. For dinner, lean meat, two vegetables (but not potato or rice, as these are fattening,), and a light dessert, preferably fruit, but certainly not pie or cake or preserves. For supper, you could eat fruit and toast again. Or you could have a baked apple and a bran muffin, or a dish of stewed prunes and some graham crackers. Eat something, but a very light meal. And be careful, at noon, to eat only a moderate amount. You shouldn't eat much meat, and it should be broiled or roasted. I don't think your stomach will trouble you at night, under this plan, and I also think you will lose some superfluous pounds. Don't take cream on your foods, or drink milk or eat much butter. And cut out sugar. In a short time you will be down to your normal weight, if you will do this. And be careful to keep the bowels open daily. In last month's COMFORT I gave an exercise for constipation, liver and fat abdomen. Practise it regularly every day.

Millie.—I am sorry that I can't give you much encouragement about your face, but it is possible that gently massaging the thin cheek will develop it. Do not massage the other. Use a little cold cream on your fingers and rub with a circular motion in small circle all over your cheek. Then at the end slap the face lightly with the flat of the hand many times, and finally rub the flesh of the cheek up from the chin toward the temple. No, indeed, you shouldn't have gray hair. Your body isn't in good condition, I should say. Exercise a great deal, bathe every night in warm water, and every morning in cool water (you can make this latter a sponge bath, if you like), be careful of your diet and the condition of your bowels. Massage your scalp every night, by slipping the flat of the fingers under the loosened hair right close to the scalp, and pressing the fingers firmly. Now, move the skin back and forth on the skull without lifting the fingers or letting them rub back and forth. Go all over the head this way, and keep it up for five or ten minutes. Do it every night. The skin of your head should be very loose, as if it is tight the blood cannot circulate properly. Continued massage will loosen up even a very tight scalp, and the hair will profit by it.

C. G. B.—Your age may have something to do with your pimples, and a little later they may entirely disappear. But I think, besides, that there are other things at fault. You must exercise daily, and bathe at least once a day all over, and drink lots of water, and see to the bowels. Some of these things you haven't been careful about, or you would not have been having pimples and boils. Chew your food until it is liquid before you swallow it, don't eat between meals, eat very few sweets, and read all I say about general diet. Yes, the hot water before breakfast—at least half an hour before—is a good plan. Drink at least a glass. Be sure to rinse your face very thoroughly after washing, and continue using soap only once a day—at night. Better, however, make yourself some small bags of rolled oats, and use those to wash with during the day, as they will remove dirt, and leave the skin soft.

H. F.—Yes, you weigh too much. You say you began to exercise, but did you no good and you stopped it. Exercise is necessary for you, but you must also cut down the amount of food you eat. See my answer to "Smiles." This is about what you should eat. Don't take any potatoes, rice, macaroni, hardly any butter, milk or cream, no gravies or fat meat, and no sweets. That seems to take away a lot of things, but you have ever so much left. You can eat: rare broiled or roasted beef, lamb, mutton, or you can eat fresh fish, chicken, turkey. Don't eat very much at a time—just a moderate-sized piece. Then there are string beans, asparagus, spinach or other green, rhubarb, cabbage, turnips, squash, corn, tomatoes, etc.; and there are apples, all berries, peaches, pears, apricots, figs, prunes, grapefruit, oranges, lemons, pineapple—in fact practically all fruits, except bananas. So you can't starve! And you must be sure to eat only a moderate amount of any. And no wheat bread for a time, and certainly no hot breads nor any cake or pie. And chew your food! Keep up the exercises—I gave some in last issue of COMFORT.

Kate.—Yes, you are forty-four pounds over weight! Read what I have said to "H. F." and "Smiles," and go thou and do likewise.

A COMFORT Reader.—For superfluous hair, use household ammonia and peroxide of hydrogen, dampening the hair one day with one, the next day with the other. It takes patience and perseverance, and is not a quick method, but it will do the deed in time.

Chick.—Anoint the edges of your lids with warm olive or sesame oil each night. You can apply with a new mucilage brush, or a small camel's-hair paint brush. This will help your lashes to grow. In addition, keep the body in good condition, and wash the eyes out daily with a four per cent solution of boric acid to keep them clean and healthy.

Miss C. U.—The reason your face is irritated by the use of soap is either that you rub it directly on the face, use too strong a soap, or do not rinse the skin sufficiently. Only use soap at night, and then only in water, not rubbed directly on face; rinse very carefully indeed, and be sure that the soap is a very mild one—I do not need to say that the strong kitchen soaps should never be used for either the face or the hands. Powders irritate your skin because it is too dry, I judge. Always rub in a little cold cream and wipe off with a pad of absorbent cotton or a bit of clean flannel before applying powder. Probably the dryness of your skin is also the reason why it reddens in the wind or when exposed to the cold. Better rub in a little cold cream each night, and always before going outdoors. Be sure to rub off all surplus. See, also, that your circulation is in good order and that neither shoes, collars, sleeves, waistline or corsets are tight. Exercise will help your circulation.

Discouraged.—Yes, indeed, wash your hair oftener than once in two months. Once in two weeks is better! And as to the oily face, which you say gets oily about an hour after washing, I am inclined, first, to think you do not rinse it thoroughly. Only use warm, soapy water at night, and rinse half a dozen times, first in warm, then cool, and finally cold, but never dash cold water on the face just after using warm water and soap. Cold water won't rinse off soap, of course. Use the rolled oats bags I have so often recommended for washing the face in the daytime, about three inches by three inches, half full of the oats, the bags made of cheese-cloth. Use instead of a wash-cloth, and take a fresh one each time. Dip very lightly in the water and apply at once to the face, rubbing the skin. Pat the face dry after this, and a fine white powder will be left which should be smoothed over the surface of the skin. It keeps the skin soft and white. Keep the bowels in good order and drink quantities of water if you want a good complexion, and to get rid of this oiliness.

Blue Eyes.—Better than what you are using for enlarged pores is one tablespoonful of Epsom Salts in one quart of warm water. Bathe face and neck with this, wipe off with smooth towel and repeat several times. Do it morning and night, rubbing gently. After using this solution, wash the face and neck with cold water. If your skin is very dry, you should not use any astringent on it—and any lotion to reduce enlarged pores is, of course, an astringent. For a dry skin, frictioning with the hand, a hot bath at night, followed by a brisk rubbing, then by a warm rinsing, then a cool, and finally a cold sponge or better still, a shower, will close the pores, if persisted in.

Eldora.—The probability is that your position makes you eat more than you realize, and that is why you have gained so rapidly. See my answer to "Smiles" and "C. G. B." Anybody can reduce by cutting down the amount of food. I had a striking example of this myself when, for some physical reasons, I was put on a pint of barley gruel a day and no other food. I lost ten pounds in four days! If you don't give your body material of which to make fat, it won't get fat. So look over your diet list and begin cutting out the things which should not be there; then reduce the amount of food you are eating, and you will begin to lose. You will probably need more of a breakfast than "Smiles," because of your work, but you can eat two soft-boiled eggs in addition and they will give you strength and nourishment without any fat.

Margery.—Indeed I am glad that you feel I am a friend. That is the way I like my girls to feel. About that thin hair of yours, brush it every night, one hundred strokes—soft ones,—and shampoo it once in two weeks, rinsing carefully. Massage the scalp every night, holding the fingers firmly against the scalp and moving it back and forth on the skull, first in one place and then another, without lifting the fingers or rubbing them on the hair. Exercise every day outdoors in some sort of pleasant way—a brisk long walk if you do not play tennis, or swim or row. Bathe every night in warm water, and sponge your body off every morning with cold water—except when you are not feeling well, when you should not use cool or cold water, nor get yourself chilled. Be careful about what you eat, and be sure to drink plenty of water. As to the fat legs, probably they won't be too fat, later, when you fill out a little in the rest of your body, but, in the meantime, roller skating, tennis, or swimming are all good ways to reduce fat legs. A good deal of rapid walking will do the same thing—wear off the fat but harden the muscles.

A South Carolinian.—Touch the mole with the acid every night until it turns black. It will fall off, later. The red spot won't stay, but a little white spot may. Don't use the acid when the mole feels sore or irritated.

Miss E. W.—The dark rings under the eyes, and the skin bagging there, are indications of trouble elsewhere in your body. Quite likely your kidneys are not acting properly. Begin, at once, to drink quantities of water—at least eight glasses a day. Be careful of your food, and do not eat rich dishes, such as gravies, fat meats, cakes, pies, preserves, candy. Exercise a great deal, and keep the skin in good condition by daily frictioning. Dark lines under your eyes might, also, come from some female irregularity. Of course your doctor is your best adviser, but be careful not to get your ankles chilled, and see that the bowels are kept perfectly free. This always helps female difficulties. Are your eyes themselves in good condition, so there is no eyestrain?

Martie.—Your hair is a very pretty dark brown, and nice and soft. Keep on taking good care of it. As to your size, don't get discouraged, but keep up the exercises. They are excellent for you in every way. The probability is that while you think you have been "starving yourself," you have been having much more food than your body needs. Our appetites are not the best guides always. You are a busy girl, I know, and no doubt have a very healthy appetite by the time the meal hour comes around, but the weight of your body shows that you do not need all of the food you are eating and that is why it is being stored up as fat. Eat less, and cut out the special fat-building foods. Some foods do not make fats—most fruits and green vegetables do not. Read my answer to "Smiles" and "C. G. B." Good luck to you. You could use peroxide and ammonia for hairs between the brows, but there is always the danger of getting some in the eyes and so I do not recommend it. The tweezers are all right for this part of the face, for while the hairs come back, they can be pulled out again, and are easier to treat in this way than elsewhere on the face.

A COMFORT Reader.—My dear, I couldn't possibly get your answer into the issue of COMFORT you asked for. Why, that was all ready for mailing and the next month was being printed, and the month after was all set up in type. With a magazine which goes to so many people, the presses have to start work a long time in advance. Most magazines work about four to five months ahead! About the brown spots, they may be liver spots, in which case drinking the juice of half a lemon in a glass of water before breakfast, and taking the liver exercises I have frequently recommended, would help. You will find a liver exercise in the last issue of COMFORT. You might try bathing the spots with peroxide diluted with a little water. This may bleach them a trifle.

too much at once. Better a small garden well cared for than a larger one that the child is unable to care for properly without overtaxing her strength. Even a few plants will prove interesting and awaken a desire in the child to know more of Nature and her wonders. For rainy days you might let her make a scrap-book, since it is a generally recognized fact that children like to cut and paste things, as most parents know and to their sorrow sometimes. It is better to direct this energy in the proper channels and a scrap-book can be made educational as well as amusing. Perhaps her teacher will give you valuable suggestions and also appreciate the interest you take in her school work.—Ed.

ASHEVILLE, N. C.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I have read with interest the letters in the COMFORT'S Sisters' Corner and I am sure that the exchange of ideas is both instructive and interesting. One letter that has especially attracted my attention is one in the March number signed Frances E. Morn, Post, Oregon. I greatly enjoyed her letter and trust that she will write again but (let me say it kindly) I cannot understand how a woman of her education can take the view she does of compulsory church attendance. She made this statement, "A friend of mine made her little son go to Sunday school every Sunday, rain or shine, as long as she had authority over him, then he stopped and will not attend either church or Sunday School."

I exclaimed reverently, "Thank God for a mother with the courage of her convictions to make her children attend Sunday school," for when these children do again resume the habit of church going, which they undoubtedly will, they will "take off their hats" in humble reverence to this God-fearing mother who taught them to love and reverence the house and services of God. Why do not our children grow tired of day school, when we insist on their going there? You will say, "They do tire of school." It is true that when the warm weather comes they become tired of school just as we mothers become tired of our hot kitchens but after a vacation we are eager to begin again and my children after a short vacation are always impatient to resume their studies.

One of the things for which I shall never cease to be thankful is that my parents (my father is a minister of the M. E. Church South) trained me to attend church and now when Sunday morning comes no "riverside out in the woods" could tempt me to leave my church. There is no joy to be procured from any source that is half as great as the joy of attending the house of God and with the Psalmist I exclaim, "I was glad when they said unto me, let us go into the house of the Lord." My dear Mrs. Morn, do you not think that the lack of desire on the part of the boy to attend church is due to a desire to avoid the things of good and to cleave to the things of the bad. In other words, the good went out of the heart and the bad came in.

I am glad that I did not get in on the first discussion on dancing, but I see a hint that it has been discussed and I would like to say in the same kind spirit to Mrs. Sue Lorene Johnson of Hobson, Texas, as to Mrs. Morn of Oregon, that when she says "dancing is all right when the girls are chaperoned and then be careful," it is just like telling them they may get pretty close to the devil and take a peep at him but be careful that he doesn't get them. Dancing is all right in its place, but intelligent people have relegated it to the oblivion that it so much deserves.

Sincerely, MRS. F. M. FELMET.

WASHINGTON.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

Mary, whatever you do, do not marry unless it is for love. I married when I was nineteen years old and not till I was thirty-one did I meet the man I really loved. You see if I had waited a few years longer I might have been happy now. But, like you, I was a hard-working girl and had been since I was a small girl as my parents were poor and I had to earn my own living. I thought if I had a home of my own I would be happy so I married, respecting my husband only, and my heart has cried out against it ever since. My mother was a good woman but she did not understand us children and we never talked to her about such things. What a mistake mothers make sometimes. If I am spared a few years longer it will be different with my girls for I mean to tell them all I have bought with years of suffering and bitter tears. After marriage there is so much to put up with that it is a hard fight unless love is there.

Am sending a little poem I read one day and I enjoyed it so much:

"If Love Is There"

"Is home a palace or a cot
In city street or country spot,
With stairways wide, or narrow halls,
With pillars high or low hung walls?
I cannot tell. Why should I care—
What matters it if Love is there?

"Is home among the crowded gay,
Or ours along some lonely way,
Where winds blow cold and ice is king,
Or where the balmy breezes sing?
Where clouds are black, or skies are fair—
What matters it if Love is there?

"Your home stands grandly on a hill,
Mine snuggles by the hidden rill;
The streaming lights afar you see,
A tiny lamp shines out for me.
Your home! My home! Just anywhere!
What matters it if Love is there."

MRS. G. W. B. E.

Best Ways of Doing Things Around The Home

Put salt in oven to prevent bread or cake scorching on bottom.

Sprinkle starched clothes in warm water instead of cold and they will dampen more rapidly.

Remember vegetables grown above the ground should be cooked in salted water while those grown below should be cooked in fresh water.

When linen is badly scorched, soak stain in luke-warm water, squeeze lemon juice over it, sprinkle with a little salt and place in sunshine to dry.

To make a good paste for wall paper, add a piece of common washing soap, about as large as an egg, sliced fine, to the boiling water that the paste is to be made of. It is sure to stick.

MISS AGNES TRAVIS, Platte, S. Dak.

Time and Life Saver Washing Fluid. One pound of sal soda, one half pound lime and five quarts of water. Let come to a boil, let settle and pour off the clear fluid into a clean jug. On washing day, cut half a cake of laundry soap into boiler half full of water and when it boils, add a cup of washing fluid. Soak clothes the night before, wring out and boil half an hour in this and no rubbing will be needed. Rinse thoroughly.

MRS. W. D. PRIEL, Louisville, Ky.

Remedies

BURNS.—The white of a raw egg turned onto a burn or scald will prevent inflammation and relieve pain. MRS. VELMA STEED, Mayflower, Ark.

SUMMER COMPLAINT.—Make a tea of the weed known as Colt's tail. It grows here on the prairies.

APPENDICITIS.—At first symptoms take one tablespoon of Epsom Salts internally. Then put one tablespoon of salts in one pint of water, make as hot as hands can be borne in it, wring out cloth and lay over appendix; when it cools, wash cloth in clean water and apply again as before. The water the cloth was washed in will turn green. This has been tried and is a sure cure.

a pretty air of authority, that she was "going to carry her guest off up-stairs to bed immediately."

"You stay here until I come back, Roy," she added. "Charlie was obliged to go out upon important business, and I shall be glad of your company for a while."

"Very well, Nellie! I will stay for a little chat, for I have something important which I wish to say to you."

As he concluded he darted a smiling glance at Edith, which again brought the lovely color to her cheeks and revealed to her the nature of the important communication that he intended to make to his cousin.

She bad him a smiling good night, and then gladly accompanied her hostess above, for she was really more weary than she had acknowledged.

When Mrs. Morrell returned to the parlor, Roy related to her something of Edith's history, and also confessed his own relationship toward her, while the little woman listened with an absorbed attention which betrayed how thoroughly she enjoyed the romance of the affair.

"She is lovely!" she remarked, "and"—with a thoughtful air—"it seems to me as if I have heard the name before. Edith Allandale!—it sounds very familiar to me. Why, Roy! she was one of Sister Blanche's classmates at Vassar, and she has her picture in her class album!"

"That is a singular coincidence!" the young man observed, no less surprised at this revelation, "and it makes matters all the more pleasant for me to learn that she is not wholly unknown to the family."

"And you mean to marry her very soon?"

"Just as soon as I can settle matters with that rascal in Boston to her satisfaction," responded the young man. "I do not apprehend any serious trouble about the affair; still, it may take longer than I wish."

"And may I keep her until then?"

"Nellie! that is like your kind, generous heart!" exclaimed the young man, "and I thank you from the bottom of mine. But, of course, that will have to be as Edith herself decides, while this business which I have in charge for her may interfere with such an arrangement."

"Oh, you mean in connection with the strange gentleman who has been searching for her."

"Yes. But I must go now; it is getting late, and I have a couple of letters to write yet. Take good care of my treasure, Nellie, and I will run in as early tomorrow as possible to see you both."

He kissed her affectionately, then bade her good night and hurried away to his rooms at his club; while pretty Mrs. Morrell went back to her parlor, after letting him out, to await her husband's return, and to think over the romantic story to which she had just listened with deep interest.

There had been so much of a personal and tender nature to occupy their minds that Mr. Bryant had not thought to tell Edith anything about the circumstances that had led him to advertise in various papers for intelligence of her.

Some three weeks previous, a gentleman, of about fifty years, and calling himself Louis Raymond, had presented himself in his office, and inquired if he could give him any information regarding the late Albert Allandale's family.

He stated that he had spent most of his life abroad, but, his health beginning to fail, he had decided to return to his own country.

He had been quite ill since his arrival, and he began to fear that he had not long to live, and it behooved him to settle his affairs without further delay.

He stated that he had no relatives or family—he had never married; but, being possessed of large wealth, he wished to settle half of it upon Mrs. Allandale, if she could be found, or, if she was not living, upon her children. The remaining half he designed as a legacy to a certain charitable institution in the city.

He stated that he had been searching for the Allandales for several weeks; he had learned of Mr. Allandale's financial troubles and subsequent death, but could get no trace whatever of the other members of the family. He was wearied out with his search, and now wished to turn the matter over to some one stronger than himself, and better versed in conducting such affairs.

Mr. Bryant could not fail to regard it as a singular coincidence that this business should have been thrown into his hands, especially as he was also so anxious to find Edith; and it can well be understood that he at once entered into the gentleman's plans with all his heart and soul.

He, of course, related all he knew of her history, and when he spoke of Mrs. Allandale's death he was startled to see his client grow deathly white and become so unnerved that, for a moment, he feared the shock would prove more than he could sustain.

But he recovered himself after a few moments.

"So she is gone!" he murmured, with a look in his eyes that told the secret of a deathless but unrequited love. "Well, Death's scythe spares no one, and perhaps it is better so. But this girl—her daughter," he added, rousing himself from his sad reflections; "we must try to find her."

"We will do our utmost," said the young lawyer, with a heartiness which betrayed the deep interest he felt in the matter. "As I have told you, I have not the slightest knowledge of her whereabouts, but think she may possibly be in Boston. Her letter to me, written just previous to her departure, gave me not the slightest clew to her destination. She promised to write to a woman who had been kind to her, and I arranged with her to let me know when she received a letter; but I have never seen her since—I once went to the house where she lived, but she had moved, and no one could tell me anything about her."

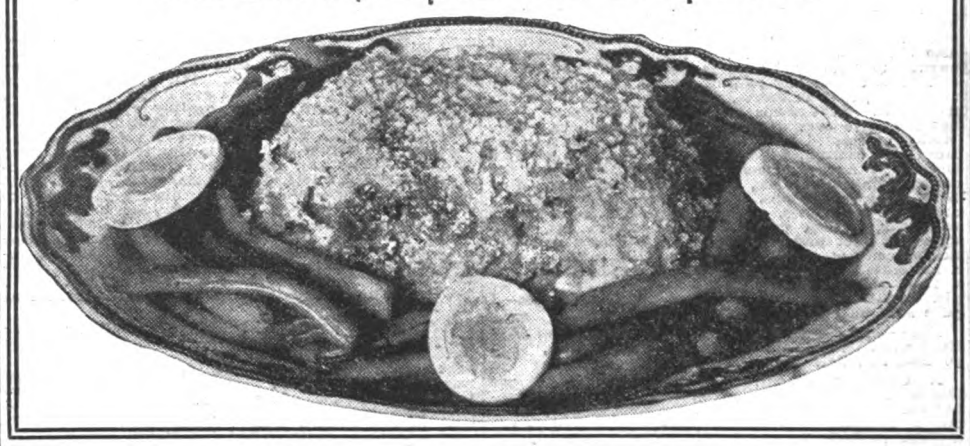
It may be as well to state here that shortly after Edith left New York, poor Mrs. O'Brien fell and broke her leg. She was taken to a hospital, and her children put into a home, consequently she never received Edith's letter, which was of course addressed to her old residence.

"I think our wisest course will be to advertise," the young lawyer pursued; "and if we do not achieve our end in that way, we can adopt other measures later on."

"Well, sir, do your best—I don't mind expense; and if the young lady can be found, I have a story to tell her which I think will deeply interest her," the gentleman returned. "If we should not be successful in the course of a few weeks, I will make a settlement upon her, to be left, with some other papers, in your hands for a reasonable period, in the event of my death. But if all your efforts prove unavailing, the money will eventually go, with the rest, to the institution I have named."

Thus the matter had been left, and Mr. Bryant had immediately advertised, as we have seen, in several New York and Boston papers.

Three weeks had elapsed without any response, and Royal Bryant was beginning to be discouraged when he was suddenly made jubilant by receiving the telegram which Edith had written on the train after leaving Boston.



Thus, after leaving the house of his cousin, he repaired to his club, where he wrote a letter to his client, Mr. Raymond, telling him that Miss Allandale was found, and asking him to meet him at his office at as early an hour the following morning as possible.

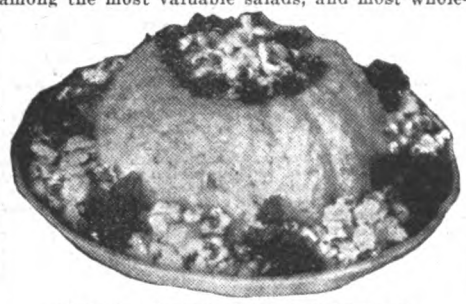
CHAPTER XXVI.

AN EXCITING INTERVIEW AND AN APPALLING DISCOVERY.

We must now transport ourselves to Boston, in order to find out how Edith's flight was discovered, and what effect it produced in the God-

The Road to Health in the VEGETABLE KINGDOM

By Ella Gordon



Copyright, 1917, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

The Road to Health

VEGETABLE food is as necessary to good health as is oil to machinery. Vegetables, as well as fruits, contain cellulose which supplies bulk and elasticity to the food, and which does not decompose in the digestive tract as readily as meat.

To prevent the food from becoming compact in the intestines is the first consideration of a physician when consulted regarding constipation, and this is just what vegetable eating does. Many of the vegetables carry as high as ninety per cent water, rich in saline substances which counteract the evil effects of eating too much animal food.

Too much cannot be said in favor of serving, at least once a day, a salad of raw fruits and vegetables, as cooking destroys a certain amount of the cell salts, which are absolutely necessary to prevent an accumulation of acid throughout the system. Oranges, grapefruit, apple, grapes, lettuce, celery, raw cabbage, radishes, onion, sweet pepper, watercress, endive and parsley are among the most valuable salads, and most wholesome when taken with pepper, salt, olive oil and very little vinegar, made into a French dressing.

Cooked cereals are an important food, particularly oats and corn-meal mush, though the latter is least used. Cereals should be served with rich milk, but no sugar, and the eating of uncooked fruit should precede the cereal, as the fruit supplies that part of the base salts lost in the cooking of cereals.

How to Cook Vegetables Properly

Among the most valuable of the vegetables grown for winter use are peas and beans which contain both starch and albumin. Dried peas and beans made into purees are more digestible than when cooked and served as a vegetable. Beets, turnips, carrots, squash, pumpkin, onions, and other vegetables which contain sugar should be slightly sweetened, as much of the natural sugar is lost in cooking. An addition of salt, butter or other fat is necessary, and a little red pepper aids the digestion of stored winter vegetables.

Green vegetables should be used as soon as possible after gathering, and for this reason, when possible, every housewife, if she does not have her own garden, would do well to secure her vegetables from a gardener who each morning sells from house to house. Every green vegetable will better retain its color if boiled rapidly and uncovered.

Potatoes

Potato is, without doubt, the most used of any vegetable, combining, as it does, with meat and fish to give the desired food elements. To boil, potatoes should first be washed and, unless new, soaked in cold water one hour. Drop in boiling salted water and cook till soft, but not broken. Drain thoroughly and shake lightly around in kettle on hot stove till the steam escapes, then pare before serving.

Baked potatoes should be put in a hot oven, but not hot enough to brown before the centers are cooked. To be perfect. As soon as soft, slightly break the skin to let the steam escape, thus preventing the potato from becoming soggy, and then serve at once. Never put in covered dish.

Riced potatoes are boiled and then put through the ricer into the serving dish. A little melted butter may be poured over them, then sprinkled with finely chopped parsley and paprika. Heat serving dish and have butter melted before ricing potato, then serve at once.

FRIED RAW POTATOES.—Pare and wash, then cut into narrow strips. Soak in cold salted water one hour, drain and dry between cloths. Drop into smoking hot fat and cook one minute, or till a light brown. Sprinkle with salt and serve.

Asparagus

Wash thoroughly and break off all the tough white part. Tie in bunches and cook fifteen to twenty minutes in enough boiling salted water to cover. Drain, arrange on crisp slices of buttered toast, and season with butter, pepper and salt.

Cabbage and Brussel Sprouts

Remove the outside leaves and soak in cold salted water one hour. Have a kettle of boiling salted water over a fire hot enough to keep water boiling uncovered. Drop in vegetable, part at a time so not to stop boiling, and cook till tender. When cooked uncovered, vegetables become soft in half the time and the flavor is superior to those cooked in covered kettle. Chop cabbage, season with butter, pepper and salt and set in oven to reheat. Brussels sprouts are seasoned the same or served with white sauce.

Celery

Wash and scrape and cut into two-inch lengths; cook till tender in boiling salted water. Dip in batter and fry in hot fat. Make a batter by sifting one cup of flour with half an even teaspoon of soda and one even teaspoon of cream of tartar, and one saltspoon of salt. Beat two eggs, add one quarter cup of milk and a little grated lemon rind and beat in the flour. Let rise several hours.

Greens

Dandelions, young beet with tops on, mustard tops, turnip tops, spinach, and swiss chard are all cooked practically the same way, in boiling salted water till tender. Dandelions require plenty of water, but spinach and other tender greens may be cooked in their own juices, the moisture left on them from washing should be plenty to start cooking with. Lettuce that has gone to seed makes delicious greens. Greens should be very carefully picked over and washed in several waters, then drained, cooked and drained again. Chop fine, season with butter, pepper and salt and serve with vinegar and oil if preferred.

STUFFED BAKED ONIONS SERVED WITH BEETS.

Vegetables Attractively Served Together

It is becoming more and more the custom to serve several kinds of vegetables on one platter. The idea is a practical one, and a combination of vegetables is very appetizing in appearance. It simplifies the preparation of dinner, and does away with a certain amount of dishwashing.

Among other dishes that may be served together are the roast surrounded by potatoes pared and baked brown with the meat. The steam and fat keeps the potatoes basted, giving a rich flavor. Fish served with boiled potatoes and a white sauce poured over them and garnished with slices of hard-boiled eggs makes a good Friday dinner. A steak served on a large platter with sliced beets and carrots, mashed potato and peas makes a handsome dish, and may be garnished with olives and parsley.

Squash and String Beans

(SEE ILLUSTRATED HEADING OF THIS ARTICLE.)

Wash, cut in halves and remove seeds from squash. Put into baking pan, cut side down, and bake in a hot oven till done. Scoop from shell, mash fine, and season with butter, pepper and salt. If preferred, the squash may be steamed, but should never be boiled as the flavor goes into water.

Drain one can of white string beans, add fresh boiling water and cook one hour. Add salt when half done. If fresh beans are used, cook whole.

Make mound of squash on platter, surround with beans, and butter well. Garnish with slices of hard-boiled egg.

Potatoes Served with Cauliflower

Pare six potatoes and let stand in cold salted water half an hour. Drop into boiling salted water, one at a time, to prevent the water cooling below the boiling point, and use just enough water to cover. Cook till tender, drain and mash. Add enough cream to beat light. Wet a mold or bowl, press in the potato, and then turn out onto a serving platter and place in oven till very hot.

Remove the leaves from a firm white cauliflower and soak one hour in cold salted water. Drain, cover with boiling water and cook until tender. Separate the head into flowerets and place around mold of mashed potato, alternating with sprigs of parsley or celery leaves. Butter each floweret, and a very little salt and sprinkle with paprika.

Hot Rice with Peas and Carrot

Wash and drain half a cup of rice. Put into a two-quart stew pan one quart of water with one teaspoon of salt. When boiling hard add the rice, a little at a time, so the water will not stop boiling. Cook slowly till tender and drain, drying in the oven mouth. Press into a wet mold, keeping it hot. Turn out onto a platter.

Cut carrots in short strips and boil in enough salted water to cover. Drain and butter well.

Drain one can of peas, put into double cooker with one tablespoon of butter, a little salt and pepper and half a teaspoon of sugar, and let the water boil in cooker about ten minutes. Add the hot carrot, toss together and surround the hot rice.

Jellied Peas

Wash pods before shelling. Shell and cook pods twenty minutes, skim out pods and put peas into the same water. Cook about fifteen minutes or till tender, adding salt when nearly done. To three cups of peas, have left when cooked about one cup of liquid. Add to the peas just before taking from fire, one teaspoon of sugar and a little white pepper, and one even tablespoon of gelatine that has been soaked in one third of a cup of cold water twenty minutes. Pour into mold and when stiff it is ready to serve. Garnish with rounds of hard-boiled egg and parsley.

Onions with White Sauce

Peal and drop into boiling salted water and cook until tender. Change the water if less onion flavor is desired. Drain and place each onion on a round of bread toasted through in the oven. Cover with white sauce.

For sauce melt butter in sauce pan and slowly work in an equal quantity of flour until a smooth paste is formed, cooking very slowly all the time. To every two tablespoons of flour, add one cup of milk, salt and pepper to taste. Cook seven minutes, constantly stirring.

Stuffed and Baked Onions Served with Beets

Remove the outer skin from seven onions that are uniform in size. Boil fifteen minutes, drain, and cut a slice from the top of each onion and remove the center carefully, leaving the walls about one inch thick. Add to the portion removed an equal quantity of veal or chicken and a little bacon or ham, and chop finely together. Add half a cup of soft bread crumbs, season with pepper and salt and moisten with a little cream, and fry slowly in butter about fifteen minutes. Fill onions with this preparation, place in earthern baking dish with a cup of the water onions were boiled in, and bake in hot oven till tender. Place each onion on a slice of hot boiled beet about one inch thick, and garnish the tops with a square of the beet.

dards' elegant home on Commonwealth avenue.

Emil Correlli had been seated in the handsome library, reading a society novel, when his sister went out to make her call, leaving him as guard over their prisoner above.

He had been much pleased with the report which she brought him from Edith, namely, that she believed she was yielding, and would make her appearance at dinner; at the same time he did not allow himself for a moment to become so absorbed in his book as to forget that he was on the watch for the slightest movement above stairs.

He and Mrs. Goddard had agreed that it would be wise not to make the girl a prisoner within her room, lest they antagonize her by so doing.

But while they appeared to leave her free to go out or come in, they intended to guard her none the less securely, and thus Monsieur Correlli kept watch and ward below.

He knew that Edith could not leave the house by the front door without his knowing it, and as he also knew that the back stairway door was locked on the outside, he had no fear that she would escape that way.

He had not reckoned, however, upon the fact of an outsider entering by means of the area door and going up-stairs, thus leaving that way available for Edith; and Giulia Fiorini had accomplished her purpose so cleverly and so noiselessly that no one save Edith dreamed of her presence in the house.

The two girls had carried on their conversation in such subdued tones that not a sound could be heard by any one below, and thus Emil Correlli was taken entirely by surprise when there came a gentle knock upon the half-open library door to interrupt his reading.

"Come in," he called out, thinking it might be one of the servants.

But when the door was pushed wider, and a woman entered, bearing a child in her arms, the astonished man sprang to his feet, an angry oath leaping to his lips, and every atom of color fading out of his face.

"Giulia!" he exclaimed, under his breath.

"Papa! papa!" cried the child, clapping his little hands, as he struggled out of his mother's arms, and ran toward him.

He took no notice of the child, but frowningly demanded, as he faced the girl:

"How on earth did you ever get into this house?"

"By a door, of course," responded the intruder.

"Well, and what do you want?" he cried, angrily; then, with a violent start, he added, against the copperheads, the pacifist lunatics and monarchy loving hyphenates, and all the other traitorous elements that have been trying to stab Uncle Sam in the back, conspiring to make this country defenseless so that it could be the more easily invaded and conquered by the royal despots of Europe. I've been deluged with abuse and threats for taking this stand for genuine Americanism, but I can neither be muzzled nor bought. What this country needs is to know the truth about itself, and it is only by spreading truth, no matter how unpleasant that truth may be, that wrongs can be righted and mankind set free. We have been doing the ostrich act with our heads in the sand too long. For years I have warned you through these columns that the storm was coming. Weeks have elapsed since war was declared and we are but half awake. This is a war for the brotherhood of men, a war for our national existence. I shall din that fact into your ears from month to month, until this war is over and the fight for humanity won. As for being a man without a country. When a mother corrects her children, opens their eyes to the truth, warns them of the folly of wrong doing, disciplines and chastises them, do you call that mother a woman without a home? You do not, for you know she is the only worth-while kind of mother. Grave responsibilities rest on my shoulders, and what the good mother does in her home, I shall try to do in this larger home, the United States of America, and let me remind you of this, that a man without a country is much less of a menace than a country without men, especially that type of man who, when writing to an invalid, has not even the courage to sign his name.

CLAREMONT, N. C.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I am thirteen years old. I go to school six months in the year, am in the sixth grade. I study Engish, arithmetic, geography, history and spelling. I like arithmetic best.

We live near a creek. I carry water from a spring a few steps from the creek.

We have one horse, one pig and about thirty chickens. I love to ride horseback. I have to brothers, the oldest one is Ralph, age six. Everett the baby is three.

This is my first letter to the COMFORT and don't let Billy the Goat get it.

Hoping to see this in print,

Your loving niece, MABEL E. YOUNT.

Mabel informs us that she is studying Engish. What sort of language is Engish, Mabel? I'm inclined to believe from your letter that a course of English would be highly advantageous to you. It would also be highly advantageous to millions of citizens of foreign birth or foreign descent, who never speak or read a word of English unless they are obliged to. There is a family in Pennsylvania that has been in this country one hundred and seventy years, and the whole bunch of them cannot speak a word of any language but German. If that isn't a ferocious indictment of our insane and wickedly stupid and dangerous method of neglecting the immigrant and failing to Americanize him, then I don't know what danger is. There was an Austrian who had been in Yonkers for twenty-four years (a citizen at that), who was called for jury duty the other day, and he could not speak a word of English. Of course he knew one word—dollar. They all know that, and you can't hand them a "one" spot and make them believe it is a ten. How did that man become a citizen? Ask the politicians, they know. He worked in a factory among people of his own race and kept in the same beaten track year in and year out. I wonder if the young man in California whose letter appears in this issue will criticize me for bringing this matter to your attention? What this man in Yonkers was doing, millions of men are doing, and then when we are plunged into a war that threatens our very existence, we wonder why it is people do not come forward and enlist. People who do not speak our language cannot love our country, sympathize with its policies or appreciate its institutions. It is on these people the foreign language press grows fat, and it is these who supply spies and plotters, incendiaries and traitors whenever we have trouble at home or abroad. I'm going to keep this matter constantly before your notice. Our indifference to the immigrant peril and our inability to absorb and Americanize those who have sought these shores to better themselves and to get away from military service and official tyranny, is the most menacing and dangerous factor in the structure of our national life, and it is right now that the menace is greatest. Stop the foreign language press until the war is over then limit its use to weekly publications every alternate column of which should be in the American tongue. Our language is the language of freedom and democracy, and only as it is universally used can this nation be secure and realize its destiny. Mabel, you say "I have to brothers." So many of you children and grown-ups fall down on this to business. Now here is a little sentence, study it and it will save you from making many ludicrous and at times, humiliating mistakes. "I have two brothers, and we are going to the city today, if it does not rain too much." Now Mabel study English and leave English alone.

GEORGETOWN, ARK.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I am sixteen yeas old, have blue eyes, light brown hair and fair complected.

I live in a small town, about one hundred miles from Little Rock.

Mother has been taking the COMFORT for about two years and we like it fine.

Dear Uncle Charlie, is it proper for a young girl to take candy, chewing gum and fruit from a young man?

My letter is too long so will close with love to one and all.

I am your loving niece, ELSIE ———

P. S. Please don't print my full name.

Elsie, you want to know if it is correct, right and proper, to take candy and chewing gum from a young man. What an extraordiary question to ask. Surely my dear, you have been grounded in a few of the fundamentals of morals and ethics. The eighth commandment says "Thou Shalt Not Steal." Did you never hear about it? Of course if you were driven desperate by hunger you might be excused if you took anything in the edible line from a young man; but as Arkansas is not at present famine stricken, I can't see that you would be justified in relieving any young man of things that belonged to him and did not belong to you. That young man too many be poor and needy, and even if he is not it would not warrant you in relieving him of his property. What's that Billy the Goat? Elsie wants to ask if it was correct and proper to accept candy, chewing gum and fruit from a young man. Ah, that's a horse of another color. To take things from a young man savors of robbery, to accept gifts is strictly within the law and all correct and proper. Don't however, accept too many gifts from anyone as it puts you under an obligation to the giver. After some boys have spent twenty-five cents on a girl, they think they own her. Study the young man and don't let him throw his money away on you, or he will soon be expecting something in return. Gifts given to girls in many cases are merely bribes for favors that are expected later on; mere bait that is used skillfully to conceal a hook which is not so easy to wiggle away from when one gets on it. Perfect freedom of thought and action are the things most conducive to happiness, and a girl should be very careful how she parts with these most precious of all things.

DEPOSIT, ALA.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I want your opinion and advise on this.

If you were a married man and your wife received a postal from her home town, with her address only on the card, and no other writing, what would you think? Hope this will not be overlooked as I will be anxious to read your reply.

Very truly, MRS. VIOLET ———

Mrs. Violet, I can't tell exactly what I would do if I had a wife and she received a postal card from her home town with the correspondence side entirely blank. I might fall in a fit and bite six inches off the cat's tail; I might jump in the Atlantic and make believe I was a submarine; I might go and buy a bottle of lemon extract and go on a jag for a few weeks; I might run all over Alabama and find if anybody was sufficiently up to date to be interested in woman suffrage; I might row a boat up to the top of Pike's Peak, and try and bite holes in the man in the moon's whiskers; I might run for Congress and add to the honor and glory of the South by getting sufficient pork out of Uncle Sam's pocketbook to build a million dollar post-office at every cross road that had a population of one grasshopper and two mosquitoes. There are all sorts of terrible things a man might do if his wife got a postal card with nothing on the back of it, but just what I'd do I can't exactly tell, as my married life only lasted five weeks, and I'm not an expert at knowing what people do when they are married and live together for two or three hundred years. Probably in this case there is a nut of a husband who is insanely jealous. I have a good deal of sympathy for people who are jealous, for jealousy is a horrible affliction, and there is no love (at least no worth-while love) where there is not a little reasonable jealousy, but extremes of any kind are liable to be dangerous. Unfortunately there are seldom any varying degrees of jealousy. People are insanely jealous as a rule or not at all. When people get to the point that they feel no stirring of the emotions and are indifferent as to what husband, wife, or sweetheart may be doing or what company they may be in then love is dead in that individual's heart. It is sweet and precious to know that someone cares, and the flame of love is still warm and bright when someone does care. True love implies perfect trust, but man is not a monogamous animal. Leave him to his own devices and he would be polygamous, for as the London costermonger says "'E 'as a very accomodatin' 'eart." Woman on the other hand is content to anchor her little love craft in one harbor and let it stay there. Of course there are exceptions. Possibly the woman in this case is one of the exceptions and the poor man may have had good cause to be jealous in the past, and this blank postal which may mean nothing to the average eye, may mean a whole world to him. Jealousy is a thing that thrives on doubt and magnifies trifles, or as Shakespeare puts it:

Trifles light as air are to the jealous
Confirmation strong as proofs of Holy Writ.

Jealousy is the green-eyed monster and tortures like the coals of Hades those who indulge in it. Most women can be trusted but mighty few men can where women are concerned. Wife stays at home happy in her husband's love and her children's love. Not once in a hundred times does she ever doubt or question. Hubby knows she is as true as steel and usually she is. Hubby however is buying silk stockings for the blonde stenographer and taking her out to lunch. It is just as natural fo. him to be doing that little act as it is for a bee to be buzzing from flower to flower gathering in all the honey it can comfortably store away. Men who are insanely jealous after they have had years of proof of a woman's devotion are an infernal nuisance, a dangerous nuisance in fact. They are a misery to themselves and a misery to everyone else. We should however be charitable in judging such people for this type of jealousy is often closely allied with insanity, but lunacy that injures other people and makes other lives miserable is not harmless. I'm inclined to believe that the man referred to in Mrs. Violet's letter is this type of lunatic, but no one should pass judgment in a case of this kind unless he has all the facts, and people who ask questions of magazine editors as a rule never give any facts upon which one can base a fair and honest opinion.

CHEYENNE, WYO.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I am a boy nine years old, have light hair and blue eyes, I enjoy school work, I am in fourth grad. We took a homestead in Wyoming. We hove six pig, we hove twenty heod of cottle and three heod of horses, we hove twenty-five chichens I con milk. We con see the mountions and it is only twelve meils to the mountions. I hope I will see this in COMFORT. Sister con sew ond crochet milk ond cook. Her name is Flora. Don't let Billy the Goat get this.

Yours sincerely, ORIN SPURLING.

Orin, yours would have been a very nice letter, if you hadn't chased the letter a from out your alphabet. There is not a single a in all your letter. I have put one or two in to make it readable and trust you will excuse me for the liberty I have taken in so doing. Everybody seems determined to work o overtime and put the first letter of the alphabet on the retired list. The difference between these two letters is considerable and teachers are derelict in their duty if they do not point this out to their scholars. Children will go to all sorts of trouble to write a perfectly beautiful o, but it seems most of them would rather die than write the letter a. We are all sorry we can't come over and see your twenty head of cottle, Orin, and twenty-five chichens. I hope that a chichen is an improvement on chicken and that it is a new variety of fowl that will lay eggs at thirty-five cents a dozen all the year round. I'm so tired of pawning my bed, the piano and the victrola every time I want to buy an egg. Orin says "I have twenty-five chichens I can milk." A chichen that can be milked as well as egged would indeed be a valuable addition to our food supply in these hungry times. Orin you seem to be the Luther Burbank of the poultry yard. You have created some wonderful combinations. You might try your hand at creating a speechless Bryan, a patriotic pacifist a foreign language press printed in the American language, that was also willing to admit the United States could be right say once every ten billion years. You might try your hand at making a peaceful Mexico and a Middle West that knew it belonged to the United States. You might also invent a drug-store that didn't sell more whiskey than a saloon. You might also invent an America full of democratic people without a single traitorous monarchy worshipping, king-loving fanatic within its whole borders. That would be an awful task, but it is a task that will be done by somebody, and I'd give worlds if you would start the experiment. I am glad you can see the mountions, Orin, and that they are only twelve miles away. A fellow gets kind of tired looking at mountains all the time and I'm exceedingly glad to find that you invented a new brand and I hope you have made them high enough to keep all Uncle Sam's enemies at bay. Billy the Goat likes the name of Cheyenne. He is a little worried though as to whether a shy hen would be a good egg producer.

LOUIS, MINN.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I have read COMFORT since I was nine years of age. I enjoy your replies to the cousins' letters. They have been a great help to me, especially when you corrected the mistakes, as I had poor chances to get an education. I went to school in the country from the time I was seven years of age until I was fourteen, I was supposed to have been doing eighth grade work, but have found out since that it was about seventh. It was a typical "little red schoolhouse."

When I was fourteen my parents moved into a homestead country, northern Minnesota, and there were no schools. I wanted to go to our nearest town and go to high school and work for my board but my stepfather believed that a girl didn't need an education. Not being able to buy books, my education from that time on came from what I read in the paper COMFORT being the only one we subscribed to, besides a weekly newspaper, you can imagine how that was devoured.

Now will come down to the subject I wanted to write of, namely; blaming people for their lack of education and for the poor quality of their writing materials.

I have winced a great many times when reading those lectures. Suppose, for instance, that a great many were situated as I am, and I suppose there must be, they couldn't possibly help it.

I was married three years ago to an honest, upright fellow who owned, or rather had right on, a hundred and sixty acre homestead, with a small three-room house and a team of horses. He had almost enough saved to "prove up" on the homestead, but the first year I had poor health and he was unable to work and before we had been married two years, two babies were born to us, eleven months apart. The last one we lost and for several more months I had to be cared for, and it all took a great deal of money, so when he "proved up" he had to mortgage the farm for several hundred to pay bills. He obtained the position of mail carrier, but as we only have a star route the wages are small.

This summer I have had the best of health, so last fall took the teacher to board, to increase our income and to better my education by associating with her. My husband having had less chance for education than I. All in all our income is only fifty-five dollars a month which as you can plainly see, with present prices, no more than keeps us in necessities of life, consequently we cannot afford books or even a better grade of writing materials, so please don't be too hard on the medium poor class.

With best wishes for many more successful years, I am, MRS. W. SKINNER.

Dear Friend: Yours is a brave letter. No criticism of mine was ever directed at anyone, young or old, male or female, that was doing his or her level best, but only at the people who could do better and won't. I know what difficulties people labor under who live in remote rural communities. Such people have my love and sympathy, but even they should not get into the habit of pitying themselves overmuch. People who write business letters and letters for publication should, whenever possible, use ink. (Yours is in ink and beautifully penned.) Pencil marks are liable to rub off, and letters written in pencil are often terribly hard to read. Some day there will be a typewriter in every home in the land, and that day cannot come too quickly for those who have to examine vast quantities of correspondence. I shall continue to rail at the alarming amount of ignorance people display upon nearly every subject, political, economic and geographic, because there is no excuse for a great deal of this ignorance, except that those who are cursed by it are too mentally lazy, inert and slothful to use the brains and thinking apparatus that God Almighty gave them. A great many people will tell you they can't afford twenty-five cents a year for a magazine, or a dollar or two a year for newspapers, but they will spend fifty dollars for all sorts of trumpery junk, dope, cheap finery and what they call "good times." Nobody needs to go hungry for mental food. Many states have traveling libraries. A note written to any local paper asking for reading matter, will bring a deluge of mental food. Hundreds of people have been supplied with reading matter by making their wants known through our columns. As soon as the masses of the people realize that the earth is theirs and the fullness thereof, they will go after what belongs to them, but they can get nothing by resenting criticism or feeling hurt when they are prodded by those who are trying to put them wise to all the good things they are missing by going through a beautiful world with their brains asleep, and their eyes closed.

The Dying Soldier Boy's Love Letter

by Mrs. J. P. Draper

It started long ago in the early sixteen hundreds.

"Be ever your sunny self I love you" "Joe"

Copyright, 1917, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

THERE was put on sale last week at a fair held in a quaint New England village for the benefit of war sufferers a typewritten series of unusual love letters, copied exactly, with only personal addresses and revealing signatures omitted. Tucked away among the number was one which proved to be a link in one of the most fascinating romances outside of fiction.

Ran the letter thus:

KEY WEST, 1899.

"Dear little mate, mine never now to be:

"They tell me that I cannot get home to you after all, sweetheart. Perhaps it is best thus. Now I can dream my dream of your love till the end, and no hurt to you, little one, if it be but a dream.

"My love for you, Sunbeam, shall follow you through life, for though I am going on that far journey from which no traveler has been known to return the love which I send to you shall break through every barrier and shall guard and protect you until your call shall come. However full your life that same love shall meet your spirit on the other side.

"By Jack's mother, who will remain with me, I shall send you a little package.

"You remember the scarf pin with the romantic history? The larger stone I have left in the pin; I had hoped to see it in a ring on your finger. The smaller stone is set in a little ring which was my mother's, and which I want you to wear for the sake of my love for you and your precious friendship for me.

"Should some good man win your love, dear one, tell him the story of the little ring. I am sure that he will be willing that you should wear it, guarding his ring as my love shall guard his love, keeping it ever strong and true. Should you have a daughter you might have the larger stone set for her, in a pin perhaps, to be worn on her wedding day and passed down to her daughter. Thus far can you keep alive the old world romance which otherwise would pass with me.

"And now dear one farewell. There is more that I might say, but will refrain for fear of saddening you. Be ever your sunny self.

"I love you.

"JOE."

So redolent was this letter with hints of a fascinating story that the writer who was fortunate enough to secure one of the little volumes containi , it determined to call upon the compiler of the book and get if possible the key to the hidden romance.

It started long ago in the early sixteen hundreds, my hostess told me, across the seas in France.

An English girl of good birth was wooed and won by a French nobleman, and on her wedding day received a pair of diamond eardrops, brought to her in person by her royal mother-in-law, who told her that the gems had been in the family since time beyond memory. So delighted was the girl with the gift and the gracious manner in which it was offered that she determined that the eardrops should be passed on down through the centuries to each oldest daughter on her wedding day.

All worked well according to plan and without adventure until abut 1724 when a several times great-grandmother of the soldier writer from Key West was a young girl about to go to her first ball.

As young girls have since young girls were, and always will as long as young girls are, this French maiden gave much thought to her personal adornment. The diamond eardrops, with their pretty history, which her mother wore only on state occasions seemed to be the one thing essentially necessary to complete the resplendence of her toilet on the grand occasion of her first ball.

By much wheedling and coaxing she gained permission to wear the drops, though such a thing had never even been thought of before.

Whether the little jewels were magnetic or whether the young girl's charms blazed brilliant there was no disputing the fact that Helena was not lacking in favors at the dance that night.

A happier girl never returned home after an exciting festivity. But alas, when she came to unclasp the lovely eardrops one was gone!

It is no feat to imagine that the little debuante's dreams of conquest were mingled with almost nightmares of unsuccessful search for the missing jewel.

A few days later her mother called her to the drawing-room to receive greetings from a partner of the ball. As he bowed he held out on the palm of his extended hand the missing eardrop! He had found it caught on one of his decorations and learning from the hostess of the evening to whom it belonged had hastened to return it.

Occasion, atmosphere, characters, everything was ripe for romance. Some months later the young Frenchman led Helena to the altar and the eardrops swung and twinkled against her cheeks in satisfaction of a mission well filled.

And from them they came on straight down from daughter to daughter until they were fastened into the ears of a bride about to sail for America.

And now we come to the mother of "Joe:" Joe who wrote the letter which has revived this old world romance. When a slip of a girl in France she met a young art student from the United States and lost her heart to him. And she sailed away with him, as trusting brides will, to his home in Nevada.

On shipboard one of the lovely eardrops was stolen or lost; at least it disappeared, nor was it ever found again.

Some few years later a baby boy was born to this couple and the mother wrote out the entire history of the remaining eardrop, gathered from a collection of letters which she had brought from France with her, and which told the story in broken bits.

When Joe was a little fellow both mother and father were stricken with typhoid fever of which there was raging an epidemic in the town and when the mother realized her critical condition she entrusted the eardrop to a friend to have made into a scarf pin for the baby boy. With it she left a letter instructing him to wear the pin until he found his bride, at which time the stones were to be reset in rings for the girl of his choice.

Mother and father both died of the fever and a gentleman from Providence, who had been a lifelong friend of the boy's father carried the little fellow home to his wife and their two-year-old son. The two boys grew up as brothers and when the Spanish-American War called for volunteers both enlisted. One was killed on the battlefield and the other lived to reach Key West. One never told the girl of his love, for he suspected the secret of his adopted brother and the other wrote the letter herein given. In another part of the book is a letter from "Jack" which was delivered after the war—but that is another story.

It seems likely that the romance which had two continents for its setting, which has lived through many wars, and which several times came close to reaching an untimely end, now will run through many more volumes.

My hostess wears a quaintly set stone guarding her engagement ring, and her little six-year-old daughter brought me a pure white diamond of dazzling brilliancy when sent to get "Uncle Joe's" pin from mother's jewel case.

A Declaration of Dependence

this. To night a passenger train will be signaled to stop at Bison Gulch. You can board it, and I suppose, make connections with Reno, where you can get a divorce. You must not despise me for acquiescing in this, but somehow, I could not help but wish your heart was in it, as mine was, and the chance to call you lawfully and reverently 'my wife' was too sweet to let slip. Go to your room now, and I'll wait on the porch until it is time for the train."

He opened the door, and Millicent, looking at him in amazement, went in.

For a long time she sat in the darkness of her room; and listened to the clock as it ticked off its minutes. Once she stole stealthily to the window. She saw Mac sitting motionless.

The hour neared midnight; then a knock came at the door. She opened it. Mac stood there.

"'Come, it is nearly time for the train. Are you ready?"

She picked up her hat, and put it on. Then her eyes wandered to the clean-cut profile of the big man before her. She wondered what was on his mind, and the next moment he told her.

"Miss Wright," he began, "would you be offended if I asked you to kiss me, just once? Just once, that's all. I love you dear, love you so much, that it would make me happy in years to come to know that I once kissed you. If my request horrifies you, you need not, but because I love you so well I request what my legal right gives me, the right to caress you and love you, for you are my wife as far as the law can make you. The ceremony was a mockery, as far as you were concerned, but we had the license and the minister and all that———"

"How did you know my heart was not in it?" she suddenly demanded, "how did you know?"

"Millicent! Millicent! Was your heart in it?"

"Don't call me 'Millicent!' My right name was Dorothy Grenfall, the name by which you married me! My heart was in the ceremony! I loved you, but I wouldn't acknowledge it. But now, in your great goodness of heart, I can hold back the flood no longer. Oh, Mac, we're married! Don't send me away, I don't want to go! I want to stay!"

"With me?" The big fellow's eyes glistened with something that came to them.

"With you!"

"Oh, Dorothy, I can't believe it! You so brilliant, so independent———"

"I want to be dependent now. I'm willing to sacrifice my independence to you. Oh, Mac," and her proud head went down on his gray clad bosom. "I want you. Oh, how I love you, my husband!"

CHAPTER X.

A YELLOW SLEEPING BEAUTY

"BE careful, there," warned Pittysing. "Look how you're dragging that shawl."

Simmie-Sammie turned to look, caught his foot in the shawl, and, burdened as he was with a sofa pillow, a dinner-bell, a tin pan, a picture book and a sword, lost his balance and fell, amid a great clatter.

"I ain't hurt," he laughed. "I sat wight down on the pillow."

"You'll have to take two trips with your things. I can't help you load up again," Pittysing said. "I've got too much to carry myself."

"Playin' show's too much work," grumbled Simmie-Sammie. "You can do it alone. Guess I'll go swing."

"A-a-all right!" his sister said, in a way that meant it was anything but right—in fact, that it was all wrong. "You just wait and see if I play anything YOU want to! And I'll give Gyp your share of the little cookies."

Then she changed her tone, for she saw an obstinate look coming in Simmie Sammie's face.

"Aw, come on! Be a good boy, and we'll have lots of fun. Just think! you're going to be the prince in 'Sleeping Beauty!' And those cookies have raisins in 'em—raisins and currants too. You carry part of the things, and I'll come back for the rest," she coaxed.

They had to make several trips, both of them, before they had all the things they wanted to use in the "show." They were to give it down by the Mill Brook, with Teddy Bear, Sarah-Grace-Josephine, Cattie Puss and Gyp, the puppy dog, to be audience part of the time and help where they were needed.

Pittysing's toy piano was set down carefully on a level place near the barrel-top table.

"I'll dress you up first," Pittysing said, jamming a pasteboard crown, covered with gilt paper, which had done service in many shows, on Simmie-Sammie's head. "Your hair don't look very prince-ified. Seem's if you might have combed it."

She tied a red cambric sash around his waist, and fastened three large, gilt stars on the front of his blouse.

"Now the curtain's going up," she announced. "Ring the bell."

Simmie-Sammie paused, bell in hand. "The' ain't any curtain."

"Oh, of course not, silly! But can't we make believe there is? Oh, sometimes, Simmie-Sammie, I wish you were a girl! Here, I've got to have the crown. Now ring the bell."

Simmie-Sammie rang until commanded to stop.

Pittysing, wearing the crown, and with a large flag draped over her shoulders, posed as the Goddess of Liberty, and for the opening number of the program, sang a verse of America.

Simmie-Sammie tried to join in

"'Let musit smell the bweeze',"

he quavered, but stopped to box the ears of Gyp, who was sniffing at the cookies.

Next was an exhibition of wonderful trained animals.

Simmie-Sammie threw sticks, which Gyp ran after and brought back. Then Simmie-Sammie buried the sticks, and Gyp dug them up, and with shining eyes and short barks of joy, laid them at his little master's feet. This was one of their favorite games.

Cattie Puss, protesting, and with ears laid back, was made to dance, jump through a hoop, and play the toy piano. Gyp, with help from Simmie-Sammie, stood on his head, and walked about on his fore-paws. He howled beautifully, without any help, while Cattie Puss played the piano.

Next came a recitation by Pittysing, "Little Boy Blue," while Simmie-Sammie, wearing Pittysing's blue winter coat, slept, with twitching eyelids, under the hazelnut bush, which was, for the time being, changed into a haycock.

"I CAN PLAY ON IT! I CAN MAKE MUSIC. I KNOW I CAN! SHE SAID."

They played a duet on the piano, and then the stage was set for the grand feature of the show, "The Sleeping Beauty."

With two sofa pillows and the shawl, a couch was made for Beauty's sleeping place. Cattie Puss, who had been chosen for that part, was squeezed into a dress that had belonged to a large doll of Pittysing's, whose head Simmie-Samaie had broken long ago. A lace veil was folded and tied over her head, to hide her cattish ears, and a pink sash-ribbon tied about her waist. She didn't like it, you may be sure, but she had to stand it.

Sarah-Grace-Josephine was seated at the piano to furnish the music.

Simmie-Sammie, again wearing the crown, and with a toy sword in his red cambric sash, was the prince, and made his way through the enchanted forest. He met and bravely drove away with his bright blade two fierce wild animals, Teddy Bear and Gyp.

When he reached the enchanted palace and the Sleeping Beauty, Pittysing was lying beside the couch, with a firm grasp on the Beauty, who seemed to be troubled by uneasy dreams.

"YOU hadn't ought to be here," he objected. "I shan't be the pwince if you get in the way."

"Hush! can't you see it's all I can do to hold her still? I'm one of her maidens, asleep on the floor at her side. Kiss her quick! Next time I'll have Sarah-Grace-Josephine for Sleeping Beauty."

Cattie Puss gave a low growl.

The prince bent to give the kiss which was to rouse the fair lady from her long sleep. Just then, Cattie Puss freed one paw from Pittysing's hold, and raising it suddenly, with every claw stretched out, gave Simmie-Sammie's cheek a savage scratch.

That was not the way to treat a prince who had dared so much to come to her help! You see, Cattie Puss hadn't learned her part well.

The poor prince howled, Pittysing sprang up, and wicked old Cattie Puss left her couch with a bound and went tearing off as fast as she could in all her finery.

She didn't care where she went.

But she didn't mean to be a Sleeping Beauty any longer.

If the children had been looking, they would have seen Nattie then. She had been watching the whole show from behind a rock, and when the Sleeping Beauty ran away, had been so excited she just hopped out in plain sight.

Then, when the children followed the runaway, the Smallest Dapperling of All went to the toy piano, and softly touched the keys.

"I can play on it! I can make music. I know I can!" she said. "Oh, if I could only carry this beautiful piano home to the assembly hall!"

Taking Sarah-Grace-Josephine's place, Nattie tried all the keys, one after another; then, after starting and stopping a few times, brought such sweet music from the little piano as would have astonished anyone who heard it.

A little way off, down the brook there was a rocky ledge, and below, on the other side, grew some raspberry bushes. Cattie Puss, hesitating on the edge of the little ledge, saw the children coming, and tried to spring forward. Her hind paws were on the little dress skirt which she wore, and she fell head first into the prickly bushes. The children ran around the ledge, and there was poor Cattie Puss, struggling to free herself. The torn dress was caught in the bushes, and the folded veil had slipped over her eyes, frightening and nearly blinding her.

Pittysing reached up and tried to help her out, but got a scratched arm for her pains.

"Listen, Pittsy!" said Simmie-Sammie, "what's that noise? I b'lieve it's a hand-organ man I hear. Let's go back to the house an' see if he's there an' got a monkey with him."

Pittysing listened.

"That ain't hand-organ music," she said. "It sounds like my toy piano, played better'n I ever played it. Come, quick, and we'll see!"

When they got back to where they had been giving the show, the sweet, tinkling music had stopped, and Sarah-Grace-Josephine was sitting in front of the piano, where they had left her.

Nobody else was in sight.

Gyp had eaten the cookies and gone off home.

Pittysing looked puzzled. She touched the little keys half timidly.

"'TWAS my piano! I know the sound of it!" she said. "Sarah-Grace-Josephine never played before, only when I held her hands, and I don't s'pose she did this time. I never S'POSED dolls COULD! But—I—don't—know!"

Cattie Puss came to the house at supper-time for her saucer of milk, with part of the dress she had worn still buttoned 'round her throat. The rest of the dress, and the veil, were tangled in the raspberry bushes. As for the pink sash ribbon, it was never seen again.

The next chapter will tell of a naughty trick by Simmie-Sammie and how the Dapperlings gave Pittysing a wonderful surprise. Don't miss it in August COMFORT.

The Masked Bridal

nervously: "Wait; sit down, and I will be back in a moment."

Darting out of the room, he ran swiftly upstairs, to ascertain, as we have seen, if his captive was still safe.

We know the result, and how adroitly Edith allayed his suspicions; whereupon, wholly reassured regarding her, he returned to the library to settle, once for all, as he secretly resolved, with his discarded plaything.

"Well, Giulia," he began, as he re-entered her presence, "what has brought you here? what is your business with me?"

"I have come to ascertain if this is true, and what you have to say about it," she answered, as she brought forth the newspaper and pointed to the article relating to the wedding at Wyoming.

"Well, what of it?" he at last questioned, assuming a defiant air; "what if it is true?"

"Is it true?" she persisted; "have you really married that girl?"

"And what if I have?" he again questioned.

"I want the truth from your own lips—yes or no, Emil Correlli."

"Well, then—yes," he said, with a flash of anger.

"You own it—you dare own it to me, and—in the presence of your child?" shrieked the woman.

"Stop, Giulia!" commanded her companion, sternly. "I will have no scene here to create a scandal among the servants. I intended to see you within a day or two; but, since you have sought me, we may as well at once come to an understanding. Did you think that you could hold me all my life? A man in my position must have a home in which to receive his friends, also a mistress in it to entertain them——"

"Have you forgotten all your vows and promises to me?" interposed Giulia, in tremulous tones; "that you swore everlasting fidelity to me?"

"A man vows a great many things that he finds he cannot fulfill," was the unfeeling response. "Surely, Giulia, you must realize that neither your birth nor education could entitle you to such a position as my wife must occupy."

"My birth was respectable, my education the best my country afforded," said the girl, with white lips. "Had you no intention of marrying me when you enticed me from my home to cross the ocean with you?"

"No."

"Oh, had you no heart? Why did you do such a fiendish thing?" she cried.

"Because you were pretty and agreeable, and I liked pleasant company. I have been accustomed to have whatever I wished for all my life."

"And you never loved me?"

"Oh, yes, for nearly three years I was quite fond of you—really, Giulia, I consider that I have been as faithful to you as you could expect."

"Oh, wretch! but you love this other girl more?"

"It would be worse than useless to attempt to deceive you on that point," said the man.

"You lied to me, then, Emil Correlli!" cried the miserable woman, hoarsely; "you swore to me that the girl was nothing to you—that she was simply your sister's companion."

"And I simply told you the truth," he retorted. "She was nothing to me at that time; she was 'only my sister's companion.' However," he added, straightening himself haughtily, "there is no use in wrangling over the matter any further. I married Edith Allen the night before last, and henceforth she will be the mistress of my home. I confess it is a trifle hard on you, Giulia," he continued, "but you must try to be sensible about it. I will settle a comfortable annuity upon you, and you can either go back to your parents or make a pleasant home for yourself somewhere in this country."

"And what of this boy?" questioned the discarded girl.

"I will provide handsomely for his future," he said, after considering for a minute. "If you will give him up to me he shall be reared as carefully as any gentleman's son, and, when he attains a proper age, I will establish him in some business or profession that will enable him to make his mark in the world."

"You would take him away from me to do this?"

"That would be necessary, in order to carry out my purpose as I wish," the man coldly replied.

"Never! You are a monster in human form to suggest such a thing. Do you think I would ever give him up to you?"

"Just as you choose," her companion remarked, indifferently. "I have made you the proposition, and you can accept or reject it as you see fit, but if I take him, I cannot have his future hampered by any environments or associations that would be likely to mar his life."

"Coward!" the word was thrown at him in a way that stung him like a lash, "do you dare twit me for what you alone are to blame? Where is your honor—where your humanity? Have you forgotten how you used every art to persuade me to leave the shelter of my pleasant home—the protection of my honest father and mother, to come hither with you? how you promised, by all that was sacred, to make me your wife if I would do your bidding? What I am you have made me—what this child is, you are responsible for. Ah, Emil Correlli, you have much to answer for, and the day will yet come when you will bitterly repent these irreparable wrongs ——"

"Come, come Giulia! you are getting beside yourself with your tragic airs," her companion here interposed, in a would-be soothing tone. "There is no use working yourself up into a passion and running on like this. What has been done is done, and cannot be changed, so you had best make the most of what is left you. As I said before, I will give you a handsome allowance, and, if you will keep me posted regarding your whereabouts, I will make you and the boy a little visit now and then."

"You will live to repent," she remarked, as she gathered the child up in her arms and arose to leave the room, "and before this day is ended your punishment shall begin; you shall never know one moment of happiness with the girl whom you have dared to put in my place."

"Bah! all this is idle chatter, Giulia," said Emil Correlli, contemptuously; nevertheless, he paled visibly, and a cold chill ran over him, for somehow her words impressed him as a prophecy.

"What! are you going in such a temper as that?" he added, as she turned toward the door. "Well, when you get over it, let me hear from you occasionally."

"Never fear; you will hear from me oftener than you will like," she flashed out at him, with a look that made him cringe, as she laid her hand upon the knob of the door.

"Stay, Giulia! Aren't you going to let me have a word with Ino? Here, you black-eyed little rascal, haven't you anything to say to your daddy?" he added, in a coaxing tone to the child.

"Mamma, may I talk to papa?" queried the little one.

"By the way," interposed the man, before she could reply, "you must put a stop to the youngster calling me that; it might be awkward, you see, if we should happen to meet some time upon the street. I like the little chap well enough, but you must teach him to keep his mouth shut when he comes near me."

"Who taught him the name?" sharply retorted Giulia. "Who boasted how bright and clever he was the first time he uttered the English word?"

"Your tongue is very sharp, Giulia," he said. "It would be more to your advantage to be upon good terms with me."

She made no reply, but, opening the door, passed out into the hall, he following her.

"As you will," he curtly said; then added, imperatively: "Come this way," and, leading her to the front door, he let her quietly out, glad to be rid of her before the butler or any of the other servants could learn of her presence in the house.

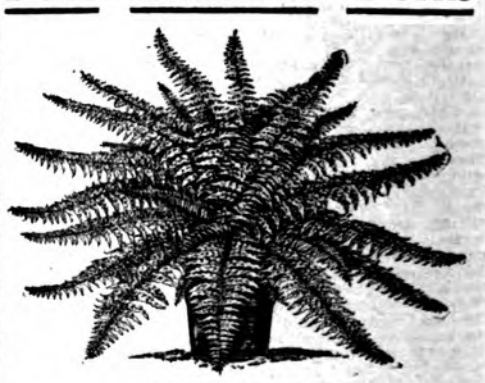
He watched her pass down the steps and out upon the street, then, softly closing the door, went back to the library.

He threw himself into a chair with a long-drawn sigh.

"I am afraid she means mischief," he muttered, with a frown. "I must get Edith away as soon as possible; I would not have them meet for anything. What a little vixen the girl is, curse her!"

He glanced at the clock.

It was five minutes to three, and twenty-five since he went up to Edith's room.



"It is about time she came down," he mused.

He arose and paced the room for a few moments, then passed out into the hall and listened.

The house was very still; he could not detect a sound anywhere.

Four Beautiful Ferns

PREMIUM NO. 6112

Given For Two Subscriptions

OF all indoor foliage plants, none give more lasting pleasure and satisfaction than these popular house ferns. They need but little care and live indefinitely, growing larger and more beautiful year by year. The collection offered you here comprise four of the largest, handsomest varieties ever grown for house culture. They are the Asparagus Plumosus or "Lace" fern, the Roosevelt, the Boston or "Fountain" fern and the Whitmani or "Ostrich plume" fern. They will thrive in any dwelling room near a window and require almost no attention except a little sprinkling of water now and then. These ferns are guaranteed to be absolutely free from all injurious insects or diseases which destroy foliage plants of this type, and they will be packed carefully and mailed to you by Parcel Post so that you will be sure to receive them in just as good condition as though they were fresh from the greenhouse. We are able to illustrate only one variety, "The Roosevelt," but remember you get all four ferns free on this offer.

Club Offer. For two one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 25 cents each, we will send you by Parcel Post prepaid the above described collection of four beautiful ferns each one of them a strong, healthy, well rooted plant ready to pot and guaranteed to grow and develop into a fine specimen beauty. Premium No. 6112.

Hay Making

JULY is the month in which most of the hay cut in the Northern states should be made. The first cuttings of clover and Alfalfa may come in June but timothy, redtop, prairie hay, the second cutting of Alfalfa, the late red clovers and alsike should all be harvested in July.

The Cutting Stage

In all hay making the "cutting stage," or the time of cutting, is important. At the proper cutting stage the hay has reached its highest amount of nutrients in their most digestible form and is filled with flavors and odors most attractive to stock. If cut too early the hay will be lacking in the amount of these desirable qualities, and if cut too late it will have lost some of its palatability and digestibility.

It is therefore important that the hay should be cut at the proper stage. Now what is the proper cutting stage?

WHEN TO CUT CLOVER.—Clover should be cut when in full bloom and before any of the blossoms have ripened and turned brown. It is at this time that it has reached its highest degree of excellence. It then contains a maximum amount of digestible protein, carbohydrates and fat and has the sweetest smell and the most attractive taste. If properly cured, clover cut at this stage makes the very finest quality of hay.

THE CUTTING STAGE OF ALFALFA.—Many farmers, having learned from experience the proper time to cut clover, assume that they can follow the same practise with Alfalfa. This is a serious mistake. If Alfalfa is let stand until in full bloom and then cut, the second and third crops will be spoiled though the hay itself may be of very fine quality. It is better, however, to sacrifice a little in quality than to ruin succeeding crops. Alfalfa should be cut as soon as the very first blossoms appear. The true guide to the cutting stage is the appearance of little sprouts at the base of the crown. As soon as the plant has reached a certain stage it puts out little sprouts or buds around the base of the plant. If the hay is cut immediately these sprouts begin to grow rapidly and soon a second crop is ready for harvest. If, however, the farmer waits until the plants have come into full bloom, these sprouts will have grown three or four inches long and their growing points will be cut off when the crop is cut. Or in other words, two crops will be harvested at one cutting. This is one of the reasons why so many farmers fail to get satisfactory returns after the first cutting.

THE TIME TO CUT MIXED HAY.—Timothy and red top should be cut just before or at the time of full bloom. Many farmers dislike to do this because they contend that the pollen of the blossom makes dusty hay. This is doubtless true, but this dust does not hurt the quality of the hay except for horses. If the pollen is objectionable, however, it is better to cut the hay just before the blossoming period and after it is fully headed out than it is to wait for the seeds to ripen. At this late stage the stems have become woody and indigestible, the hay has lost its fine flavor and odor and is neither rich nor palatable.

WILD HAY.—Coarse, wild prairie and marsh hay has very little feeding value if allowed to ripen and cure before being cut, as is often practised. It is then about as good for stock food as excelsior or hazel brush. It is a good filling but has little sustaining quality.

THE OTHER CLOVERS.—Alsike, like red clover, should be cut when in full bloom. With the crimson clovers, so common in the South, it is not only an unwise but a dangerous practise to allow any of the heads to ripen and turn brown before cutting. The ripe heads of this clover are covered with sharp prickles and form furry balls which may lodge in the digestive tracts of animals and cause trouble. For this reason such clovers should be cut very early, even before all blossoms have appeared.

Hay Curing

Much of the hay made in America is overcured. Over-curing reduces digestibility and decreases both agreeable odors and pleasant flavors. Cattle do not relish over-cured hay. It is less digestible, hence it takes more of this kind of hay for stock feeding.

Hay is likely to be over-cured because farmers fear to put green hay in the mow or stack. They say that green hay will mold or rot and spoil. If it doesn't it makes a very dusty hay. This is true. Too green hay will not keep in the mow. The fine art in hay curing comes in getting the hay cured "just enough." This point is reached when all of it has lost its bright green shade, is dry and tough, but never brittle. None of the leaves should be lost and the stems should not be dry enough to break. There should be no green portions in it, however. If hay in the right cutting stage is cut early in the morning as soon as the dew is off, on a bright, clear day, and is shaken up with a tedder about two hours later it should be pretty well cured by three or four o'clock in the afternoon. By proper management a farmer should be able to cut and haul in the same day. If hay must lie over night it should be freshly cut green hay. Dry hay, or partly dry hay, should never lie in the swath over night. Dew washes away the fine flavor and odor of freshly cured hay.

CURING CLOVER AND ALFALFA.—These hay crops are much more difficult to properly cure than timothy or red top or other grasses of the same class. It is now well known, however, that there is a constant stream of moisture flowing up through the stems of these plants and out through the leaves. This can be shown by covering any leafy growing plant with a tumbler. Moisture soon collects on the inside of the glass in little drops. Now this moisture is pumped up through the stem and out through the leaves by the action of the plant itself. It is this moisture that is in the plant at cutting time and which must be gotten rid of in hay making. Since there is so much more of this moisture in clover than in timothy it is much more difficult to make clover hay. It is pretty certain, however, that the plant continues to pump out this moisture even after it has been severed from the root. The sun does not dry the hay but the plant expels the moisture. All it needs, therefore, is to be let alone long enough and it will cure itself.

THE BEST WAY TO CURE CLOVER.—The best way to cure clover is to give it plenty of time to rid itself of this excessive moisture. This can best be done by cutting it after the dew is off and cocking it up immediately in small cocks. The outside layers will soon wilt and droop down so as to form a good protection in case of rain. Leave the hay in the cocks for a day or two to rid itself of its own water. Then in the morning of a bright day, as soon as the dew is off, go out in the field and turn these cocks upside down and spread them out a little. Drops of water will be seen all through the cock that the plants have forced out of themselves. When the sun and air get at these drops they soon disappear and if the hay is thoroughly wilted it is ready to be put into the mow. Alfalfa should be cured in the same way.

The Use of Hay Caps

As a further protection against rain, hay caps are often used in curing small quantities of both clover and alfalfa hay. For this purpose they are excellent but somewhat expensive, especially if large amounts are to be cured. By using good judgment in the handling of clover and alfalfa hay as already described, very satisfactory results can be secured without caps, however.

The Dairy Farmer's Ten Commandments

A recent writer on agriculture (Mr. Charles Christadoro) has issued what he calls "Ten Commandments for the Dairy Farmer." They are as follows:

1. Keep healthy cows.
2. Select and keep good producers.
3. Use only pure bred bulls.
4. Feed liberally.
5. Produce the feed.
6. Use the manure.
7. Keep the barn clean and well ventilated.
8. Keep the cows comfortable.
9. Be considerate to the cows.
10. Provide shade and wind protection.

These "commandments" are so good that they need no further comment. They speak for themselves.

Garden Suggestions for July

BLACKBERRIES AND RASPBERRIES.—Pinch back the young blackberry and raspberry canes to three feet in length. This will cause them to thicken up and store food for the next year's crop. On a small patch the pinching may be done with the fingers but if a large number of bushes is to be gone over it is much better to use a clipping shears for this purpose.

CUCUMBERS.—Cucumbers for pickling may be planted as late as July fourth. They will need very careful cultivation and close attention to protect them from "bugs," as already described in COMFORT'S Modern Farmer.

CURRANTS.—If currant worms are troublesome use hellebore instead of Paris green. The former is safe to use while the latter may result in severe poisoning if proper precautions are not taken. Currants may be prevented from ripening by shading. This is done by covering the bush with a piece of muslin or canvas. Where there is an abundance of fruit and a later picking it is often desirable to cover a portion of the currant patch thus insuring a later crop. Ripening may be delayed three or four weeks by this method.

TREE FRUIT.—Tree fruits should be thinned in July. This will insure a good growth of the very best specimens. The season is now so far advanced that the poorest fruits may be picked off, leaving only the best to come to maturity. The production of seed is much harder on the vitality of the tree than is the production of fruit. If two thirds of the seeds are picked off in thinning much more vitality will be left in the tree for the production of future crops. Besides, this increased strength and vigor of tree will produce much finer fruit during the present season.

LETTUCE.—Lettuce for late summer is better provided by picking the leaves of the plants for use, thus preventing them from going to seed, than by sowing the seed for new plants during July. Lettuce does not germinate well during hot weather. This plant requires a cool, moist soil for its best development. Best results can be expected by sowing in a cool, shady place, as on the north side of a building or between rows of trees or bushes. Lettuce can be held back by cutting off all the leaves about an inch above the crown when needed for the table.

MELONS AND SQUASHES.—These plants will need careful cultivation during this month. A close watch should be kept for bugs and tobacco dust used freely for both bugs and beetles. The squash bug should be picked off by hand and destroyed. The vine borer may be fought off by use of kerosene emulsion, prepared as described in a recent number of COMFORT'S Modern Farmer and diluted twenty times. While this is a little off the subject we may add that contrary to general belief squashes and melons do not mix, at least there is no reliable scientific evidence that they do.

Bug Poisons

Notwithstanding the war in Europe, the American bug continues to wage havoc on the farmer's crops. The price of Paris green, the old-fashioned potato bug remedy, has gone soaring but American made arsenate of lead is "just as good." Paris green contains about three times as much arsenic so that it is necessary to use three times as much arsenate of lead as is the custom with Paris green. Besides, arsenate of lead has several advantages over Paris green.

Its light color shows better on the green leaves, it sticks to the foliage better, does not blow off when the plants are dry and dissolves much better in water, hence does not need so much stirring when sprayed on.

Paris green and arsenate of lead are the standard remedies for all insects that eat the leaves, though white hellebore may be used with success for currant worms. Don't use these poisons for lice; they will do no good.

Lice Killers

The best remedy for lice is tobacco concoction, either made as explained last year in COMFORT'S Modern Farmer or purchased ready prepared on the general market.

If your local drug-store does not keep tobacco concoction in stock, and you do not care to go to the trouble of making it, you can always secure it direct from the seed houses. Dealers in seeds always carry garden tools, insect destroyers, fertilizers and the like for the accommodation of their customers. There are many other lice killer preparations on the market but the tobacco concoction is one of the very best.

Disease Destroyers

Like most other chemicals, those used for the destruction of plant diseases have gone skyward in price on account of the war. Germany is the chief source of our chemical supply and these chemicals are now exceedingly hard to get. The supply is short and the price is high. Blue vitriol, or copper sulphate, the chemical used in the making of Bordeaux mixture, is so high that it is doubtful whether or not it will pay the general run of farmers to spray potatoes for late blight this year.

Spraying Potatoes for Late Blight

The blight season is upon us, and it is certain that much damage will be done to our potato fields by this disease. This will mean, in all likelihood, a shortage of the crop, and consequently a high price. Of course there can be no certainty that this will happen, but if it does, the farmer with a good stock of potatoes will reap the benefit. Some farmers are willing to take a gambler's chance and pay the high prices for blue vitriol even if it does cost them five cents or more per bushel to spray for blight. While we do not advise all our readers to do this, we believe that those potato growers who are equipped with the best of spraying machinery, who have had experience with the manufacture and use of Bordeaux and who have promising potato fields, should take this chance and spray as usual for the control of late blight, even if the cost is high. In our judgment the chances are about three to one in their favor.

Utilizing New Feed

There is a great temptation to suddenly overfeed animals with new hay, new oats or new corn when the mow, granery or corn crib is again replenished. Men naturally are kind to animals, at least that can truly be said of the average farmer, and he only stints his stock when feed is scarce and high in price. He wishes to make speedy amends for the semi-starvation spell as soon as he can and so he overfeeds when feed again becomes plentiful. By so doing thousands of animals are killed annually upon the farms of the country.

The horse is the chief sufferer. Unless very regularly and carefully fed at all times, he is liable to an attack of colic and a severe attack or succession of attacks may result fatally. Horses cannot stand sudden changes of feed. All changes should be made gradually. New hay or oats may safely be used if fed in small quantities at first as a part ration with old hay and oats or other feed to which the horse has become accustomed.

The bowels should be carefully watched when changing the feed. The least derangement of the digestive organs is indicated by the manure. The passages become too soft, or "mushy" and bad smelling, or the feces come away in slimy, clay-colored balls. Whenever this is noticed, the new feed should be reduced at once for a time or altogether withheld if the horse is sick.

At threshing time we have seen horses tied at noon or night to the tail-board of a full wagon box of oats and allowed to eat their fill! Little wonder that horses so treated suffer from colic and founder and often prove a total loss. But the ill effects of new feed are not always so quickly apparent. The horse may escape an attack of colic or founder but suffer from sub-acute indigestion of a chronic type. The commonest symptom of such a condition is a change in the consistency and odor of the manure; then the horse either stops sweating when at work, has hot, dry skin and pants with distress, or sweats profusely and quickly "plays out."

The reasons for all this seem to be that all grains and forage plants have to go through a maturing process in the field, shock, mow or bin and the ferments present during the process cause derangement of the digestive organs. Knowing these things, owners of animals should be more careful to gradually accustom their horses to new feed.

Cows are not nearly so sensitive to changes of feed although cases of sudden disastrous bloating are not uncommon when cattle are first turned out on wet clover or alfalfa. They stand new hay and new oats with comparative impunity, but although this is the case, it is best with them, as with horses, to make the change to new feed gradually.

Thousands of hogs are killed each year by the sudden feeding of unlimited new, soft corn. So disastrous are the losses, that owners often conclude that cholera has broken out and caused the losses. That sometimes is the case, and the overfeeding of new corn is the exciting cause, for there can be no question that when the vitality and resistant powers of an animal are at low ebb, disease is most likely to successfully and fatally attack. It is as true that the perfectly healthy, robust pig may escape cholera when the disease is prevalent in a district while the weak ones and those living in an unsanitary environment are stricken and die.

It pays, therefore, to very gradually accustom hogs to new corn and especially to soft corn that has been nipped by frost. There is very little feeding value in such corn but much that is dangerous, so that if it must be fed, it should form but a small part of the ration in combination with other sound, nutritious feeds.

It pays, too, to go slow in making any change of feed for horses. We remember of an interesting case corroborative of this. Colic cases suddenly became common in a big city stable of transfer horses that had long been healthy. Investigation at length showed that the cause was the sudden feeding of Canadian oats which weighed well over 40 pounds to the bushel, whereas the oats to which the horses had for long been accustomed weighed little over 30 pounds per bushel. Either the lack of hull or excess of protein-rich grain in the heavy oats caused the trouble. Anyhow it promptly subsided when the allowance of heavy oats was correspondingly reduced in amount. We have known of similar outbreaks of colic, or other forms of indigestion, from the feeding of weevil infested grain or grain that had been heated in the bin and consequently become rusty or musty. Such "foxy" oats, as they sometimes have been termed, are especially liable to cause diabetes in horses. It is important, therefore, to feed sound grain as well as to be sure that it is thoroughly matured and cured.

Lift Corns out with Fingers

A few drops of Freezone loosen corns or calluses so they peel off

Apply a few drops of Freezone upon a tender, aching corn or a callus. The soreness stops and shortly the entire corn or callus loosens and can be lifted off without a twinge of pain.

Freezone removes hard corns, soft corns, also corns between the toes and hardened calluses. Freezone does not irritate the surrounding skin. You feel no pain when applying it or afterward.

Women! Keep a tiny bottle of Freezone on your dresser and never let a corn ache twice.

Small bottles can be had at any drug store in the United States or Canada.

Summer Pruning of Fruit Trees

It is generally supposed that the pruning of fruit trees must be done during the winter and early spring months; in fact, such is the common practise, but there is no good reason why they may not be pruned during the summer-time. The Kansas, Virginia and Utah experiment stations have recently published results of their experimental work on summer pruning. These bulletins contain the information that it makes very little difference whether pruning is practised in winter or summer.

SOME ADVANTAGES OF PRUNING IN THE SUMMER-TIME.—The young shoots, especially the water sprouts, are young and tender and much easier to remove. They should be cut close to the main branch so that the wound will heal over. This it will do rapidly if the pruning is done before the growing season is ended. It may also happen that the labor supply can be employed in slack time during the summer season, or the pruning be done in connection with the thinning of fruit.

SOME OF THE DISADVANTAGES.—During the dormant period the limbs are bare of leaves and the branches to be pruned away may be more readily located. In the dormant period less injury is likely to result from pruning. Too early pruning in the spring after the sap has started may weaken the tree by robbing it of its regular food supply. On the whole the results of experiments indicate that while not necessary it is safer and better in the long run to prune during the dormant period than to attempt summer pruning. However, our readers should remember that summer pruning may be practised with success if conditions are such that they would prefer to prune at this time. Late summer pruning will be better than pruning earlier in the season.

The Questions and Answers constitute one of the most valuable features of this department and we urge our farmer subscribers to read all of them carefully each month, as you will find that they contain much useful information and advice on practical problems that are troubling you as well as those who have asked the questions. Cut them out and paste them into a scrapbook for future reference. This will save you the trouble of writing us and will avoid delay in getting your answer when you need advice on these same matters. We are glad to receive inquiries from our subscribers and to advise them on all matters pertaining to farming.

MELLOWING CLAY SOIL.—I have plowed my back yard for a garden, but the soil is so much like clay it cakes up hard after every rain. I had it plowed a few days ago and now it has dried hard in lumps from the size of a marble to as big as my head. Can you tell me what to do or what to add to it to lighten it so I can raise a garden? I have already dressed it well with barn manure. MRS. E. G., Terryville, Conn.

Forecasts for Mid-Summer Fashions

By Geneva Gladding

PERHAPS this is a fitting time to read "Near to Nature's Heart," at any rate there is a great call to go "back to nature," to dig, sow, weed and get the fill of the earth. If our menfolks are called to the colors, the women must do the ploughing and garden work, and must needs have comfortable, suitable garments for such work. With this in view, we wish to present a practical garden suit good for khaki, gingham, drill, linen, jersey or serge. The call for outdoors is urgent and sports models are in great demand, with a comfortable skirt and a smart middy a woman will be well-dressed these summer days.

ALL PATTERNS 10c. EACH
Unless Other Price Is Stated.

Pattern Descriptions

2124—A Practical Work Suit for Women. This style is excellent for outdoor work in the garden, is popular also as an indoor work dress, since it affords comfort and ease in movement. The blouse may be made with or without the collar, and the sleeve in wrist or elbow length. Gingham, drill, jean, linen, poplin, repp, or alpaca, are good for this style.

Cut in four sizes; small (32-34 bust measure), medium (36-38), large (40-42), extra large (44-46). Size medium will require six and one quarter yards of 36-inch material.

Cut in six sizes; 34, 36, 38, 40, 42 and 44 inches bust measure. It requires five and one eighth yards of 44-inch material for a 36-inch size.

2080—A Pretty "Party" or "Best" Dress. One could make this of dimity or dotted Swiss, or lawn or batiste. It is also nice for crepe and albatross, wash silk, challie and lawn. Flouncing or bordered goods could also be used for this model.

Cut in four sizes; one, two, three and four years. It requires two and seven eighths yards of 27-inch material for a four-year size.

Cut in seven sizes; 34, 36, 38, 40, 42, 44 and 46 inches bust measure. It requires three yards of 36-inch material for a 38-inch size.

2099—Mother's Girl's Favorite Play Dress. How simple, easy and comfortable, and how quickly made. There is the underarm seam, the back seam or closing (as you may prefer it), and the neck and shoulder finish—a simple hem, the belt stitched to position, and the dress is done.

Cut in four sizes; two, four, six and eight years. It requires one and seven eighths yard of 27-inch material for a six-year size.

1909—A New Coat Dress for Misses and Small Women. Jaunty shaped cuffs and pockets, and a smart sailor collar complete a very stylish effect. Added to that is the fact that this model is comfortable and practical.

Cut in four sizes; 14, 16, 18 and 20 years. Size 16 requires six yards of 44-inch material.

2085—A Smart and Popular Model. This design is especially attractive in wash fabrics, but will also develop nicely in silk, serge, gabardine and other woolen fabrics. It is made in "jumper" style, with closing on the shoulders.

Cut in four sizes; six, eight, 10 and 12 years. It requires two yards for the guimpe and three yards for the dress, for a six-year size, in 27-inch material.

Cut in six sizes; 34, 36, 38, 40, 42 and 44 inches bust measure. It requires three yards for the guimpe and five and five eighths yards for the dress, of 36-inch material, for a 36-inch size.

1670—A Pretty Summer Gown. Costume with sleeve in either of two lengths (for Misses and small women). Embroidered voile and insertion are combined. The model is most unique and attractive, and embodies some excellent style features.

Cut in three sizes; 16, 18 and 20 years. It requires five and one half yards of 36-inch material for an 18-year size.

Cut in three sizes; 16, 18 and 20 years. It requires five and three quarters yards of 44-inch material for an 18-year size.

2084—A Good Dress for Mother's Girl. These one-piece dresses are so easy to make, easy to launder and so comfortable and practical.

Cut in five sizes; four, six, eight, 10 and 12 years. Size eight will require three and one quarter yards of 44-inch material.

2022—Ladies' Apron. Checked or striped gingham is nice for this model, but percale, satteen, brilliantine, lawn, drill and denim are also desirable.

Cut in four sizes; small, medium, large and extra large. It requires for a medium size four and three eighths yards of 36-inch material.

2086—A Dainty Dress for Mother's Girl. This design is simple and charming. The waist is in Empire fashion and finished with tab extensions which may serve to hold a smart sash or girdle. The sleeve may be finished in wrist or elbow length.

Cut in four sizes; two, four, six and eight years. It requires two and three eighths yards of 44-inch material for a four-year size.

2050—Girl's One-Piece Dress, with Bloomers. This design is good for chambray, gingham, linen, linene, drill, percale and lawn. It may also be developed in serge and gabardine. The bloomers may be of the same material as the dress or of sateen, drill, serge, galatea, or gingham.

Cut in five sizes; two, four, six, eight and 10 years. It requires three and one half yards of 27-inch material for the dress and two yards for the bloomers, for a six-year size.

2115—A Splendid "Cover All" Style. This apron may serve very well as a house dress, and with the "cool" neck and sleeve, is especially attractive for warm weather. The pattern is nice for chambray, gingham, linen, drill, percale, alpaca, jean or satteen.

Cut in four sizes; small, medium, large and extra large. Size medium will require five and three quarters yards of 36-inch material.

2083—A Practical Under Garment. This model combines a comfortable brassiere and drawers. It is suitable for cambric, muslin, lawn, satin, silk and nainsook. The brassiere may be of drill or jean and may be boned like any corset.

Cut in seven sizes; 34, 36, 38, 40, 42, 44 and 46 inches bust measure. It requires three and one half yards of 36-inch material for a 36-inch size.

2089—A Charming Negligee. Crepe, lawn, percale, albatross, cashmere, silk and satin are nice for this model.

Cut in four sizes; small, medium, large and extra large. It requires six and one quarter yards of 44-inch material for a medium size.

2094—Some Attractive Collars and a Smart Pair of Cuffs. One can develop these styles in any of the pretty materials of the season. They are nice for wear over a waist or dress.

The pattern includes all styles illustrated and is cut in three sizes; small, medium and large. No. 1 will require one half yard, No. 2 collar, five eighths yard, cuff No. 2, three eighths yard and collar No. 3, five eighths yard of 27-inch material for a small size.

2081—Ladies' House Dress with Sleeve in either of two lengths. The model is good for linen, chambrey, gingham, seersucker, lawn, voile, repp and poplin.

Cut in seven sizes; 34, 36, 38, 40, 42, 44 and 46 inches bust measure. It requires six and three quarters yards of 36-inch material for a 36-inch size.

Cut in seven sizes; 34, 36, 38, 40, 42, 44 and 46 inches bust measure. Size 38 requires five and one quarter yards of 27-inch material.

2097—A Smart, New Waist. Georgette crepe, crepe de chine, foulard, batiste, lawn, voile, linen and madras are nice for this style. The fronts may be tucked or gathered.

Cut in seven sizes; 34, 36, 38, 40, 42, 44 and 46 inches bust measure. It requires three and one eighth yards of 36-inch material for a 36-inch size.

Cut in seven sizes; 34, 36, 38, 40, 42, 44 and 46 inches bust measure. It requires six and one half yards of 36-inch material for a 36-inch size.

2108—A Comfortable Play or Beach Suit for Small Boys. Gingham, drill, serge, linen, chambray, poplin, repp and galatea are nice for this style. The closing is at the side.

Cut in four sizes; two, three, four and five years. It requires two and one quarter yards of 36-inch material for a three-year size.

Cut in four sizes; small, medium, large and extra large. It requires five and one half yards of 36-inch material for a medium size.

2076—A Unique and Attractive Skirt Style. This is fine for satin, serge, mannish mixtures, Jersey cloth, poplin, voile, linen, repp, corduroy, taffeta, foulard, shantung, gingham and chambrey.

Cut in seven sizes; 22, 24, 26, 28, 30, 32 and 34 inches waist measure. It requires three and three eighths yards of 44-inch material for a 24-inch size.

Yarding the Fowl Increases Egg Production

IT is difficult to make farm people understand that fowls are better off kept in yards; in fact, that they must be so restrained if the highest egg records are to be reached. In way-back times, it was considered a detriment to yard fowls, but for some years past professional poultry keepers have yarded their fowls, because they found it was the only way to reach the top notch. Even now, the general farmers cling to the free range idea, and I am convinced that it is not purely because they consider it necessary, but it saves feed and other bother. It has been estimated that a flock of common dunghill hens, such as are seen on the average farm, lay in a year less than a hundred eggs each. The figures are eighty to ninety. Farmers who have become breeders, and who thus give the hen decidedly more consideration, and still adhere to the free-range system, have increased this yield to one hundred and fifty and better. Breeders who are following the strictly up-to-date methods and have yarded their layers, have obtained an average of one hundred and seventy-five eggs, and some have even reached the two hundred mark.

Please note that I say fowls or hens, and I do not mean this to include growing chicks. The line must be distinctly drawn between the two. The range cannot be too extended for growing stock. What we strive for in growing stock is frame, on which later we intend to put flesh. This frame can only be built by food, and plenty of it, converted into bone and muscle by exercise. After the chick has made the frame, we can safely yard her and put on the flesh, and thus convert her into a money-earning machine.

The advantages gained by yarding stock are manifold. First of all, by confining stock to a certain space, we are sure they eat the food provided, and in the quantity we mean them to have. Feeding layers to produce eggs is becoming every year a more delicate operation. Formula after formula is tried by different breeders, as an experiment, with the hope of increasing the egg yield. If we can force each hen to lay ten eggs a year more, it means a considerable increase in the total of the flock, and a better return in dollars and cents to the breeder. Yarding stock is a means to this end. The food fed is converted, as we mean it to be, into eggs, and not into muscle. It is decidedly more troublesome to care for stock in this way, and necessitates additional labor and expense, but we are looking for the increase all the time, and are thus continually hoping to be compensated for the extra trouble.

Fowls in yards must be supplied with everything they require, which means all they would naturally seek if running at large. This includes, besides the grain we feed by formula, green food, meat, a scratching place and dusting spot, and grit and water. Of all these I consider green food the most necessary, and the one thing to be impressed upon the mind, because it is the one thing too often forgotten. The ideal yarding of fowls is what is known as double yarding—a house in the middle and a yard on each side. These yards can be sown with rye or oats, and alternated so that the fowls will have a constant green run as long as the rye or oats will grow, which is until frost. Failing the double yard system, green food may be supplied by lawn clippings, whole cabbage, mangel wurzels, turnips, or any vegetable.

Meat can be fed in a variety of ways. Turning up the ground of the yards with a cultivator, or by shallow plowing, will bring the worms and bugs within reach, or sheep heads cut open and fed raw can be thrown in, and this is an ideal meat feed. Ground beef scraps softened may be mixed in mash—and last, and probably the best, cut green bone.

Yarded fowls need exercise. It must not be understood that because they are confined they do not get exercise, or as much as if let run at large. The yards should be at least one hundred and fifty feet long, if they are the width of the average coop, which is ten or twelve feet. Some breeds are decidedly more active by nature than others; for instance, the Leghorns as compared with the Cochins or Brahmas. This does not affect the health of the fowls particularly. A Leghorn is no healthier because of her activity than a Cochin is. It is simply the difference in their natures, but because of this excess of activity of one breed over another, the one must have more room than the other. The Leghorn stands the confinement of a small coop ten by twelve feet in winter, provided she can be kept actively hunting for her food; but the same bird would mope and become out of condition if confined too long in an exhibition coop in a showroom. On the other hand, a Cochin, being of a lazier nature, forages slowly, and wanders quietly over her yard, takes things easy in the winter coop, and stands the confinement of the exhibition coop excellently.

The foraging nature of any breed can be killed by excessive feeding. Even birds with free range, if overfed at special meal hours, will take but limited exercise, exactly as those treated the same way and yarded. Exercise is induced by short feeding. In other words, no laying strain should be fed all they can eat except at night. Hunger induces exercise, whether a fowl be let run or yarded. Therefore, fowls fed short and induced to hunt for more, will lay eggs, while those overfed, in the morning especially, will sit around moping in the sun, and convert the food into flesh instead of eggs.

Another advantage of yarding fowls is the certainty of finding all the eggs laid every day, and then being able to guarantee them as strictly fresh. This is a point of great importance, and constitutes the difference between eggs produced by an up-to-date breeder with yarded fowls, and those sold by the "honest" farmer who collects them every day, and cannot swear that they were laid today—not two weeks ago.

It is strange that few people except the real poultry farmers realize that July is one of the most important months in the year. The desire to have eggs in zero weather invariably compels good attention to hens during the winter. Baby chicks arouse interest in the spring, but as the weather gets warmer, eggs are plentiful, and the pretty, fluffy babies, developed into long, lanky creatures, who seem nothing but a nuisance specially ordained to destroy the garden, so the poor things are shut up in small quarters and wofully neglected. During the fall and winter I am repeatedly asked how to make pullets and hens lay, but I can rarely suggest a remedy, because nine times out of ten it is the result of blunders made the preceding summer.

If poultry is to be profitable, the old and young stock must have been kept apart, because it is impossible to feed correctly when they are all together. Young birds need plenty of nutritious food to push them along quickly, and laying hens must be put on special rations to bring about early moulting, which is the foundation of a good winter supply of eggs.

Moulting

About July 5th commence to cut down the feed gradually, until at the end of two weeks forty hens are having a pint of oats and a pint of wheat mixed, night and morning. Scatter it amongst cut straw or some litter, so they will have to scratch for every grain. The first of August commence to increase the rations, and keep it up for a week, so that by the fifteenth they are getting two quarts of mash in the morning, a quart of meat scraps and a pint of cracked corn at noon, and wheat and oats or barley at night. Give them just about all they will eat up clean in fifteen minutes. The morning mash should be composed of two parts ground feed (corn and oats), one part white middlings and one part oilmeal, mixed with scalding milk or water. The semi-starvation followed by the heavy feed forces the moulting season and allows plenty of time to feather out and get into condition before October, when their rations should be made up of the essentials for egg-production, which are clover hay, bran, wheat, corn and animal food.

You see, it takes about three months for hens to get rid of their old feathers and put on a new coat, and if the process is not forced in some way, they will not commence before August, which would make it October before they finished. Of course that would be time enough if it happened to be a warm, late fall, but if cold weather sets in, as it often does in November, hens would not lay before spring, as moulting leaves them in a more or less debilitated condition.

Lots of people make the mistake of selling off hens as soon as they cease laying at this season, which means that they are usually parting with the birds that would make the real winter layers. Hens that lay through the summer and do not cease until the fall will be idle and unprofitable in the winter. It is the general disregard of the moulting period which causes so many failures in the winter supply of eggs. The rule should be to sell off all the hens that have been laying steadily through the summer and commenced to shed feathers in September. Growing feathers is a trying ordeal, and the consequence is that when the hen begins to moult she ceases to lay, for she cannot produce eggs and feathers at the same time.

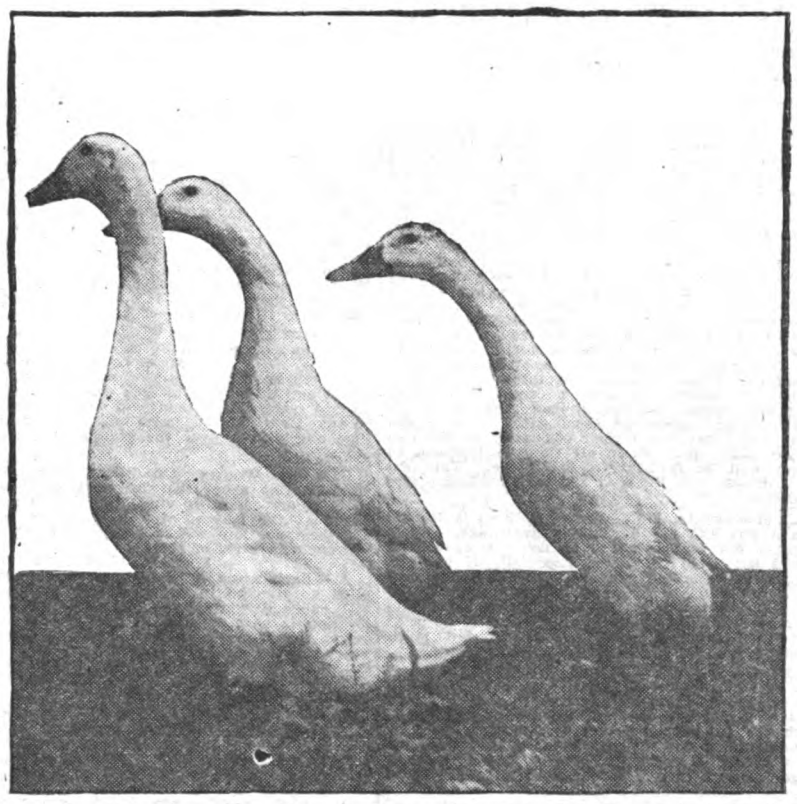
Feathers are composed largely of nitrogen and mineral matter. That is why the food at moulting time has to be so very nutritious. To feed nothing but corn at such a time is simply waste, as the hen cannot produce new feathers from such a diet. If she is on free range she would have a better chance of gathering the necessary material, but even then, if the feathering process is delayed too long, the hen becomes exhausted, and is susceptible to cold and all sorts of diseases. This is the real reason why roup and swelled head are so prevalent in the fall.

Young birds hatched out in April or thereabouts, usually commence to lay in November, because they have not been subject to the drain upon the constitution caused by moulting. But chickens that have been hatched in February or early March are very liable to moult late in the fall, just when they should be commencing to lay. For this reason it is as well to market all the first hatched chickens, and hold over those hatched late in March or through April, to increase the laying flock.

Cull all young stock down closely. Don't keep a lot of young cockerels to eat up the profits during the winter. Even pullets which are at all backward should be marketed, for they won't develop after cold weather sets in, and it does not pay to keep them for summer layers. Most of the failures made in the poultry business are due to people not having the courage to clean out unproductive birds. Just calculate how many quarts of feed ten growing birds will eat in seven months, and I think you will be convinced that it is unfair to expect the flock to support them and still show a profit. The trouble is that people don't realize that young stock stand still as soon as cold weather starts, remaining almost stationary until spring. Another evil of keeping undeveloped stock is that they occupy house room and crowd the older birds.

Before I forget it, let me remind you not to feed new corn to the fowls. Every year, about this season, I get quantities of letters telling of good, fat hens, the picture of health, which have been found dead. Acute indigestion, brought on by eating unseasoned corn, is the cause. So be careful. If your last year's supply has run out, it is better to buy a few bags than lose hens on whom you depend for winter eggs.

Have you made any provision for supplying the hens with green food this winter? Remember, your egg basket will suffer if you don't have a bountiful supply, so it behooves you to give the matter immediate attention. If you don't get eggs in the winter, you can't make money out of your fowls. Sprouted oats are the best green food in the winter, because they can be grown in the house. There are several sprout cabinets (as they are called) on the market, which are well worth the price, which ranges from five to fifteen dollars; but there are plenty of people who don't want to spend five dollars, so I am going to tell you about a home-made cabinet which cost only two dollars.



Get a case from the village store, five feet long, two feet wide and two feet deep. Line this with zinc at the front end, running the zinc up to about fifteen inches. Then set the box up on end, making what had been the top the front, and from loose boards make a top to fit it. Then get eight pairs of iron shelf brackets from a five and ten cent store, and put the first set of four brackets, two on each side of the cabinet, six inches from the bottom, and the other two sets nine inches above. Make legs nine inches high, to lift the bottom of the cabinet from the floor, cut a hole four inches square in the center of the bottom, to permit the chimney of a lamp to go through and strike on the bottom of the first tray, which rests on the first set of brackets. This tray must be made at a plumber's shop, but it won't cost more than seventy-five cents. The three other trays can be made of light wood. The strips of wood at the bottom of the trays must be left open, and a piece of burlap tacked over to prevent the oats from falling through.

A brooder lamp which has a tin chimney is the best to use, so there is no fear of smashing. When in use, after the chimney has been pushed through the hole in the bottom of the cabinet, a block of wood must be put under the lamp, to raise it high enough to hold it firmly in place and bring the top of the chimney to within an inch of the zinc tray, which is kept filled with water. The oats are put into pails of warm water the night before the trays are to be filled, and then spread two inches deep in each tray.

I almost forgot to explain that there was another hole two inches square in the center of the top of the cabinet, which was covered with flannel, to act as a ventilator. When the door of the cabinet was closed and the lamp lighted, the heat kept the water in the zinc pan steaming slightly, and insured a moist, warm temperature throughout the cabinet.

The three oat trays were made about an inch smaller than the inside of the cabinet, to permit the moist air to circulate all round them. Naturally, the bottom tray getting the most heat, is the first lot of oats to develop sufficiently to feed, and at that point it can be removed, and the trays dropped down so that the second and third trays are at the bottom, and what was at the bottom is at the top.

The oats are ready to feed when from two to five inches high. Just cut a sod—roots and all, of course—and feed to the hens at noon—the improvement in the egg yield will surprise you. A sod six inches square is enough for twenty-five hens. Divide it into small pieces before feeding, so that they are all sure to get a fair share. Don't neglect roosters, for a good percentage of sprouted oats in their rations insures fertile eggs, which will mean good hatches when the incubators and broody hens get busy.

F. T. D.—I am inclined to believe that the people who sold you the turkeys told you the truth, and that the hen's eye had been accidentally injured, for if it was the result of disease, she would not eat and seem bright, for turkeys mope the moment they are sick. Continue to press out any pus that may form, and bathe with a solution of boric acid. It seems a pity to kill her. Let her lay out her next clutch of eggs, and when she gets broody, set her in some dark coop. The enforced rest will in all probability work a permanent cure. The Leghorn pullet was the victim of egg cramp. What is commonly known as egg cramp is frequently met among immature stock that has been forced along with a view to early egg production. In the case of cramp or paralysis the affected birds lose the use of their legs and squat about the ground. There is no doubt that the ailment results from the resistance of the walls of the undistended oviduct to the passage of the first egg produced. Not only are immature pullets liable to suffer with egg cramp, but the fully developed birds are equally liable to contract the ailment if the walls of the oviducts are coated with fat, the result of erratic feeding. Anything that causes great pressure on the walls of the oviduct is liable to cause paralysis. So pullets should be carefully fed with a view to perfect maturity before they are placed in the laying quarters. What is required in the pullet intended for egg production is a well developed frame padded with hard muscular flesh. Such features can be obtained only by rational feeding and exercise, and the bird possessing them will enter the laying quarters well fitted to pass through the initial laying stage with safety. All that can be done for a fowl suffering with egg cramp is to keep her perfectly quiet, and to dose her with Castor oil with the object of clearing her system. The success of the treatment depends upon its timely application when the bird is first attacked. If the bird is left to recover as best she can, Nature may right herself for a time only, and other and more serious attacks may follow, owing to the debilitation of the nerves surrounding the oviduct. It is very doubtful whether fowls affected with the ailment are worth retaining, where egg production is the main consideration, as birds calculated to render a profitable account of themselves as layers must steer clear of any ailment likely to debilitate the egg organs. The best remedy for egg cramp or paralysis undoubtedly lies in its prevention.

C. A. S.—This is another case of trouble with the egg organs. It often happens that when a good layer who is being heavily fed reaches the end of the laying period, she will continue to produce a few very small eggs, which are merely shells covering a small portion of albumen. Such eggs have never been attached to the ovary, and are only the result of excessive activity of the organs, which will return to normal production after a period of rest; but as this hen has never laid a normal egg, she must lack the natural egg producing organs, and so the case is incurable.

E. F.—Pip usually develops after an attack of roup, bronchitis or pneumonia, and is caused by a feverish breath passing over the bird's tongue. After removing the hard scale or pip, anoint the tongue with honey and borax or glycerine. Keep the bird as quiet as possible, and give only soft food for a few days. For two mornings make pills of moistened bread and twenty grains of Epsom Salts, and feed whilst fasting. Pheasants are almost as easy as chickens to raise. Yards must be entirely closed over the top as well as the sides, with wire netting; but they require no house nor coop; nothing but a shelter over the roosts, as they are healthier when they sleep in the open, and don't need nest boxes, and prefer to lay in a pile of brush, which should be placed in the corners of the yard. A mixture of small grains should be left before them at all times, as they never overeat, but it must be kept in a model self feeder, to prevent it from becoming scattered or becoming damp. As pheasants soon sicken if they get any moudly grain. The best plan is to steal the eggs, and set them under bantams or small hens. Incubation takes from twenty-five to twenty-six days. If you look through the advertising columns of COMFORT, you will find the addresses of breeders of pheasants.

B. H.—The turkey hen must have some malformation or lack of egg organs as C. A. S. wrote about. Read answer to her in this issue. You will understand that the turkey will never be of any use for breeding. Don't give the young turkeys anything to eat for thirty-six hours after they are hatched, then put a dish of real sour milk before them, and nothing else for two days. If they were hatched by a common hen, they will not wander so far, nor will she hunt food for them, as a turkey hen does, so they will have to be fed lightly. Give them the curds from sour milk, mixed with finely chopped green onion tops, until they are two weeks old. After that, add a little cracked wheat at night, and continue to supply all the sour milk and curd they will eat. If the weather is damp and chilly, add one fourth of a teaspoonful of powdered ginger to half a pint of curds.

E. L. F.—You don't say how you feed your young chicks, and if they are being raised in a brooder or with hens, so it is almost impossible to guess what the trouble is. If you feed cracked corn, it should be passed through a sieve which will let nothing pass larger than Kafir corn. Lots of chicks are killed by swallowing a piece of cracked corn too large to pass into the crop. If the chicks are confined, you must supply fine, sharp grit, green vegetable and animal food.

M. T.—Scaly legs are caused by small parasites which bore under the skin of the feet and shanks. Clean the perches and paint them with sheep dip or kerosene oil early in the morning, so that they will have plenty of time to dry before the birds go to roost. Fill a two-quart pail with warm, soapy water. Hold the bird's feet and shanks in it for a few

COMFORT'S New Tatting Book

Premium No. 8031.

Handsomely Illustrated With Over Half a Hundred of the Newest Prettiest Designs With Full Directions for Working.

THIS is COMFORT'S own tatting book—published by COMFORT—every design in it by a COMFORT worker—beautifully illustrated and containing full working directions as well as explaining by word and picture just how tatting is done—the various positions of the hands and the different movements used in making the stitches. These instructions are so plain, simple and easily understood that the beginner can readily master them and soon become an expert worker. There are sixty-one illustrations in all and the designs range from the simplest edgings and insertions to the handsome designs worked with two threads. Included among them are ring, star, shamrock, pointed, half wheel, and whole wheel edgings; clover leaf beadings, edgings and insertions; two color insertions, two thread beadings, clover leaf scallop, round medallions, boudoir cap, doily, pointed medallion, trimmed waist, collar corners, medallion trimmed corset cover, tatting applique, and tatted silk bonnets, net collar with tatting applique, medallion edged centerpiece, pillow covers, primrose hand bag, chemise or nightgown yoke, Vandyke point sideboard cover and dresser scarfs. Each design is illustrated by a fine, large photograph of the finished work which shows every thread and stitch so plainly that directions seem hardly necessary—one could almost make the various pretty things going by the pictures alone.

Remember that this book is totally unlike any other tatting book ever sold or offered as a premium—the designs being the work of COMFORT'S own subscribers are of course different from all others and—as we think—much prettier than any ever yet published. While most tatting books show only about fifteen or twenty designs and ordinary ones at that, this new book contains fifty-six, all different, beautifully illustrated by genuine photographs, with full working directions as well as a whole page of instructions on how to do tatting—instructions that should enable any inexperienced woman or girl to become an expert worker after a very few trials.

We will send you this tatting book free if you will accept either one of the following special offers:

Conducted by Cousin Marion

In order that each cousin may be answered in this column, no cousin must ask more than three questions in one Month.

WELL, well, July is here and you, my dears, have had the whole month of roses to be summer girls in and I just wonder how many of you have neglected your opportunities. Not many, I am sure, because the S. G's. are the ones who have the most questions to ask about beaus and there is an awfully big pile of letters on my desk. What the questions will be about, goodness knows, but there'll be plenty of heart throbs in them I'll bet a cookie, whether it is summer-time troubles or not. That's all I have to say and I'll get after that pile.

The first one I open is from Unhappy, away up North at Fairbanks, Alaska, where the Summer Girl hasn't much time between frosts, and she is unhappy because her parents wouldn't let her answer a certain young man's letter and he has gone somewhere and she can't find him, now that her parents say she may write. They tell her not to worry, because if he thinks very much of her he will find her, which is true enough in a way, but as they were just becoming interested in each other, maybe her silence will prevent his writing again. She wants to know if she should try to find him, or just wait, and I advise that she help him to find her. She is to blame for losing him, if anybody is, except her parents.

Black Eyes, Little Rock, Ark.—If your adopted parents "is able" to send you to school, why don't they do it? Ask your teacher if you don't get my meaning. But I won't scold you, this time, for you need a mother's love and advice (with special emphasis on the advice) more than anything else. Don't let that precious adopted brother of yours fool you with any more of his brother-and-sister talk. Real brothers keep their sisters from doing anything wrong, or try to. Refuse to go with any boy unless he behaves himself and tell him your reasons if he wants to know. He will respect you more for it and you will have more respect for yourself. Ask your mother that question about your health you asked me and study your lessons more than ever. Tell Joe that he must stop "imposing on you" or you will tell your adopted mother, and if he still persists you should go to her with your complaint.

Broken-hearted, Alliance, Fla.—Is it any reason to think he doesn't care for you because he has joined the army? Your common sense should teach you better. It is the most natural thing in the world for any real man to want to go to war when his country needs him. You should be proud of him for being patriotic and ready to make such a sacrifice. I am receiving many letters from girls who seem puzzled to know why their lovers should have volunteered for the defence of their country. "Would he have enlisted if he had loved me as he pretends?" they ask. Of course he would. Patriotic men have always been ready when their country called. Mothers, wives and sweethearts will suffer many a heartache, but will be proud to possess such men. Wouldn't you rather have the love of a manly man who has the courage and health to go and fight for his country's honor, than to possess the love of some skulking coward? War is an awful thing and it is hard on those of us who have to remain at home and think of our dear ones who are fighting to keep a cruel enemy from ravaging our homes, but we women must be brave and patriotic and encourage them with our love and sympathy and never doubt their constancy or love because they place duty above all things. Faithful to duty they will be faithful in their love. This answers "Troubled," O. P., Ky., and others whose lovers have enlisted.

M. L., Mooresville, Mo.—Whenever there is trouble between a girl and her parents or guardians, over a young man, the best thing to be done is to wait a while and not force the issue. Especially if the girl is under twenty-one, as you are. If the young man is the right kind, he will be willing to wait, for he can see that marriage has enough risk in it anyway not to make a bad start when there is no need of it. No harm can come of waiting, but much harm might come of being in too great a hurry.

Blue Eyes, Fay, Tenn.—You might drop him a postal and ask if he had received a letter from you, written about Christmas time. Just ask him that in a purely business tone and say no more. Give him that much of a chance to be polite. (2) Of course, engaged couples may kiss, but whether he should do the kissing, or she should, is not, I believe definitely settled. I suppose it is a matter of choice, each doing equal duty.

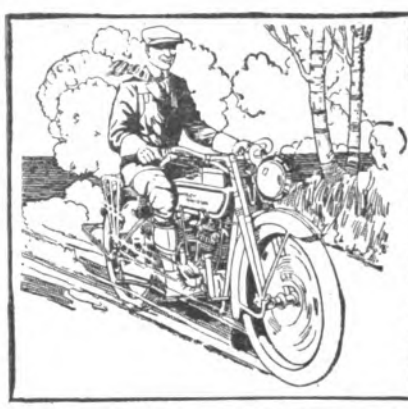
M. M. C., Clarkton, Va.—Don't be disturbed over the picture of the New York millionaire you saw in the paper and don't write to the millionaire enclosing your photograph. New York millionaires have so many beautiful show girls in Broadway whom they can flirt with at a minute's notice, that they pay no attention at all to country girls who send them their photographs. What he would do with your photograph and "mash" letter would be to show them to the show girls and they would laugh themselves into fits over your silliness.

Blue Eyes, Rocky Point, N. C.—A girl eighteen years old should be allowed to have the company of nice young men, and parents who think otherwise make a mistake that they are sometimes very, very sorry for. It is the natural thing for her to do and as she will meet them anyhow, her parents should help her select the right kind. And they shouldn't watch her all the time, either, or send somebody along with her to watch her, if she ever does go anywhere with one. Such parents are more to blame than the girl is, if trouble comes. (2) A lady and gentleman may go autoing very properly, even if they do not stay wholly on the public roads. (3) There is no harm in sensible dancing, round or square, but a preacher should indulge in very little of it, if at all, as it is not quite in tone with his sacred calling, however harmless it may be.

Black Eyes, Summerfield, Okla.—You are not helping matters any by meeting young men as your parents will not let you have company, and you will be sure to be sorry before you are through with it. A better way is to make the best of unkind parents and abusive brothers until you have prepared yourself to make your own living properly, and then leave them all and be honorably independent. Only the foolish girls or the naturally bad ones, go away from home without any preparation to make an honest living. By and by the nice young man you like and who likes you, will be ready to let you make his home for him and you will live happily ever after.

Perplexed, Mocasin, Mont.—If you are a wise girl you will break your engagement with this young man who writes warm letters to you from college and freeezs you when he sees you, and only kisses your hand. Just think what it would be to live with a man like that all your life. Tell him that a boy in school has something else to think about besides getting married and you don't intend to handicap him. Tell him that and stick to it. If he ever talks warm, you can listen to him about making a new engagement, unless you are otherwise engaged by that time. (2) Accepting the attention of other men depends upon whether your fiance does not object.

Country Girl, Albuquerque, N. M.—If you do not love him enough to know whether you do or not, don't marry him, because you may find out when too late that you do not.



Troubled Girl, Mt. Olive, Miss.—As you are two years older than he is, and he has doubts whether to marry you and stay at home, or to become a missionary and go to foreign parts to save the souls of heathen, you should assume the superiority of age and tell him by all means to save the heathen. You are no heathen and do not need him, half as much as the heathen do.

Blue Eyes, Center Ridge, Ark.—You say, "I am sixteen years old and am going with a gentleman whom is twenty-three," and I say, don't you think a sixteen-year-old girl like you should be going with her grammar instead of a gentleman "whom is twenty-three?" Think it over and let me know.

Unwhipt, Greenville, Ky.—If a girl is young enough to be whipped by her mother for accepting the company of young men she is young enough to wait until she is too old to be whipped. In the mean time, when young men ask to go home with you, tell them you'll be whipped by your mother if they do and they will let you alone and seek some other lady for a mother-in-law and your mother will change her mind. By then, you will be old enough to have company.

There, my dears, your questions are answered, except such as were not worth answering and those which were not in my line and had to go to other departments, which see. This being summer-time I have kept quite cool, I think, and have said very little that was real scoldy, don't you think? Anyway, this is Summer girl time and what do you care for a little scolding? So run along and be good girls and I hope you have a fine time, but don't forget that your country is at war and you have a patriotic duty to perform as well as the men and women have and all of us. By, by.

COUSIN MARION.

FARM LIFE, Box 157 SPENCER, IND.

A.—Top dress the soil with 1,000 pounds of air-slaked lime to the acre and work this into the surface. Do not plow it under. Sand and loam also would be excellent for top dressing purposes if they could be had. The land no doubt was worked too wet. This is a great mistake in managing heavy clay. Plow and work in fall and seed to winter rye to be again plowed under when green in spring. Do this each year in addition to plowing under farmyard manure and in time the soil should become lighter, but it cannot be done all at once.

SERRADELLA.—Seed firms about here have never heard of Serradella which you speak of as a "sandy soil clover" in March COMFORT. Can you tell me where to procure the seed and whether it is an annual or perennial? H. M. H., Grand Rapids, Mich.

A.—Serradella is an annual plant. Clover and other legumes will do better in Michigan. Try the big seed houses that issue large catalogs for seed. This seed is scarce this season.

BEAN LEAVES TURN YELLOW.—The bottom leaves on my pole and bush beans turn yellow and fade. Can you tell me any remedy? S. J., Shreveport, La.

A.—This is quite common to some extent and may be due to one of several causes. Don't worry about it unless the crop is injured or destroyed, in which case send samples of plants to your experiment station at Baton Rouge, La., for examination and advice. They will be glad to help you. If it is a disease of the plant they will find it out by examination and tell you what, if any, cure or preventive can be applied.

CABBAGE AND TURNIP WORMS.—Can you tell me how to prevent or get rid of cabbage worms, also turnip worms? MRS. L. S., Twin Falls, Ida.

A.—Spray with a pail of water to which has been added and thoroughly mixed: One ounce of Paris green or two ounces of arsenate of lead. Paris green may be mixed with six times its bulk of flour or air slacked lime and dusted over the plants from an old pepper box.

CABBAGE WORMS AND CUCUMBER BUGS.—Little white worms about the size of a small wire eat the roots of my cucumber vines and kill them, and yellow bugs eat the leaves. Green worms on my cabbages eat them so they will not grow. What can I do to prevent or get rid of them?

MRS. E. M. W., Arnett, W. Va.

A.—Paris green or arsenate of lead prepared and applied as directed in above answer to Mrs. L. S. will kill cabbage worms and cucumber bugs. Change of location is best remedy for root worms and vine borers. Ashes and road dust sprinkled over cucumber vines may or may not keep off the bugs. To kill all kinds of bugs that eat leaves, poison their food by spraying or dusting the leaves with Paris green. This rule will always work.

WOOD ASHES FOR FERTILIZER.—How can I use wood ashes with stable manure? On what crops? (2) How can I use hen manure? On what crops with best results? (3) Are wood ashes good on cabbage? (4) Will wood ashes ensure a good crop of potatoes?

O. K., Waldoboro, Maine.

A.—Apply each separately, first plowing ashes under. Best for fruit and vegetables. (2) Apply thin coating, plowing under. All crops, particularly good for vegetables. (3) Yes, on marsh or peaty soils. (4) No, but are big help to crop.

LICE ON CUCUMBERS.—Last year the lice began at the roots and worked out toward the ends of my cucumber vines and killed them. What can I do to prevent or destroy them? MRS. J. T. S., Bakersfield, Cal.

A.—Spray with a mixture of soap suds and kerosene whipped together with an egg beater. One pint of water, one half pint of kerosene and one small cake of soap. Dilute to five gallons. Or use tobacco concoction for lice for sale at drug-stores.

PEANUT CULTURE.—Please tell me how to grow peanuts. MRS. B. O., Morrisonville, Ill.

A.—Send to the U. S. Department of Agriculture, Division of Publications, Washington, D. C., for bulletin on "How to Grow Peanuts."

MUSHROOM SPAWN.—Please tell me where I can get mushroom spawn, also where I can get instructions on how to raise mushrooms? MRS. A. S., Dubuque, Iowa.

A.—Send to the nearest seed house for spawn. Write the U. S. Department of Agriculture for bulletin on "How to Grow Mushrooms." It will be sent you free.

"I've sprained my ankle. I did it on Sunday," with a short laugh, "and I've been sitting here ever since, I think."

"Oh, how dreadful!" The girl looked pitifully at the sodden, haggard face. "Do you mean you have been all alone all this time? How did you get anything to eat?"

"Oh, I managed. I don't eat much. Do you know, I hardly thought you'd come back again. Didn't they tell you I was not a person for you to come and see?"

"I never asked any one. For one thing, you see, I don't even know your name."

"They call me Mrs. Simpson." She gave a groan of pain as the dog brushed against her foot.

"Well, names aren't very important, are they? The important thing, I think, is your foot. Will you let me look at it?"

She was down on her knees, and unwinding the piece of an old dress which was wrapped around the ankle. It certainly looked very bad, swollen out of all shape, and bruised green and purple.

"Have you any liniment?"

"Yes, but it's up-stairs and I couldn't get it." As she spoke her pale face turned an ugly red. Nerine put two and two together; the terribly inflamed ankle told its own story.

"Can I go and get it?"

"Look on the table in the room at the head of the stairs."

Mrs. Simpson leaned back and closed her eyes as if an angel had suddenly descended to cure her.

Nerine flew up the dirty stairs, and into an unfurnishd room, where a quantity of odds and ends stood on an old table. There was the liniment, conspicuous in its yellow wrapper. It looked a little as though Mrs. Simpson were accustomed to hurting herself and kept her liniment at hand.

Nerine returnd to the sufferer, and bathed the ankle with her handkerchief soaked in the strong stuff, finally wrapping it softly round it.

Presently she would get something for a bandage. The first thing to be done was to make the fire, for the damp cold of the house was piercing.

"Have you been here all yesterday and today without a fire?" she said.

Mrs. Simpson nodded.

"I couldn't make one. I held Snap in my arms to keep me warm last night. Oh, don't you make it," anxiously, "you'll get so dirty."

"No, I won't. And I won't be long."

She vanished into the pestilential passage, but it was not so bad as it had been, for she had left all the doors open behind her as she entered.

There was wood and coal in the kitchen, and she returned laden to the sitting-room. The flame of the dry, crackling chips made the place more comfortable looking. Nerine wondered if Mrs. Simpson had had anything to eat since she hurt herself. Certainly she had not cooked anything. She drew her bow at a venture.

"May I make some tea when the fire is better? The saucepan is here."

"Would you?" Mrs. Simpson gasped. The pain of her ankle was relieved by the liniment and a faintness was creeping over her. Except for a biscuit and a little milk, she had eaten nothing since Sunday.

Nerine departed to the kitchen pump for water. As she was returning she heard some one pass the door; it was the girl with the afternoon's milk, and Nerine ran out and spoke to her as she was putting it on the window sill.

"Mrs. Simpson has hurt her ankle," she said. "Don't you know of anyone who could come and keep the house tidy for her till she is better?"

The girl gave an impertinent giggle.

"There's nobody in this neighborhood that's going to do work for a woman who drinks," she said, superbly. "She's dangerous, too, with her shooting, and that violent no one can stay in the house with her."

"I haven't witnessed any violence," Nerine replied coldly; "I suppose you won't try to help me find any one to come and help her."

The milk girl tossed her head.

"There's nobody as would come. Anyway, she's here today and gone tomorrow. One of these days she'll set the house on fire."

Nerine looked at her. Then she said something in the uncompromising Lispenard manner which may have had an effect on the milk girl; she did not wait to see.

The fire was burning grandly as she sat the saucepan on it. The latter had evidently been cleaned since her visit, and was no longer so objectionable. She went to the cupboard for the tea, as she had seen Mrs. Simpson do. But though there was tea, there was nothing to eat. She turned somewhat blankly to her hostess.

"There aren't any biscuits here," she said; "where do you keep them?"

"There's a box full of things in the kitchen, but I couldn't open it," Mrs. Simpson turned face from her visitor as she spoke.

"I can," and Nerine departed to the kitchen to look for the box. Pushed behind the stove were,

Address COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

Subscribers are invited to write to this department asking for any information desired relative to the treatment of animal troubles. Questions will be answered in these columns free by an eminent veterinarian. Describe the trouble fully, sign full name and give your address; direct all correspondence to the Veterinary Department, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine. Should any subscriber desire an immediate, special opinion on any question privately mailed, it may be had by sending one dollar with a letter asking such advice, addressing as above.

No atttention will be given any inquiry which lacks the sender's full name and address, but we will print only initials if so requested.

FISTULA.—I bought a mare a couple of months ago and the man of whom I bought said that a sore on her weathers was caused by a saddle. I think it's a fistula. What will cure it? MRS. J. M. W.

A.—Clip off the hair and wash the skin clean, then open up each pocket and pipe to obtain free drainage, swab wound with tincture of iodine and then once daily pack with oakum saturated with a mixture of equal parts of turpentine and raw linseed oil, or use a commercial fistula cure. It would, of course, be best to have a trained veterinarian do the cutting and even then the trouble may prove very troublesome to cure.

TAIL RUBBING.—I have an eight-year-old riding mare that rubs the roots of her tail. She is hearty in every way and always in good order. Is it a disease, what is it called and is there any permanent cure for it? F. C. S.

A.—In mares such tail rubbing sometimes is induced by a foul condition of the udder. Cleanse that perfectly. Lessen the rich food and increase exercise. Scrub the tail clean, then pour on and rub in a mixture of one part of kerosene and three parts of cottonseed oil or machine oil and repeat every other day for three times; then keep the parts saturated with a mixture of two ounces of sulphur, one half an ounce of coal tar dip or disinfectant and one part of raw linseed oil.

SLOBBERING.—My father has a horse that slobbers a good deal and doesn't eat much. He cannot do very hard work. (2) Can you give me a remedy to rid dogs of ticks and also the scratches? E. J. S.

A.—The teeth need attention and you should take the horse to a veterinarian for that purpose. (2) Dogs do not have "scratches." That is a disease of the horse's heels. Mange may be present, or the fleas and ticks may cause the loss of hair. Buy some coal tar dip and use it according to directions given by the manufacturer. Flowers of sulphur added at the rate of 16½ pounds per 100 gallons of solution will make the dip more effective.

HEAVES.—Can you tell me how often juniper berries should be fed to horses? Are they good for the kidneys? How should oil of tar be given to a horse that has heaves? Is Fowler's solution of arsenic good for the heaves? How is it used? E. L. D.

A.—Kidney disease is very rare in horses and there is no need of giving juniper berries or a preparation from such berries. It would have no beneficial effect. Oil of tar will not help in heaves. The disease is incurable, but half an ounce of Fowler's solution of arsenic given night and morning in feed or water, will relieve distress. See recent answers on heaves.

OVERHEATED MULE.—I have a mule twelve years old that hasn't shed his hair for two years. It is about two inches long. He cannot work in warm weather without getting too hot. Can you tell me what to do for him? O. L. W.

A.—Have the mule clipped at once and he may work better, but an overheated animal never is quite comfortable in hot weather. Do not feed green grass or corn. Work mule in cool of morning and evening.

HEAVES.—I have a mare twelve years old that always had a dry cough. Last winter she had distemper. An abscess formed and broke at throat between the cheek bones. Since then she coughs a great deal and breathes very hard. J. J. S.

A.—The mare no doubt has heaves, which is incurable, but may be relieved as follows: Let her live on grass in summer and if she must work add oats and bran. In winter feed wet oat straw or oat bundles instead of hay. Do not feed any bulky roughage at noon and do not work her soon after a meal. If she does not sufficiently improve give her one half an ounce of Fowler's solution of arsenic night and morning and gradually increase the dose up to one ounce if necessary. Gradually discontinue the medicine when no longer needed.

SLOBBERING.—I have a mare eight years old that has a frequent running of the mouth. She is in poor condition. Can you tell what causes it and what I can do for it? A. H.

A.—Irregularities or disease of the teeth is the probable cause. Have her attended to by a veterinarian.

COUGH.—My cat has had two attacks, about three months apart, of difficult breathing accompanied by a wheezing cough, each attack lasting about a week. There is no swelling in the throat and no discharge from nostrils. Animal in good condition and is not stupid. G. A. M.

A.—Let the cat live an outdoor life without luxuries of any sort and such attacks should not occur. Feed very lightly.

SWEATING.—Could you tell me how to keep a horse from sweating? I have a mare four years old, in good condition. When I work her she sweats so much that the hair comes off the shoulders, but they do not get sore. Is there any help? P. B., Jr.

A.—Have the mare clipped and then have her worked or well exercised every day. Do not feed corn or Alfalfa.

LAMENESS.—I have a mule seven years old that has three or four soft lumps or puffs on his hind ankles and he gets very lame in the left one when worked. I have been told it was Bog Spavin. (2) I also have a brood mare nine years old that gives birth to weakly colts. She seems to be strong and healthy. She gave birth to a mule colt last spring that did not seem right in its hind legs. They were crooked and the colt only lived three days. This spring she gave birth to a mule colt and its front legs were so crooked it could not stand up. I fed it on cow's milk. It appeared healthy and had a good appetite. The third night the colt died. I have been advised to breed her to a stallion. E. E. R.

A.—Bog spavin affects the hock joint, not the ankle. The mixture you speak of would remove "hair and hide" and probably do far more harm than good. Do not use it. Bandage the leg with cotton batting and flannel each time the mule comes in. That may do some good, but at this distance we cannot, of course, tell just what is the cause of the lameness. (2) It would be all right to try breeding to a stallion but we fancy that more generous feeding of oats and bran throughout pregnancy would do more good.

LAME COW.—My cow, nine years old, has a calf three months old. After the calf was born the cow became stiff in her hind legs and now it has gone to her hips and she has to be helped up. Her hide is tight and when pulled it pops. What causes it? W. McC.

A.—We suspect that the cow is in an advanced stage of tuberculosis which is contagious and incurable and makes the milk dangerous for man and animals. We should not feel justified in prescribing treatment. If tuberculosis is present she should be destroyed. Have her examined by a qualified veterinarian.

GRAVEL.—I want information as to gravel in mules or horses. W. P.

A.—We cannot advise unless you give full particulars. Do you mean gravel in the bladder or in the hoof?

LOSS OF HAIR.—I have a horse ten years old and every spring he loses the hair from the top of tail. He does not rub it. A chalk mark I made is there. J. M.

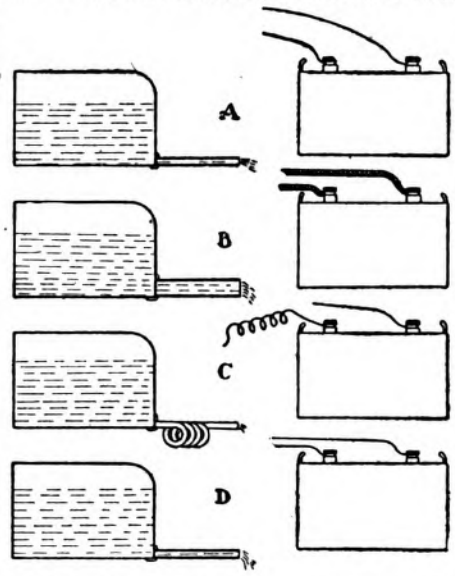
A.—Mix together one part of kerosene and three parts of cottonseed oil and rub into affected parts every three days. Oil and sulphur also is effective.

FEEDING A COW.—What kind of feed is the best milk producer for a part Jersey cow? She has a calf six weeks old. I have been feeding cottonseed meal, three quarts a day, and get about five quarts of milk. She is very thin. Is beet pulp a good feed? R. C. T.

A.—As the cow is thin you should feed cracked or ground corn and ground oats, bran and oil meal along with your grass. If she then fails to pick up it would be wise to have her tested with tuberculin as she may have tuberculosis and that is incurable and makes the milk dangerous for man or beast. Beet pulp is unnecessary when a cow is on grass.

Automobile and Gas Engine Helps

Questions relating to gasoline engines and automobiles, by our subscribers, addressed to COMFORT Auto Dept., Augusta, Maine, will be answered by our expert, free, in the columns of this department. Full name and address is required, but initials only will be printed.



Ignition

ALL automobile engines regardless of make or design must use some form of electric ignition. It is commonly stated that nothing is known of electricity. This statement can be considered as both true and untrue. No one has as yet been capable of stating exactly what electricity is, but on the other hand considerable is known concerning the laws which govern the action of electricity.

Frankly, all ignition systems consist of two indispensable parts, namely the source of electric current and the apparatus to use this current so as to produce a spark in the cylinder. However, before taking any of the features into consideration it is necessary to understand a few of the laws whicl govern the action of electricity.

For the sake of comparison consider water to represent electricity. Nobody will have cause to doubt the statement that if water flows from a higher to a lower level, it is capable of being harnessed, as for instance the driving of a water wheel. The greater the height from which the water falls the greater amount of work it is capable of doing because of the pressure. The same condition is true of electric current. While the water pressure is spoken of in pounds the pressure of electric current is referred to in volts. Electrical engineers refer to the volt as corresponding to one foot of "head" in a system for developing power by water.

The flow of water is measured by the number of gallons of cubic feet through a pipe in a given amount of time. On the other hand the flow of electric current is measured by a unit known as the ampere. It is a well-known fact that the larger the pipe the more water will flow through it under a given head or pressure. In the same manner the flow of electric current is affected by the size of wire used. For instance, if it is desired to use a large number of amperes a large wire is needed, and for less number of amperes, a smaller wire. However, bear in mind that a small wire can carry a current of little amperage (quantity) but of high voltage (pressure) just the same as with water flowing through a pipe of a given size, the greater the pressure or head the larger the quantity of water that can be made to flow through pipe. Likewise a large wire can carry a current of great amperage with little voltage (pressure).

A.—The quantity of water flowing from tank A is governed by the size of pipe. The water will drain away more quickly if a larger pipe be used such as at B. Likewise more electric current will be drained from storage battery B in a given time than from battery A due to the use of larger wires at B. Because of the greater length and number of coils in the pipe less water will flow in a given time from tank C than from tank D, although both pipes are of the same diameter. Likewise less electric current will be delivered at the end of the wire fitted to battery C than through the wire fitted to D, because of the difference in length of these wires.

The quantity of water that will flow under a given pressure or head depends upon the size of pipe through which it is led, however, if two pipes of the same diameter but different in length be used a greater quantity of water would flow from the shorter pipe because the friction of the water in the longer pipe is greater.

Although there is no unit applied for the resistance of a pipe to water, the resistance of a wire to the flow of current is called the ohm. If a pipe be coiled or crooked it affords a greater resistance to the flow of water. The same is true of electricity. The longer the wire and the greater number of coils, the greater will be the resistance to the flow of electric current.

The ampere-hour is the measure of quantity of current. For example one ampere-hour is the amount of current that will flow at the rate of one ampere in one hour. A storage battery rated at 60 ampere-hour will produce current at the rate of one ampere for 60 hours, or two amperes for 30 hours, or 60 amperes in one hour, etc.

Electric current must be either direct or alternating. Direct current as the name would imply flows always in one direction in the wire. On the other hand alternating current first flows in one direction and then in the other. The reversals take place many times per second. In the next issue batteries will enter the discussion.

The Magneto

It is a recognized fact that the average motorist knows very little concerning the fundamentals of the ignition system and should he tamper with same the tendency is for conditions to be made worse rather than better. There are times however when it is necessary to remove the magneto from the motor so it may be accessible to work on. The majority of motorists fear to remove the instrument because of a general opinion that correct replacement is a difficult matter, though in fact the work is not as difficult as many believe.

Let us imagine that the ignition unit has been removed and is on the workbench ready to be reinstalled. The first step is to find the firing point of the No. 1 cylinder, this being the one nearest the radiator or front of car. Turn the motor over by means of the hand crank until the piston in the No. 1 cylinder is at the height of its compression stroke. At this point both the inlet and exhaust valves in the No. 1 cylinder are closed and there is also a tightly compressed charge of gasoline and air in the combustion chamber ready for firing.

Next turn the attention to the magneto. Take off the distributor cover and turn the armature of the instrument until the distributor arm is directly opposite the point or brush that supplies current to the spark plug in the first cylinder. No difficulty should be experienced in determining the firing point because after judging with the eye that the distributor arm is directly opposite the brush or point for the No. 1 cylinder rock the armature back and forth and carefully watch the breaker points. When the breaker points are just about to separate the instrument is ready to furnish current to the plug in the No. 1 cylinder. With the cylinder holding a charge about to be fired and the magneto in position to furnish current the instrument can be coupled to the engine with the assurance of being properly timed.

The Car Brakes

If anyone will stop to give thought to the matter for a moment, it will be obvious that next to the ability to go the important factor is ability to stop. The early types of automobiles were equipped with but one brake. Had this one brake been properly designed it would have answered the purpose well. Such, however, was not the case. The manufacturer directed almost his entire efforts on the "ability to go" with the inevitable result that the braking apparatus was not to be relied upon. Then came the demand for two sets of brakes, one known as the service and the other for emergency use only. The only objection which the editor has to offer against such an arrangement is that it tends to overconfidence on the part of the operator. Knowing that he has two sets of brakes he does not properly look after either set. Should the time come when either set refuses to respond the result is an accident. The safest plan is properly to care for the service brake, also test the other set frequently. If either brake refuses to act properly determine the reason and promptly make the necessary adjustments or replacements. An instruction book usually accompanies each car sold and incorporated therewith you will find detailed instructions for caring for the brakes. This subject is not selected for the reason of filling up space in the book. The suggestions are the result of much research work on the part of the engineers and are well worth following to the letter.

not one, but two boxes, and one of them Mrs. Simpson evidently had been able to open. It was a case of whisky, and one bottle was missing. That was why she had looked away when she spoke of the box; that was also the probable cause of the sprained ankle. There was a hatchet lying on the case of whisky, and Nerine toiled at the second box till the tightly-nailed cover gave way. As she took out package after package, it was plain to her that Mrs. Simpson had extraordinary tastes and money to indulge them; also, that she must live on such things as required least labor in cooking. There were soups in tins, potted meats, caviare, anchovy paste, all sorts of biscuits, such as might suit a jaded appetite. But of ordinary household supplies, there were none except a small parcel of lump sugar.

"Does this extraordinary individual never eat bread, I wonder? And is she going to dispose of all that whisky?" She surveyed the latter doubtfully, wishing she dared throw it all out of the window; but decided that such measures would not be justifiable, and would also be useless, as Mrs. Simpson would only procure another case. She filled her arms with various articles, and returned to the sitting-room, after painfully opening a tin of soup with the hatchet.

"You will feel much better after you have some of this," she said, cheerfully, pouring the water on the tea and putting the soup in its stead in the saucepan. "I can't find any bread, but you can eat a biscuit with it, can't you?"

"I never eat bread, nor meat, except potted meat. I hate the sight of it."

"No wonder you feel nervous if you live on these things: they can't be good for you—except of course, the soup." She inspected it, to see if it boiled.

Looking up, to reach for a cup off the table, she caught Mrs. Simpson's dull eyes fixed on her.

"When you stoop over like that, I feel as if I'd seen you before," the woman said, vaguely.

Nerine was startled, for she had just the same odd feeling about Mrs. Simpson.

"I don't think so," she answered. "Perhaps you know some one like me."

She racked her brains as she spoke, to think just when and how she and her hostess had met for met they had, she knew; both face and voice were not new to her. And yet it was absurd, too, for the people she had spoken to outside of her few acquaintances might be counted on her fingers.

"Perhaps I've seen you in London," Mrs. Simpson persisted.

"I have never been in London," shaking her head and dismissing her idiotic search for a previous encounter. Here is your soup. You will feel much better when you have had it."

Mrs. Simpson took the cup; her hand was rather steadier today, still she spilled it as she poured some into her saucer.

"Would you mind breaking a biscuit into that for Snap?" she said, faintly. "The poor dog is hungry."

Nerine took the saucer and filled it with broken biscuits. She began to really like Mrs. Simpson, who was drinking her hot soup as if she were starving, but had taken thought for the dog before she put her lips to it.

She poured out some tea for herself, and drank it slowly, gazing about her with a design of making the invalid comfortable for the night before she left her. There was no sofa in the room, but if the next room was Mrs. Simpson's bedroom, as seemed probable, perhaps she could get one from there. Or she might manage to get her into bed.

"You must lie down and keep your foot up,"

No. 7722 October, The Opal, Symbol of Hope.
No. 7732. November, The Topaz, Symbol of Friendship.
No. 7742. December, The Turquoise, Symbol of Prosperity,

Each ring is guaranteed genuine 12-Karat gold filled which looks exactly like solid gold and will wear for years. In fact we absolutely guarantee each ring for at least five years. The rings themselves are perfectly plain, the stones are solitaires and perfect imitations of the real gems. The setting of each ring is the ever popular "Tiffany." As a Christmas, Birthday or all-the-year-round gift for wife, mother, sweetheart or sister nothing could be more appropriate and acceptable than one of these beautiful guaranteed rings set with the birthstone of the person to whom it is given. And not only the women and girls but men and boys as well are now wearing them.

Please do not class these rings with the cheap "electro-plated" rings that turn brassy after they have been worn a month or two. Remember that every one of them is guaranteed to be 12-Karat gold-filled and positively warranted for five years. If you want a handsome birthstone ring for yourself or some dear friend or relative you will make no mistake in taking advantage of this offer at once. When ordering be sure to specify the size and number of ring wanted. You can easily tell just what size ring you wear by following the directions at the right.

Club Offer. For two one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 25c. each, we will send you one of these beautiful gold-filled birthstone rings by parcel post prepaid. Please be sure to give size and number of ring wanted. Address

COMFORT, Augusta, Maine

Comfort's Information Bureau

Under this heading all questions by COMFORT subscribers on subjects not related to the special departments elsewhere in the paper will be answered, as far as may be. COMFORT readers are advised to read carefully the advertisements in this paper, as they will often find in them what they seek through their questions addressed to this Bureau. They will thus save time, labor and postage.

NOTICE.—As the privileges of this Bureau and of all other departments of COMFORT are for subscribers only, no attention will be given any inquiry which does not bear the writer's correct name and address. Initials only, or a fictitious name, if requested, will appear in the published answer, but the inquiry must invariably be signed by the writer's true name.

L. E. M., North Branch, Mich.—If you want to become a Campfire Girl you will have to get enough girls together in your neighborhood to organize a Camp. Just what you will have to do to organize you may learn by writing to Campfire Girls of America, 461 Fourth Avenue, New York City. We may add that this is one of the finest girls' organizations in the country and are glad to give it our heartiest commendation, and advise that other girls all over the country get together and organize camps in their communities.

L. E. O., Phelps, Wis.—Information on the subject of the Florida banana is very meager in our office owing to the fact that very few bananas are raised in that state. Write State Commissioner of Agriculture, Tallahassee, Florida, for information. Bananas are raised in the West Indies and Central America mostly. Write to United Fruit Co., Boston, Mass., for literature on the subject. The U. F. C. people not only know all there is to be known about bananas, but they own most of the bananas.

H. H., Deleon Springs, Fla.—As previously announced in this column, we wish to repeat that any one wishing to secure information regarding the new farmers' loan legislation should make inquiries at his local bank. The information received there will be direct and will apply to local conditions.

C. B. D., Quitague, Texas.—As we have often said to inquirers, we repeat to you that when you find anything on your land, vegetable, animal or mineral that is strange to you and to those living in the neighborhood, you should notify the state authorities, through the Secretary of State, say, and have it examined as a possible natural resource for the benefit of the commonwealth.

S. P. S., Chelan, Wash.—For information about your legal standing and privileges as an Indian claimant write to Hon. Cato Sells, Comm'r Indian Affairs, Dep't of the Interior, Washington, D. C., stating all the facts in your case.

J. K. V.—B., Speedwell, Tenn.—We believe a college course is now required to enter medical colleges. Of course, this includes Latin. Suppose you write to Dr. Brown Ayres, Pres't, University of Tennessee, Knoxville, and make inquiries on all points of information you require. That's the surest way to get at it. Any COMFORT readers wishing educational information should write to the President of the State University of the state in which they live and they will get it at first hand and reliable.

M. Z., Grundy Center, Iowa.—You transfer money from one bank to another by drawing a check on the bank of deposit to cover all your account with it, and this check you deposit to your new account in the other bank. Or you may cash the check, or get exchange for it and deposit that. The check is usually made to the order of the cashier of the bank to which the account is transferred, or the check may be certified, which is a guarantee that it is good for its face. But why, ask in Maine when the bank in your town could have told you in much less time, and isn't anything like so far away?

D. A. N., Sylvarena, Miss.—We have said over and over again that when a COMFORT reader finds anything vegetable, mineral, or animal that neither he nor his neighbors know what it is, he should communicate his discovery to one of his state officials and learn from headquarters where samples shall be sent for examination as a possible natural resource of value to the state. We say it again because we don't want anything lost which may be valuable.

Mrs. A. W., Dunlap, Mo.—For information about mothers' pensions' laws and regulations ask your county officials, especially the sheriff, who ought to know if he does not. COMFORT readers in other states please make a note of this and act accordingly.

L. K., Bentinville, Ark.—Old papers, or junk of any kind can be sold to better advantage than by shipping it away, unless you have enough to make a carload, or live near enough to a large town for you to haul it in and sell direct. COMFORT inquirers please note.

Mrs. M. R., Clayton, Wash.—Lunar caustic is the usual remedy for warts. Get it at the drug-store and ask the druggist how to apply it. We are informed by a reader that water in which potatoes have been boiled will remove them in a few days, if frequently applied when fresh.

Mrs. Lot, Geraldine, Mont.—We cannot tell you how to find a person's age who lived in a distant city some years ago. If it was a woman, we don't believe anybody could tell you, but the woman and she wouldn't. You might look over the election register of voters.

Mrs. R. M., Bremen, Ala.—We have nothing to say against chiropractise, or any other practise that will help heal the wounds of this world, but our advice to you is not to spend money to study this art of healing until you have talked to the regular practitioners of medicine in your locality and they advise you to undertake it. No doubt some practitioners of these new sciences have a fair degree of success, but those that do would have been quite as successful at anything they had undertaken, because they are the kind of people who command success, which the great majority of people are not.

K. F., Paris, Ky.—For information about Camp Fire Girls write to Camp Fire Girls of America, 461 Fourth Ave., New York City, and write also to C. F. Outfitting Co., 16 West 22nd Street, N. Y. City. We heartily recommend the Camp Fire Girls and sincerely hope that COMFORT girls will become interested all over the country and where possible get into it.

I. J. N., Royal, Wash.—We believe it has been shown that showers of frogs and lizards and worms have come down from the sky, but they did not grow there. They had beent aken up somewhere else by a cyclone or whirlwind and whisked through the skies until they got out of the power of the wind when they dropped back to earth where they came from and where they belonged. (2) Just how much the changes of the moon affect the weather we cannot say, but they have some effect, because if it were not for the moon the farmers would never know what kind of weather they were going to have.

W. W. H., Pottsville, Ark.—There is no such thing as a dark or a light moon, but there is the dark of the moon and the light of the moon, the first being when the moon is shadowed by the earth and the other when it is not and its light makes the night lambent and lovely. (2) For information about coins consult coin firms advertising in COMFORT.

Mrs. M. T., Berryville, Ark.—We know of no hospital anywhere which will give treatment in return for work. Hospital patients, as a rule, are not in much condition to do hospital work, or they would not be there. Besides in many, if not all, patients, who are not able to pay, are not charged anything. If you could get a position in a hospital and needed treatment you would get it and you could stay as long as you did your work properly. Talk to your local doctors about it.

H. H. H., Geiston, Pa.—Pipe dealers in this neighborhood say that a meerschaum properly and naturally colored—that is by smoking it—will not fade, though it may grow gray if not used for a long time and its supply of nicotine thus kept from it. A little smoking again will bring it back if this should happen. A meerschaum should not be thoroughly cleaned inside, a pack being always left in the bottom. It should also be protected by a chamois skin covering. Nor should it be permitted to get wet. Meerschaums are delicate creatures and require about as much attention as a baby. Consult local tobacconists. Maybe they know more than ours do. Artificially colored meerschaums are not fast colors and they may do most anything in the color line.

COMFORT Reader, Van Wert, Ohio.—Red Cross nurses who are efficient and of good character and health are in demand. The more intelligent the better and your three years of High School will be of value, if you got out of your books what you should have got. The cost will depend upon where and how you get it. For definite information write to Chas. L. Magee, Secretary American National Red Cross, Washington, D. C.

J. K., Sauk Rapids, Minn.—A man is not of age in any state of the Union until he is twenty-one. When you are that old your guardian has no further control and you may go where you please and may bring legal action against him if you want to. This, however, must be done through a lawyer. Get a good one, not one who will take the least pay for his services.

R. S. N., Chambersburg, Pa.—After all we have said in this department about fake old violins, you still think you have a genuine Strad, write to Lyon & Healy, Chicago, and get their opinion which may assist you to a change of mind.

Comfort's League of Cousins

The League of Cousins was founded as a means of bringing the scattered members of COMFORT'S immense circle of readers into one big, happy family. Its aim is to promote a feeling of kinship and relationship among all readers. It was primarily started as a society for the juvenile members of COMFORT'S family, only, but those of more mature years clamored for admittance so persistently that it was deemed advisable to impose no age limit; thus all are eligible to admittance into our League provided they conform to its rules and are animated by the child spirit.

Membership is restricted to COMFORT subscribers and costs thirty cents, only five cents more than the regular subscription to COMFORT which is included. The thirty cents makes you a member of the League and gives you an attractive League button with the letters "C. L. O. C.," a handsome certificate of membership with your name engrossed thereon, and the privilege of having your name in the letter list, also a paid-in-advance subscription to COMFORT. You continue a League member as long as you keep up your subscription to COMFORT. There are no annual dues, so after you have once joined all you have to do to keep in good standing is to keep your subscription to COMFORT paid up.

Please observe carefully the following directions which explain exactly

How to become a Member

Send thirty cents to COMFORT'S Subscription Department, Augusta, Maine, with your request to be admitted into COMFORT'S LEAGUE OF COUSINS, and you will at once receive the League button and your membership certificate and number; you will also receive COMFORT for one year if you are a new subscriber; but if you are already a subscriber your subscription will be renewed or extended one full year beyond date of expiration.

Or, if your subscription is already paid in advance, you can take a friend's one-year subscription at 25 cents and send it in with five cents of your own, thirty cents in all, with your request for membership, and we will send you the button and membership certificate, and send COMFORT to your friend for one year. League subscriptions do not count in premium clubs.

NEVER apply for membership without enclosing thirty cents to include a new subscription or a renewal.

The League numbering over forty thousand members, undoubtedly is the greatest society of young people on earth. It costs but thirty cents to join, and that gives you at least a one-year subscription to COMFORT also, without extra cost.

Never in the world's history was so much given for so little. Never could thirty cents be invested to such advantage, and bring such splendid returns. Don't hesitate. Join us at once and induce your friends to do likewise.

All those League members who desire a list of the cousins residing in the several states, can secure the same by sending a stamped addressed envelope and five cents in stamps to Nellie Rutherford, 1299 Park Place, Brooklyn, New York, grand secretary.

Special Notice

Never write a subscription or renewal order or application for membership in the body of a letter. Write your subscription or renewal and membership application on a separate sheet of paper, separate from your letter. We have to put all subscription orders on our subscription file at once; so if it is written on the same sheet as your letter, the whole letter has to go on to the subscription file at once and thus can receive no attention from Uncle Charlie.

Never send subscriptions to Uncle Charlie nor to the Secretary of the League; they bother him and cause confusion and delay.

Address all letters to COMFORT, Augusta, Maine, and they will promptly reach the head of the department for which they are intended.

League Shut-in and Mercy Work for July

"Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these, ye have done it unto me."

Written references from postmaster or physician must positively accompany all appeals from shut-ins. Appeals unaccompanied by written references will be destroyed.

W. B. Balleu, Sparta, Tenn. Helpless from rheumatism. Has family of four small children, in need of food and clothing. Send him some of the sympathy that buys bread. Callie D. Barefoot, Four Oaks, R. R. 2, N. C. Helpless invalid for over thirty years. Depends on the charitable for support. Send her a dime shower. Mrs. Daisy Huff, Spencer, Va. Invalid with one child four years old. Deserted by her husband. Needy and well recommended. Send her some help. Willie Price, Crabtree, R. R. 1, Box 101, N. C. Nineteen years of age. Crippled from rheumatism. Would appreciate picture post-cards and any assistance you care to send him. Mrs. James Traverse, Waterbury, R. R. 2, Vt. Invalid. Send her some cheer. Mrs. Joanna Caldwell, Nesbitt, Miss. Has a son afflicted with curvature of spine. Would be grateful if anyone could tell her of a place where she could send him to be treated free of charge. Mrs. Frances Watts, Taylorsville, N. C. Invalid for many years. Needy and worthy. Well recommended. Remember her. Mrs. J. W. Williamson, Floyd, R. R. 1, Va. Has tuberculosis. Very poor. Send her some cheer. Rebecca Whitefield, Finleyson, R. R. 2, Ga.. Invalid. Send her some cheer. Lewie J. McClurg, Triplet, Ky. Helpless shut-in. Is very lonely. Would appreciate cheery letters.

A dime or a dollar sent to any one of these poor souls is laying up for those who give treasures in heaven where neither moth nor rust corrupt, nor thieves break through and steal. If all who read this would cut out their whiskey and beer money for one day and send it to the poor souls listed above it would make them independent for life.

Lovingly yours,

Uncle Charlie

she observed, replenishing the empty cup with soup. "You would feel ever so much more comfortable. Don't you think I could help you into bed, and put everything you wanted just by you? Then I should know you were all right till I came again in the morning."

"Are you coming again in the morning? You are an angel, if evere there was one," said Mrs. Simpson, unsteadily, tears coming to the faded bloodshot eyes. Nerine nodded, laughing.

"No one ever heard of an angel with black hair," she said. "Now what do you think about going to bed? Is that your bedroom in there?" pointing to a door at one side of the room.

The Family Doctor

So many inquiries are received from COMFORT subscribers concerning the health of the family that this column will be devoted to answering them. The remedies and advice here given are intended only for simple cases; serious cases should be addressed to physicians, not to us.

Address The Family Doctor, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

NOTICE.—As the privileges of this and all other departments of COMFORT are for subscribers only, no attention will be given any inquiry which does not bear the writer's correct name and address. Initials only, or a fictitious name, if requested, will appear in the published answer, but the inquiry must invariably be signed by the writer's true name.

Mrs. W. H., Blue Ridge, N. Y.—The scaling and discoloration of the skin on your knee is some form of eczema, or other cutaneous disorder, whose nature can be determined only by examination. You have already delayed too long seeing a physician and should do so at once and receive proper treatment before it develops into something serious.

C. S., Klondyke, Ariz.—Boric acid is a colorless crystalline substance; dissolved in water it is much used as a healing, soothing wash, especially for the mouth and eyes. It is found in chemical combinations as borax, and you know borax. Boric and boracic acid are the same. Tannic acid is an astringent compound derived from gallnuts. A galinut is the gall-apple or oak-apple. Tannic acid, or tannin, the same thing is derived from other plants. Its chief use is in tanning leather and making writing-inks. It also has many uses in medicine.

C. M. H., Rock Rapids, Iowa.—Your husband may have tried in his weak way to quit tobacco, but any man, in fair physical and mental condition and twenty-eight years old, can quit tobacco if he really wants to, and unless he wants to, all the "cures" you can give him will have no effect. Show him this answer to your question and ask him if he is in fair physical and mental condition. If he says he isn't, have a doctor examine him and see what's the matter. If he says he is, tell him to stop the tobacco, or admit that he doesn't want to stop.

Miss B. C., Bingham Lake, Minn.—Before trying to redden your blood, ask your physician to make a test and tell you what is wrong with it and what is needed to correct it. We might guess at it from this distance and say you needed iron, when the fact was that you had enough in your system to make a crowbar.

Mrs. M. S., Huntsville, Ala.—Your nervous headache, with preliminary disordered vision when you can see but half an object and have numbness of the limbs and slight chill, is migraine, or "the megrims," as it is commonly called, and while it will probably always be with you, more or less, it may be controlled so as not to trouble you very much. But you must be treated by a physician who knows just what to do with it, as most of them do. It is quite common among all classes and all ages and ordinarily requires only home treatment. Attacks last from a few minutes to a day or more and causes are various. We have had it ourself, off and on, for forty years without any serious results. It may be in some cases quite severe and sometimes continues for several days, with very painful headache, so that you should consult a doctor and have him instruct you in its treatment, especially when you notice it first in the disordered vision. Alcohol at that time is very beneficial and will often stop it before it gets fairly started. COMFORT readers, who have these so-called "nervous headaches," will please take notice. (2) The heart trouble may be due to the indigestion and the kidney trouble be mixed up with the others, but in any event, the complications are too serious to be treated except by a physician who can make a thorough examination.

Mrs. R. W., Upper Marlboro, Md.—You are another one of those COMFORT mothers with a baby who shouldn't have one. Instead of writing away off to Maine and waiting weeks, as you must, for an answer, you should go to a doctor near you and get advice at once for yourself and the child, such as you can get only personally from a physician. It may cost you a little more, but isn't the baby worth it? Not to mention your own health and comfort!

G. F., Weimar, Texas.—The best way we know to "increase the cheeks" is to eat plenty of nourishing food and get fat. Unless the wrinkles are due to thinness of the face, they can be greatly ameliorated by gentle and frequent massaging, rubbing them out, so to say. Massage is the standard remedy for wrinkles, but it must be done regularly and frequently. "Beauty doctors" treat masculine patients. Why not apply to one?

Mrs. D. N. W., Durant, Okla.—Quinine is recognized as the specific for ague, or chills and fever, but the only real remedy is to get out of the part of the country where ague prevails. It is introduced into the system by the bite of the mosquito and medicine is only temporary relief. As long as the cause remains, the disease will manifest itself. You have found all medicines fail and they will continue to fail, not because they are not the right kind, but because they are weaker than the cause. The ague will stay with you as long as you stay where you are, if you let the mosquitoes bite you. Why don't you and your neighbors exterminate the mosquitoes?

Subscriber, Hillside, Colo.—Your short breathing and fast heart-beats with disordered blood circulation would indicate that the elevation, though you have lived in it most of your life, is to blame, rather than any organic trouble. Seventy-five hundred feet is away up in the air and as you are only twenty-three now, you are not used to it, in our judgment. Very many people, in good health at lower levels, couldn't stand that elevation twenty-four hours. We advise that instead of taking medicine, you go to the Denver level for a month, and then drop another thousand feet or so at intervals until you find your condition is normal. It may take three or four years, but health is worth it, isn't it?

C. D. A., Hortense, Ga.—Riggs' disease, or pyorrhea, is a disease of the gums characterized by suppuration and recession of the gums until the teeth become loosened so that in extreme cases they will fall out. It is very painful, affects the entire system and at one time was beyond the skill of physicians, but medical science has discovered a treatment which is practically a cure. (2) You speak of goose grease as a cure for cataract. We have heard of cases of cataract yielding to that treatment though we have no personal knowledge of an instance. In rare instances cataracts disappear without a surgical operation, which is the usual remedy. If a cataract disappears under goose grease treatment, we believe it is a mere coincidence or possibly the result of the gentle rubbing rather than the grease.

I. Y. E., Bristow, Okla. writes that a cure for warts is potato water, that is water in which potatoes have been boiled. Fresh juice should be saved every time potatoes are boiled and should be frequently applied. She says that her baby's hands were covered with warts and two weeks' treatment with potato water removed them all. This treatment is milder than the lunar caustic treatment and we should like to hear from COMFORT readers who try it. We do not hesitate to recommend it because though it may not be always efficient, it is always harmless.

Primrose, Meridan, Kans.—There are various remedies for piles to be had at drug-stores which are really efficient in milk cases, but when these fail to relieve and the trouble continues, something more should be done than simple applications, and a physician should be consulted before the case reaches a point where the knife must be used. Piles are more common among women than men, but they are very general and are due to various causes, rheumatism, gout, constipation and liver disorders being chief. Chronic diarrhea will bring them on and they prevail among persons of sedentary life and as well among those who live in the open, but must sit a great deal, as teamsters and cowboys. Regular movements of the bowels are the best means of prevention or relief, but these are not always sure and treatment by a physician is necessary. Cleanliness counts for much and a sponge and water should be used after evacuation. Cascara cordial in tablespoonful doses once or twice a day is a good laxative and injections of tepid water before evacuation are also good. A salve of tannin and opium, or compound gall ointment may be used, but under direction of a physician to begin with. The greatest sufferers from piles and the most numerous are those who refuse to get a physician's advice and try to cure themselves.

In this department will be carefully considered any legal problem which may be submitted by a subscriber. All opinions given herein will be prepared at our expense by eminent counsel.

Inasmuch as it is one of the principal missions of COMFORT to aid in upbuilding and upholding the sanctity of the home, no advice will be given on matters pertaining to divorce. Any paid-up subscriber to COMFORT is welcome to submit inquiries, which, so far as possible, will be answered in this department. If any reader, other than a subscriber, wishes to take advantage of this privilege, it may be done by sending twenty-five (25) cents, in silver or stamps, for a one-year subscription to COMFORT thus obtaining all the benefits which our subscribers enjoy including a copy of the magazine for one full year.

Full names and addresses must be signed by all persons seeking advice in this column but not for publication. Unless otherwise requested, initials only will be published.

Mrs. A. A. W., Texas.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that all persons of sound mind, twenty-one years of age, may dispose of all their property, both real and personal, according to their own will, but that a will must be signed by the testator himself, or in his presence by his direction, and unless wholly written by himself, signed by two witnesses in his presence; we think it the better practise to have the will witnessed in any event. We do not think testator can bar his wife from her rights to the the property is homestead property.

O. R., North Dakota.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that one, of two owners of real estate, as tenants in common, can only convey such interest as he, himself, owns in the property, and that it would require the deed of both to convey good title to the whole of the property; in your state we do not think the signature of the wife is necessary to the conveyance of the real estate of the husband, unless the property is homestead property.

Mrs. E. D., Ohio.—We know of no law to compel your husband to speak more gently to you, unless, of course, his treatment of you amounts to cruelty, in which event we think you could make him support you in case you separated from him, but perhaps you can find some better solution of your troubles.

Mrs. D. A. S., Oklahoma.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that you cannot compel your husband to turn over to you any interest in his separate property, during his lifetime; we think you are entitled to support from him, and in case you survive him, we think upon his death you would be entitled to your share in his estate.

J. C., South Dakota.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that your county treasurer has a legal right to collect interest and penalties on taxes remaining unpaid after the expiration of the time allowed by law within which to make such payment.

S. S., Kentucky.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that a surviving husband is entitled to an estate for life in one third of his deceased wife's real estate held by her in fee simple, unless his claim has been barred by an absolute divorce or forfeited by living in adultery or otherwise released by him; we think in case a provision is made for him by will in lieu of this interest, he can elect which provision he prefers to take from her estate; except for this we think a married woman can dispose of her property by will in any manner she may see fit.

C. A. H., Tennessee.—We think that if your invention is in any way a complicated one it will be necessary for you to employ a patent lawyer to procure your patent and protect your interests in connection therewith; we think you should protect yourself against the dishonesty of your attorney by selecting one of good standing and a reputation for honesty.

E. S., Kansas.—Under the laws of Indiana, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man leaving no child or descendant and no parent, and leaving no will, his whole estate after payment of debts and expenses, would go to his surviving widow; we think such property as vested in him at the time of his mother's death would be included in and form part of his estate.

C. W. O'H., Perrysville, Ohio.—Upon your statements, we are of the opinion, that you should have refused to take the paper you mention from the postoffice or had the postmaster return same to sender, if you did not wish to bind yourself for payment of the subscription price.

H. N., New London, Iowa.—Under the laws of your state, we think you should apply to the juvenile court of your county or some other county court with similar functions for a widow's pension. We think that in your state, such pensions are allowed a dependent mother who is a widow or whose husband is an inmate of the institution under the State Board of control. We think the maximum allowance in your state for one child is two dollars a week. We can form no opinion as to whether you will be successful in such application without further information as to your financial condition. We think that you would not be entitled to any pension under the law unless you were entirely dependent and the children are entirely dependent upon you for their support.

C. M. V., Campbell, Mo.—As you will note by reading the heading of this column, it is not the policy of this paper to answer questions relating to divorce. We think you should take this question up with someone else.

Mrs. E. R., Edmondsville, Ill.—Upon your statements, we are of the opinion, that if your husband cannot come to an adjustment of his claim against the man you mention, he should bring action to enforce same. We think he should take action in this matter as soon as possible in order to protect himself against having his right to recovery barred by the statute of limitations.

Mrs. T. B., Calfox, Wash.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion, that except as to some limitations in favor of a surviving widow or husband and minor children, a decedent can dispose of his or her property by will in any manner he or she may see fit. We think, however, that such person must, at the time of making such will, possess testamentary capacity, must not be under undue influence and that the will must be legally drawn and executed and express his or her true intent, but the law allows a testator to prefer any one person above another in case he so desires and except as above stated.

H. A. M., Batesville, Ind.—We think the legal settlement of the estate of the woman you mention would be to have, an administrator appointed, and that such administrator should collect the assets of decedent and pay the just claims against the estate, dividing the balance, if any, among her children. We think that in case her personal property is not sufficient to pay the debts, her real estate or her interest in real estate could be disposed of to pay her debts, the balance, if any, being divided among her children. We think that each child would be legally entitled to an equal share of the estate, after payment of the just debts and expenses, but that debts and expenses are legally paid first and the balance of the estate only divided. Of course, if all of the children are adults, we think that it may be possible to settle the estate among themselves, through a series of releases and deeds to the real estate without the appointment of an administrator, but as a general rule, we think the appointment of an administrator and a legal settlement of the estate is a cleaner way to settle the estate.

Mrs. L. S., Janesville, Wis.—Upon your statements, we are of the opinion, that payment of the grocery bill against the man you mention can be enforced against any property he may own not exempt by law from levy under execution. Of course, if this man should move to another state, it would be probably necessary for his creditor to sue him in the state to which he moved.

Mrs. M. P., Houstonia, Mo.—Under the laws of your state, we do not think that the second wife of the man you mention nor his child by such second wife would have any interest in the real estate or other property which formerly belonged to his first wife, except such portion of the same as came to the husband absolutely upon the death of such first wife. Of course, this portion will upon his death be administered as part of his estate, but as to the first wife's estate, we think that unless she left a will making other disposition of same all her property, except the husband's share therein, would go to her own children and no further part would go to her husband's second wife or his children by a subsequent marriage.

minutes to soften the hard skin, then scrape gently with a soft brush and plenty of white soap. Wipe on a clean, soft rag, and while still soft and moist, rub with a mixture of equal parts of lard, flour of sulphur or carbolic vaseline. If necessary, repeat after three days. The gobbler might have had cholera, but as no other birds have been attacked, I am inclined to think he might have eaten some irritating substance. The best treatment for all such uncertain cases of bowel trouble is a dose of Castor oil—about three tablespoonfuls for a full-grown turkey.

Mrs. E. T., Rike Co.—As the goslings could not get out of doors, they should have had a tablespoonful of sharp sand or fine grit added to every cupful of food, and at least one half of the food should have been green stuff—young clover and grass cut fine and mixed with wheat bran. This is a good mash for goslings or young ducks. Water must be kept in vessels so constructed that the birds can only get their heads into them, but deep enough to allow them to submerge the whole head; otherwise the two small holes at the base of the bill, through which they breathe, get filled up with mash or dirt, and the birds die for want of sufficient air in the lungs. Goslings hatched from eggs laid by young geese are very liable to die off without any special cause. Geese should be at least two years old before they are used for breeding.

E. L.—As your land is too rocky to cultivate, the only remedy was lime or wood ashes, but I hope you have plowed it before the hatching season, and when you could keep the fowls shut up for a few days, as fresh lime and wood ashes are both severe irritants, and if picked up by fowls or chicks, will make their mouths sore, and if any quantity is swallowed, inflame the crop and cause bowel trouble. As you know the place has been infested for several years, it would be well to yard your fowls for a week or two in the fall, and dress the land very heavily with unslacked lime. Meantime, move all the brood coops as far from their old stand as possible, as I suppose you know the gapeworm is a parasite, and the eggs are often carried by earthworms that live in the ground that has been defiled for many seasons by poultry droppings. If you could confine the baby chicks to inclosures thickly covered with clean sand or cut hay or straw, it would prevent their being infected whilst too young to doctor. A good protective measure is to add three drams of silicate of soda to every quart of drinking water.

E. S. L.—As several birds were ill in the early spring with cramp and diarrhea, accompanied by foul breath, I fear your flock is in a bad condition, probably inbred, or have inherent roupy tendencies, which have been aggravated by the damp house in the spring and the overfeeding of table scraps and the lack of green vegetables in winter. Kill all birds whose breath is foul, and burn the carcases. Remove all pieces of fat from the table scraps. Mix a grain mash with Castor oil, and give the first thing in the morning. Three days later, repeat the dose. Feed about half the quantity you ordinarily give at breakfast time. Use all the oil the meal will take up without becoming sloppy. Follow this treatment by dissolving twelve tablets of mercury bichloride, one one-thousandth of a grain each, for three days. Stop feeding oats for a time, and let the birds have an unlimited supply of fresh green vegetables. Clean and disinfect the house and all fixtures.

L. S.—The only safe and honest way to prevent eggs you sell for table use being used for hatching is to keep no male birds with the hens, for if you use any method of killing the germ in a fertile egg, the result will be the same, viz.: decomposition of the germ, which will, of course, affect the whole egg, and cause it to be unusable within a few days.

J. M. E.—Had you opened the geese after death you would have found small growths on the kidneys, caused by a minute form of animal life called coccidia. They also attack hens, pigeons, and small animals, but in these cases the trouble is found in the small intestines, near the gizzard. In geese they attack the kidneys. As they are distributed in the bird's droppings, the disease is likely to spread through the flock and other poultry, unless the place is thoroughly cleaned and disinfected. The first symptom, which you probably did not notice, is loss of flesh, though the appetite remains good. A slight diarrhea is the only symptom until the end approaches, when the birds become suddenly weak and cannot stand. The treatment is to put three grains of sulphate of iron or fifteen grains of colchicum in every quart of drinking water, and give two tablespoonfuls of Castor oil every second night until they have had four doses. Better doctor the drinking water for the whole flock, and feed a mash of ground corn and Castor oil one day a week for three weeks to check any further outbreak.

26-Piece Daisy TABLE SET

Premium No. 6808

Sent To You Prepaid For A Club Of Eight

WE have in the past made many offers of table ware, but this is the first time we have ever been able to offer a complete set of 26 Pieces in return for such a small club of subscriptions. And please don't think that because we are giving away this set on such liberal terms that it is plated on a brass base and consequently will change color and have that "brassy" look just as soon as the plating wears off. This Set which we offer you here is plated on a white metal base therefore each and every piece is the same color all the way through and will not show signs of wear, even after years of constant use. As shown in the above illustration there are 26 pieces in this set—6 Knives, 6 Forks, 6 Teaspoons, 6 Tablespoons, Sugar Shell and Butter Knife. Each piece is full regulation size for family use, the handles are handsomely embossed and decorated with the beautiful Daisy design which is now so popular and the blades of the knives and the bowls of the teaspoons and tablespoons are perfectly plain and bright polished.

WARRANTED FOR FIVE YEARS

It is only because we buy this set in large quantities direct from the factory that we are able to secure it at a price that enables us to offer it as a premium for so few subscriptions. It is by far the greatest value we have ever offered, in fact we are so sure that it will please and satisfy all who accept this offer we are going to guarantee every Set sent out for a period of five years. We will send this beautiful 26-Piece Daisy Set exactly as illustrated and described to any address upon the terms of the following special

Club Offer. For a club of eight one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 25 cents each, we will send you this 26-Piece Daisy Table Set Free by Parcel Post prepaid. Premium No. 6808.

"Virtue itself offends when coupled with forbidding manners."—Bishop Middleton.

In order to meet the demand for information made by COMFORT subscribers on the kindred subjects of Etiquette and Personal Appearance, this column will be devoted to them, and all questions will be answered, but no inquirer shall ask more than two questions each month. We would suggest to readers to cut this column out and paste it in a scrap book. Address letters to Etiquette Editor, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

Troubled, Chestertown, N. Y.—Maybe a Seventh Day Adventist, aged twenty, and a Roman Catholic, aged thirty-five, might marry and live happily ever after, both loving as you say you do, for love overcometh all things, but if the Seventh Day Adventist says she does not want to be married by a priest, and insists on not being so married, then there will be no marriage, at least no marriage that is a sacrament, because according to the principles of the Roman Church, the ceremony must be performed by a priest. Of course, if they love each other with the love that knows no turning, there will be a marriage in spite of Seventh Day Adventism and Roman Catholicism, and objecting parents and every other earthly obstacle. Have both of you got it that good and plenty? If not, better stop now before the trouble begins. (2) Third cousins may marry as they are not considered sufficiently consanguineous to make any difference. (3) No lady should ever try to win back any gentleman who shows no signs of coming back of his own accord. Love is not a winable proposition.

Kid, Spencer, W. Va.—You may be abused at home and life may seem to be very hard for you there, because sixteen-year-old girls have youth and spirits, but it is much safer there for you than to go out and try to make your own way in the world, unless you are prepared to do well some kind of work which will support you comfortably. We should advise you to study stenography, because you cannot acquire that until you have learned to spell and write grammatically which you are far from doing now.

Daht, Weatherford, Okla.—We hope you will have better judgment than your mother had, and not marry at fifteen, but in the mean time, don't imagine that you know more than your mother does now and can better take care of yourself than she can. We think she should watch you very closely now, but as you grow older, she should permit you to meet the respectable young men of your community and associate with them and she should meet them herself and know what kind of company her daughter is keeping. Parents neglect this safeguard and then wonder why their daughters get into bad company and sometimes come to harm. You are lying to your mother now and playing the sneak to have company, and she is partly to blame, but not nearly as much as you are, for she is trying to do right and you are not.

Butterfly, Cogswell, N. Dak.—You sign yourself "Butterfly," but you are not old enough to be out of the cocoon, or you would know that it is very bad form for a lady to try to win a gentleman's attention, especially as his father has an auto which he is allowed to drive at times. He knows you and where you live and if he wants you to have his attention he will bring it around to you without any effort on your part beyond the usual ladylike politeness. You are too young yet anyhow for the attention of gentlemen, and don't spoil your future chances by seeking them instead of letting them seek you.

B. B. S., Britton, S. Dak.—Don't measure the true worth of a man by his stature. The height of his mind above the average is not gauged by the height of his head above the ground. If you love the five-foot man better than any other you know, he's the one for you, even if you are half a head taller. (2) It is proper for the lady to drive the gentleman's car, if he is willing to risk his neck and the value of the machine with her at the wheel. At the same time, some women are much safer and saner drivers than men. (3) Your writing is fair, but could be better, because if it could not be better, it would be perfect and there is nothing perfect in this world.

Doll, Burleson, Texas.—We have met talkless men and we know women who have married them and between us we have come to the conclusion that the man who can talk and won't talk is about the most tiresome thing on earth. If your caller will not talk when he comes to see you, we advise that you don't talk, either, and try the silent treatment on him and see how long he can stand your silence added to his own. We have asked several of these talkless individuals why they do not talk,—we know they know plenty of things to talk about—but have never yet received a satisfactory explanation. (2) If the lady does not wish to wear the gentleman's ring or pin, she should decline it when offered, instead of taking it and not wearing it. Do you think deceit is preferable to honest frankness? (3) Possibly when a lady is singing it would be rather difficult for her to return his smile, but conditions are rare when a smile is not to be returned. However, the gentleman should not smile at the lady when she is using her face in her vocal exercises.

Golden-hair, Guthrie, Okla.—Etiquette does not prescribe how long a lady shall, or may, go with a gentleman whom she does not intend to marry. He frequently prescribes that for himself. (2) A lady must either keep company with a gentleman who is present when the one she cares more for is absent, or have no company at all, which is a lonely life. (3) The only presents a lady may properly accept from a gentleman to whom she is not engaged are books, flowers, candy and other inexpensive evidences of masculine appreciation.

Blue-eyes, Plainview, Nebr.—It was inexcusable for the gentleman not to introduce his friend to the ladies he had invited to accompany them in his car. Did he forget it, or didn't he know any better? Sometimes introductions are overlooked inadvertently, and it is quite proper to call the host's attention to it good-naturedly by making your own introductions. We hope you did not spoil the occasion by declining to speak to the gentleman because he had not been introduced. That would have shown more ignorance of polite society than the failure to introduce.

Friend, Hickman, Ky.—A gentleman, who kept company with a lady and went to her house to a dance where he danced more with a lady "who wasn't considered much" than he did with his hostess, is utterly beyond the limits of the rules and regulations of polite manners. If he is further recognized by the lady who gave the dance, it will be her own fault.

Lonely Rose, Coulterville, Ill.—By all means wait a while longer till your two little girls have grown up to be able to take care of themselves and you, if necessary, and then, if your husband is as neglectful as he now is, you and the girls can quietly go away by yourselves and let him go his own way. During the years you must wait, you should do everything you can to have your daughters prepare themselves for positions that they can fill honorably and well. Your years of suffering should make you want to do all you can to prevent a similar fate befalling your daughters.

Wild Rose, Shuff, Va.—You can't be told what to say to the young men who call on you, or whom you meet elsewhere, because what you say will depend entirely upon the circumstances of your meeting. Certain set forms of speech are used on particular occasions, but even these are not rigid and one may shape them to suit the circumstances. Why don't you get a book on etiquette and study the subject? That's the best way to learn the theory of it. The practise you must get by going among people who know.

Black Eyes, Black Mountain, Okla.—When a gentleman takes a lady to an entertainment at which they must be separated until it is over, they should before parting settle between them on some point where they should meet again. If both of you were too careless to do this, or didn't know enough, you have our sympathy in trying to find each other after. (2) The lady waits for the gentleman to begin the correspondence.

He went slowly up-stairs, walked up and down the hall once or twice, then rapped again upon Edith's door.

There was no response from within.

He knocked again.

Still silence!

He tried the door.

It was not locked; it yielded to his touch, and he pushed it open.

A quick glance around showed him that no one was there, and with a great heart-throb of fear he boldly entered.

After a fruitless search of the rooms he turned into the rear hall and went down the back stairs.

Ah! the door at the bottom was ajar.

Another moment he was in the lower hall, to find the area door unfastened; then he knew how his bird had flown.

He instantly summoned the servants, and took them to task for their negligence.

Both the cook and the chambermaid avowed that no one but the gas-man had entered or gone out by the area door that afternoon.

But, upon questioning them closely, Emil Correlli ascertained that the outer door had been left unfastened "just a moment, while the man went to the meter, to take the figures."

A close search revealed the fact that the key to the stairway door was missing, and, putting this and that together, the keen-witted man reasoned out just what had happened.

Mr. and Mrs. Goddard returned about this time, both looking as if they also had met with some crushing blow, for the former was white and haggard, and the latter wild-eyed, and shivering from time to time, as if from a chill.

Both were apparently too absorbed in some trouble of their own to feel very much disturbed by the flight of Edith, although Mr. Goddard's face involuntarily lighted for an instant when he was told of her escape.

Emil Correlli flew to the nearest telegraph office and dashed off a message to a New York policeman, with whom he had had some dealings while living in that city, giving him a description of Edith, and ordering him, if he could lay his hands upon her, to telegraph back, and then detain her until he could arrive and relieve him of his charge.

He reasoned—and rightly, as we have seen—to her old home, where she knew every crook and turn, rather than to seek refuge in Boston, where she was friendless and a comparative stranger.

A few hours later he received a reply from the policeman, giving him an account of his adventure with Miss Edith Allandale and her escort.

"By heavens, she shall not thus escape me!" he exclaimed; and at once made rapid preparations for a journey.

Half an hour afterward he was on the eleven o'clock express train, in pursuit of the fair fugitive, in a state of mind that was far from enviable.

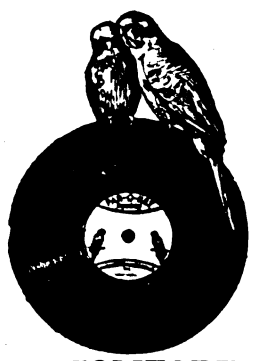
How You Can Get This Story In Book Form



If you do not care to wait for the monthly installments of this serial as they appear in COMFORT we will be glad to make you a present of the complete story in book form. You will enjoy reading this thrilling story of mingled romance and tragedy for it is one of the very best Mrs. Georgie Sheldon has written. The heroine is a refined and beautiful character that will challenge your wonder and admiration and stir the heart's strongest emotions. The story is full of action which moves rapidly through a succession of startling events to the final chapter. The "Masked Bridal" will run as a serial in COMFORT through the fall, winter and spring months, but you need not wait in order to get the complete story. Send us only one one-year subscription (not your own) to COMFORT at 25 cents, or your own subscription, renewal or extension of your present subscription for one year at 25 cents and 5 cents additional (30 cents in all) and we will send you a copy of the book free and postpaid.

Don't Spend Money For Records!

Get Them Free By Raising Clubs For COMFORT!

IF you own a phonograph you know what it costs to buy records for it. You know it is a big expense. Here, now, is your opportunity to get your records without paying a cent. By special and exclusive arrangement with the manufacturers we have secured the privilege of offering the new Par-O-Ket records as premiums to COMFORT readers.

Par-O-Ket records are not the cheap ten and fifteen cent kind. They are 7¼ inch, double disc (a selection on both sides)—made by the finest musical talent—and in tone quality are equal to higher priced records. They will play as long as any 10-inch record—and on any machine using the ordinary steel needles. If you have a "Victor" or a "Columbia" only a simple attachment is necessary—can be put on in a minute by a child—and we furnish the attachment as explained below. If your machine is any other make having the universal tone arm no attachment at all is needed.

We publish below a partial list of the latest, most popular song hits, dance music, concert and other instrumental numbers which can now be had in these new Par-O-Ket records. Send at once for at least one of them to convince yourself that they are really high grade and just as satisfactory as the higher priced records. We guarantee you will be pleased, and that you will spend no more money for records knowing that you can now get them from us without cost. When ordering be sure to give the number of each record wanted, and if your machine is a "Victor" or a "Columbia" send us one extra one-year subscription (not your own) at 25 cents or 12 cents cash for which we will send you the necessary attachment postpaid. We will send you your choice of these records upon the terms of the following CLUB OFFER. For two one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 25 cents each we will send you any one Par-O-Ket double disc record (two different selections) free by parcel post prepaid. For four one-year subscriptions at 25 cents each we will send you any two records, for six one-year subscriptions any three records—and so on. In other words, send two one-year subscriptions at 25 cents each for each record wanted. When ordering be sure to give number of each record wanted.

REMEMBER—a small and simple attachment is necessary to play these records on either a Victor or Columbia machine. We will send you this attachment if you will send us one extra one-year subscription (not your own) to COMFORT at 25 cents or, if you prefer, you can send 12 cents cash. If your machine is a Victor ask for Attachment No. 8051. If it is a Columbia ask for Attachment No. 8061.

3 Wheel Chairs in June

418 is COMFORT'S Total to Date

Only three wheel chairs in June is indeed disappointing; the more so because the present year, up to June, has been the biggest and most successful in the history of our Wheel-Chair Club. Why this sudden decline in activities and drop in results in June? Is it due to the disturbing influence of the war? Or is it the weather? Or are people too busy planting and cultivating on an unusually large scale to give their accustomed thought and time to the interests of helpless shut-in sufferers? I know the weather has been unfavorable, the spring has been late and you have had your hands full of work, but I implore you not to forget or neglect the appeals of the shut-ins for aid in procuring wheel chairs. Surely you can find time to do your "bit" as usual for them.

The three June wheel chairs go to the following shut-ins. The figures opposite their names indicate the number of subscriptions sent in by them or by their friends in their behalf.

Mrs. Martha Timberlake, Sidan, Miss., 127; Paul S. Forbes, Shawboro, N. C., 105; Mrs. Catherine Fraisure, R. R. 1, Box 18, Fort White, Fla., 93.

Mrs. Timberlake, age 79, is a helpless paralytic. She suffered a stroke of paralysis five years ago. She is a widow dependent on her two daughters, one a widow, and both in poor health. The wheel chair will be a great boon to these women.

Paul S. Forbes, age 20, is so crippled by rheumatism and hip disease that he can not walk. He has been afflicted with sickness, pain and suffering all his life; when a small boy he fell a victim to the terrible hip disease. He is dependent on his parents. He and they will be very grateful for the much needed wheel chair.

Mrs. Fraisure, age 65, suffers severely from rheumatism which has drawn one of her legs up so that she can not touch the floor with her foot. She writes me that she is confined to her room, but if she had a wheel chair she could get out and about. She is a widow and is dependent on her married daughter who has a good husband but not plentifully endowed with worldly goods.

You will find this month's Roll of Honor and the following letters of thanks interesting. Give the poor cripples a helping hand by boosting the efforts of our Wheel-Chair Club.

Sincerely yours,
W. H. GANNETT, Publisher of COMFORT.

P. S. For the information of our many new subscribers let me explain that for each and every 200 new one-year subscriptions to COMFORT, at 25 cents each, sent in either singly or in clubs by persons who direct that they are to be credited to COMFORT'S WHEEL-CHAIR CLUB instead of claiming the premiums to which they would be entitled, I give a FIRST-CLASS INVALID WHEEL CHAIR to some needy crippled Shut-in and pay the freight, too. It is a large and expensive premium for me to give for that number of subscribers, but I am always glad to do my part a little faster each month than you do yours. Any shut-in who has friends to help him get subscriptions can obtain a wheel chair free. Write me for information.

Wish You Could Have Seen Her Enjoying the First Use of Her Wheel Chair

OAKWOOD, GA.

DEAR MR. GANNETT:

The wheel chair that we have been working to get for Miss Ann Allen came in perfect condition and very fine indeed and freight charges all prepaid. I can't thank you enough for it. My husband and I took it to Miss Ann and put her in it and rolled her about the house and to the table where she ate her dinner which she enjoyed the better for the wheel chair which enabled her to eat with the family in comfort. I wish you could have seen her enjoyment and pleasure at that time. Miss Ann is grateful to you and sends her thanks to all who helped to get the chair for her. The chair will be a joy to her and a great help to her sister, Miss Martha, in caring for her. I hope it will be so I can help get another wheel chair for another shut-in. Sincerely your friend, MRS. T. A. IVEY.

Sure Her Wheel Chair Will Be a Comfort to Her

EUREKA, UTAH.

DEAR MR. GANNETT:

The wheel chair has come and I am much pleased with it. I am sure it will be a comfort and I shall get so much pleasure out of it. I cannot express my gratitude to you and those who helped me get it. With many thanks, I remain your grateful friend,
MRS. L. T. CARTER.

Little Cripple Girl Enjoys Her Wheel Chair

VERNON, Box 46, CONN.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I received my wheel chair all right and was more than pleased with it. The first day I got it I had my mother put me in it and now I have got so I can get from one room to the other very handy and find great comfort in it. I can sit up straight in it, which I couldn't do when I was in bed. I don't know what I would do without it now as I can't use my legs, but I think my arms are getting stronger, and you don't know how much better I feel in the chair. I ate my supper at the table sitting in my wheel chair for the first time in four months the night my chair came. You don't know how thankful I am to you all for the chair. Thanking you all with all my heart,
Yours truly, WILHELMINA MOORE.

P. S.—I wrote this just as the little girl wanted me to, as her hands are not quite strong enough yet to write much. Her father, WILLIAM MOORE.

Comfort's Comicalities "Jest for Fun"

The Famous Beau Brummel

It was Beau Brummel who was described as the "glass of fashion and the mold of form" and today there are ordinarily only two things which the famous dandy of the English court suggests. One is an arbiter of fashion, and the other the incident in which Brummel asked of a companion of the Prince of Wales; "Who is your fat friend?"

Eighty years ago Beau Brummel was still living though today the character seems little more than tradition, but he was very real, though an obscure individual without fortune or rank. However, he conceived the idea of placing himself at the head of society in a country the most thoroughly aristocratic in Europe, relying, too, upon no other weapon than well-directed insolence; for the same individual to have triumphed splendidly over the highest and the mightiest—to have maintained a contest with royalty itself and to have come off victorious even in that struggle—for such a one no ordinary faculties must have been demanded.

A paper published in 1836 recalls the fact that George Bryan Brummel's father was Lord North's secretary, that the son at Eton and later at Baliol college acquired a reputation for being a "swell dresser," and that still later he was a favorite of the Prince of Wales who was to become George IV. of Great Britain.

The familiar story of the "fat friend" immortalized in a Punch cartoon, explaining the circumstances which led up to it, has so often been told. A mutual friend had dared Brummel to give an order to Wales, who was then Prince Regent, and at a dinner the dandy said to him: "Wales ring the bell." The Prince did so, and when a servant appeared said: "Show Mr. Brummel to his carriage."

It was to repay the Regent for this public humiliation that Beau Brummel uttered his famous question the next day in the street. The Prince was growing corpulent and sensitive of the fact, so a feud between the two was launched with the remark.

Up to this point the story is not new but there are other facts which the Mirror, a publication devoted to literature and the fine arts—almost a hundred years ago gave to the world and they have not been probably published since.

Beau Brummel boasted that he would put the Prince Regent out of fashion, and made his plans at once and sprang his coup at a brilliant ball given by the Duchess of Devonshire: In the Mirror's own words—"When the whole assembly were conversing upon his supposed disgrace, Brummel suddenly stood in the midst of them. Could it be indeed Brummel? Could it be mortal who thus appeared with such an encincture of radiant glory about his neck? Every eye was upon him, fixed in stupid admiration; every tongue, as it recovered from its speechless paralysis, faltered forth with 'What a cravat!'"

And then the description of the cravat which confounded the guests at the Duchess of Devonshire's ball:

"There it stood, smooth and stiff, yet light and almost transparent; delicate as the music of Ariel, yet firm as the spirit of Regulus; bending with the grace of Appollo's locks, yet erect with the majesty of the Olympian Jove; without a wrinkle, without an indentation. What a cravat! The Prince Regent saw and shook, and uttering a faint gurgle from beneath the wadded bag which surrounded his royal thorax, he was heard to whisper with dismay: Damn him, what a cravat! The triumph was complete."

Stumped

Little Lemuel—"Say, paw, what does 'cleave' mean?"

Paw—"It means to unite or stick together."

Little Lemuel—"Then if a butcher cleaves a bone does he stick it together, paw?"

Paw—"Why—er—I guess in that case it does mean to separate, son."

Little Lemuel—"And when a man separates from his wife does he cleave to her, paw?"

Paw—"Young man, you go and tell your maw it's time you were in bed."

The Terrified Traveler

The dangers of travel by sea at this time have played havoc with the nerves of timid passengers.

Early one morning recently there was considerable commotion on the decks of a coastwise vessel plying between Savannah, Ga., and Baltimore, Md., when a scantily clad man hurried from his stateroom and dashed toward the upper deck. On the way he ran into the captain of the vessel.

"What's the matter, captain?" he managed to gasp. "Have we been torpedoed?"

"Calm yourself, my dear sir, and be prepared for the worst," answered the official.

"Oh, don't tell me we're going down!" moaned the other. "Quick, where are the life preservers?"

"They wouldn't be of any service at this stage," explained the captain.

"Too late?" quavered the despairing passenger.

"Yes," said the captain, very solemnly. We've done all we can for you. You'll have to look out for yourself from now on. You see, we've just tied up to the dock."

That "Stale" Egg

Some workmen on an ostrich farm in South Africa one day found an unexploded artillery shell left by gunners who had been at target practise on the plains a few days before. Not knowing it was loaded, they whitewashed it and placed it in an ostrich's nest, thinking to play a joke upon the boss.

The next morning one of the hands, an Irishman, came around to look for eggs, and finding, as he thought, a large one, he seized on it at once.

In his astonishment at finding it so heavy he dropped it, with the result that it exploded with direful effect. Pat was hurled several yards away but, strangely enough, beyond lying stunned for a few minutes he was unhurt.

"Whew, boys!" he murmured, when he recovered his speech, "bedad, that egg was the stalest I iver came across!"

"Auto" Be Ashamed

A New York man was driving an automobile over one of the smooth, hard roads of New Jersey when a man suddenly appeared in the highway and held up a warning hand.

"Halt!" he exclaimed in a voice that had the ring of authority. "You are exceeding the speed limit."

"What are you talking about?" indignantly cried the autoist, bringing his machine to a stop. "I wasn't going fifteen miles an hour,"

"That's what they all say. You can tell your story to the justice of the peace. It's just seven miles beyond. Drive on, please."

There was no help for it, and seven miles for the autoist were slowly traversed. Finally the town came in sight.

"Much obliged to you, pard," said the man, jumping from the car and starting away. "I hated to take advantage of you, but I was so tired I couldn't walk another step."

Very Unusual

"I had an unusual experience today."

"That so? What happened?"

"I upset an ink bottle on a clean tablecloth."

"Nothing unusual about that."

"Yes, there was. The bottle was empty."

Wrong Quarry

With a wild sweep the wind tore around a corner and removed the hat from the head of a respectable and near-sighted citizen who chanced to be passing.

Peering wildly around the man thought he saw his hat in a yard, behind a high fence. Hastily climbing over, he started to chase it, but each time he thought he had caught it it got yet another move on. Then a woman's angry voice broke on his ears.

"What are you doing there?" she demanded, shrilly.

He explained mildly that he was only trying to retrieve his hat. Whereupon the woman said, in wonder:

"Your hat? I don't know where it is, but that's our little black hen you're chasing."—Tit-Bits.

The Voice of Authority

"Well, Aunt Rachel," said the young lady in the traveling suit, "I shall have to bid you a long farewell."

"If you're going on this train, ma'am," said the conductor, signaling to the engineer to go ahead, "you'll have to make it pretty short."

The City Nephew

Willie was on a visit to his uncle in the country and was watching him milking one evening. When he returned to the house his aunt asked him: "Is Uncle Hezzie through milking yet, Willie?"

"Not yet," answered Willie. "He's finished two faucets and has just commenced on the other two."

That's Right

The teacher was asking questions. She said:

"Now, pupils, how many months have twenty-eight days?"

"All of them, teacher," replied the boy on the front seat.

Good Advice

A minister was questioning his Sunday school concerning the story of Eutychus, the young man who, listening to the preaching of the Apostle Paul, fell asleep and, falling out of a window, was taken up dead.

"What," he asked, "do we learn from this solemn event?"

The reply from a little girl came:

"Please, sir; ministers should learn not to preach too long sermons."—Tit-Bits.

Had to Have Him

The artful boy applied for a job.

"Do you want a boy?" he asked of the manager of the offices, standing before him, cap in hand.

"Nobody wants a boy," replied the manager, with unpleasant emphasis on the "wants."

"Do you need a boy?" asked the applicant, nowise abashed.

"Nobody needs a boy," came the discouraging reply.

The boy stuck his cap on the back of his head.

"Well, then, mister," he inquired, "do you have to have a boy?"

The manager collapsed.

"I am sorry to say that we do," he replied, "and I think you're about what we have to have."

Just a Sample

Jacky had been asked out to a "grown-up" dinner. Swelling with pride, he took his seat at the bottom of the table and looked round—slightly awestruck—at the imposing collection of aunts and uncles.

Then his attention became fixed on the ancient relative who was carving an enormous turkey, and his mouth watered as he saw the big helpings being handed round.

But the carver, who did not know much about little boys, cut off a tiny portion for Jacky

"Is that the part of the bird you like, my little man?" he asked, as the servant handed Jacky the plate.

Jacky looked at it a moment and then handed it back.

"Yes," he said; "I'll have some of that, please."

Bereaved

A vicar in England visited a widow, 75 years old, who had six children, all of whom had married and left her. The clergyman endeavored to sympathize with her. "Well, Mrs. Higgins," he said, "you must feel lonely now."

"Yes, sir," she said, "I do feel it lonesome. I've brought up a large family and here I am living alone. An' I misses 'em an' I wants 'em, but I misses 'em more than I wants 'em.—Christian Register.

The Prince of Wales sent an emissary to Beau Brummel to learn the secret of the wonderful creation in neckwear, and that Brummel sent back word: "Tell your master that you have seen his master."

It was not until his debts forced him to leave England and to take the obscure position of British Consul at Caen, in France, where he contracted more debts and finally died insane in 1840, that the secret of the cravat became known.

There was found, after his departure, written upon a sheet of paper upon his table, the following epigram of scorn: "Starch is the man."

The cravat of Brummel was merely starched. Henceforth starch was introduced into every cravat in Europe.

Touching Wood

How we love to find our weaknesses duplicated in other folk—most especially if they are personages! It tickled me to read the other day that when Mr. Asquith referred in a war speech in the house of commons to the insignificant number of British losses in the transport of men and stores to the theater of war, the first Lord of the admiralty, A. J. Balfour, leaned forward and gravely touched the wood of the clerk's tables. His colleagues on the front bench who observed his perfomance of this superstitious rite smiled not cynically but amusedly, but Mr. Balfour's face never relaxed.

It surprised me to find on investigation that this "touching wood" as a supposed safeguard from the consequences of exultation or boasting is a superstition of ancient origin. Authorities on these mythological matters tell us that it dates from the time when the oak, the ash were held sacred to the gods of the heathen. All the while I had a suspicion it was the byproduct of a "touch" habit so generally practised on and off the American stage!

Investigation further disclosed the fact that in many parts of England the custom of "touching wood" still prevails just as it did among past generations. In Scotland the superstition of the touch is not unknown, although in their case it is "iron" that is believed to possess the charm of averting evil. For instance, it is the fisher people of Scotland, who regard the sight or mention of a pig as a bad omen, who are accustomed to "touch iron."

There is an amusing story told of a clergyman who was preaching to a congregation of Scotch fisherfolk. He read the chapter dealing with the Ganderene swine. The first mention of these animals perturbed the congregation. Both men and women fumbled for nails in the woodwork of the pews or in the soles of their boots. At the second mention of the swine there were murmurs of "Cauld iron" and before the minister had finished the chapter he was reading to empty pews.

Biggest Port in World

Figures recently issued by the department of commerce show that the total imports and exports of New York City for the past year reached nearly $2,125,000,000. This exceeds London's annual foreign trade and makes New York the biggest port in the entire world.

Year's Wheat Crop

Forecasts recently made by the Department of Agriculture place this year's wheat crop at a much lower figure than it was a year ago. Insects working in Kansas, Oklahoma and other states are largely responsible for the shortage of winter wheat, and the late spring has also materially reduced the acreage of spring wheat.

Overland

The Smile That Won't Come Off

What is her smile worth to you? Probably nothing you could do would bring quite so much gladness into her life as to drive home some afternoon and say "How do you like your new car?"

It would mean her liberation—and a bigger, broader, healthier, happier life for the whole family.

Nothing else would make that smile so nearly her habitual expression.

Isn't that worth far more than it costs?

In the Willys-Overland line of motor cars is the car of her heart's desire which you can buy for her and still keep on friendly terms with your pocketbook.

It is the most complete line of motor cars ever built by any one producer.

And there is a distinct advantage for you in many types built by one producer.

Our total production of motor cars is huge—second only to one other producer of very much smaller cars.

This huge production enables us to distribute costs over a larger number of cars and to produce every type of car with virtually the same proportionate saving as though our entire production was centered on the one model of your selection.

And so you now can have virtually any kind of car you want at a lower price for the value offered than any other producer can deliver.

Look over the Willys-Overland line—you can discern this excess value with half an eye—and you have a wide range of selection.

And after you have made your selection you have the satisfaction of knowing that back of your car you have a company that stands four square for integrity of value in its product throughout the whole of its life in your service.

See the Willys-Overland dealer and make your selection now so that she may begin without delay to wear "the smile that won't come off."

COMFORT

The Key to Happiness and Success in over a Million and a Quarter Homes

Vol. XXIX — 1917 — No. 10

"Suffering Caesar! what does it all mean?"

They were executing some very graceful steps.

"I happen to be, yes," she replied with terrible frigidity.

Van Allyn stroked the kitten for some time.

Were they married? Why, of course!

THOUGHTS THAT BREATHE AND WORDS THAT BURN

Frenzied Economy and Miserly Hoarding Rank Next to Wanton Waste in Evil Consequences

THE great crusade against waste is making a profound impression and serving a most beneficial purpose, but some of the war-economy propaganda is so injudicious and even mischievous in its tendency that a warning against the danger of frenzied economy and miserly hoarding seems to be in order. Wastefulness, especially of food, is a sin any time and in the present exigency of the world war is unpardonable. Make every scrap of good food count. Waste nothing that is useful and avoid extravagance but do not be penurious. There is no economy in reducing the quantity, variety and nourishing quality of the food allowance to yourself and family below the requirements of health and strength. Such curtailment would result surely in weakness and inefficiency and probably in sickness. Tuberculosis preys on the underfed while pellagra finds its victims among those whose diet is unbalanced through lack of sufficient meat, milk and eggs. In order to feed our soldiers and our allies we must economize food by eliminating waste, but to produce the necessary munitions will strain the energies of our entire people, and insufficient nourishment would impair their efficiency as disastrously as it would that of our soldiers.

Our government has also assumed the stupendous undertaking of financing this war not only for ourselves but as well for our allies who are near the limit of their financial resources. The money has to come from our people through loans and taxation, and in order to bear this burden every line of productive industry must prosper. Everybody must be kept busy producing, earning and, what is equally necessary, spending the normal proportion of their earnings so to consume the products of industry and keep money in circulation. If the people stop buying business will stagnate, industrial products will accumulate, factories will shut down, workers be thrown out of employment, earnings cease and the result will be general business depression and hard times.

We shall feed our army and have a surplus of food to supply the needs of our allies by producing larger crops and eliminating waste without scanting the diet of our own people. With the present prospect of a larger harvest than last year of all principal crops, especially potatoes, food prices are dropping.

Likewise if the people do not get panicky in their notions of economy and penurious in their expenditures the country will prosper amazingly, for there will be a paying job for everybody that wants work and a market for every product of farm, mine and factory. Money will be plenty—there never was so much money in this country—but the need is to keep it moving. The war taxes and the money raised by the Liberty Loan will be expended and the larger part of it will find its way back to the pockets of those who have labor or products to sell. In a recent message on this subject President Wilson said: "It is evident to every thinking man that our industries on the farm, in the shipyard, in the mines, in the factories, must be made more prolific and more efficient. We need prosperity in war time even more than when we are at peace. Business depressions are always bad, doubly so when we have a fight on our hands. The declaration of war can have no real effect upon business. What bad effects are apparent are purely psychological and largely of our own foolish making, for our markets are the same in April as they were in March. We need more business, not less. There is real danger in hysteria! Indiscriminate economy will be ruinous! Now is the time to open the throttle. The Council of national Defense gives excellent advice when it says: 'To prosecute a war successfully requires money and lots of it. The only source from which money can be obtained is from the people who have it.'

"The only way people can get money is by producing something whether the product be that of brain or brawn and exchanging that product for money. Then the use of that money to purchase something which somebody else produces keeps it in circulation, encouraging production and furthering business activity.

"A single dollar in active circulation contributes more towards promoting general prosperity than the entire wealth of this nation if allowed to remain dormant. There is more money in the country today than ever before in our history. The government is preparing to raise several billions of dollars, but that does not mean that these billions are to be withdrawn from circulation. Every man supplying his own wants makes it possible for another man to supply his wants. No nation whose people confine themselves to the bare necessities of life ever became rich or prosperous.

"The Council of National Defense then exhorts us to 'Live as we have lived, clothe ourselves, build homes, keep our factory fires burning, keep our men employed, buy implements and machinery for the farms and to build our roads as busily as always.'"

That is excellent advice and only as we follow it can we avoid disaster and win the war. This is not a mere theoretical conclusion, for the identical course here recommended has been tried out by our neighbor Canada with eminently satisfactory results during her three years of active participation in the great war. Canada, with a population ten times smaller than that of the United States and with less than that proportion of wealth, has raised and equipped nearly half a million soldiers for this war and has sustained her full share of the financial burden. The same ratio would mean an army of five million men from the United States. Yet, because of her moderate system of taxation and wise financial and industrial policies, Canada has experienced a continually increasing measure of prosperity since the beginning of the war. In the light of Canada's brilliant achievement like results can be confidently predicted for our own country in this war.

All Suffer from the Effect of the Liquor Traffic

IT has often been pointed out that nobody can escape his share of the burden imposed on the nation by the liquor evil. Directly or indirectly the enormous loss and damage reaches and affects everybody in innumerable ways. One way, that few would think of, recently came to light in the testimony of J. D. A. Merrow, of the Pittsburg Coal Producers' Association, before the Interstate Commerce Committee of the U. S. Senate. Mr. Merrow said: "Eliminate strong drink from the coal producing States and coal production can be increased twenty-five million tons a year with an adequate car supply. Alcoholic liquor is one of the worst enemies of the miners in western Pennsylvania. It is impossible to get men to work more than a few days a week even when the car supply permits. The same trouble exists in Illinois and Ohio."

The entire country is, and during the past year has been, suffering from the scarcity and high price of coal. Not only have the people felt the pinch in their homes but in many instances the shortage has been such as to shut down factories for a time and seriously interfere with the operation of railroads and steamships and thereby caused an interruption of business and even threatened a food famine in certain sections last winter. The present shortage foreshadows like distressing conditions next winter. Herein is another strong argument in favor of a national prohibitory law to prevent these coal-producing States from imperiling the health, comfort and safety of the people of other states by permitting the sale of liquor. The country at large has a vital interest in having an adequate coal supply which at present is menaced by the inebriety of these miners and has a right to protect itself by appropriate legislation. It was hoped that Congress would give us nation-wide prohibition as a war measure to promote the general efficiency of the nation and to conserve for much needed food purposes the eighty-five million bushels of grain that it takes to make a year's supply of beer and whiskey, but present indications point to a victory for the liquor interests.

It is understood, of course, that not all coal miners are slaves of the drink habit; there are many sober, industrious men among them. Neither do the coal miners constitute the only class of laborers among whom the excessive use of intoxicating liquor is prevalent to a degree largely injurious to their own welfare and that of the nation.

Vice Protected and Crime Unpunished through Official Corruption

THAT vice and crime commercialized and organized are rampant in all our larger cities is a national scandal that has become notorious through numerous exposures which in recent years have become so common, following one after another in rapid succession, that they attract little public attention and rarely arouse any concerted public action to mitigate the evil. Such a condition cannot exist without the corrupt connivance of the officials whose duty it is to suppress it. Through the indifference or protection of local authorities the white slave trade flourishes despite the efforts of the Federal Government to break it up.

It is but a few years since Lieutenant Becker of the New York police paid the death penalty in the electric chair for instigating a gang of "gun men" to murder a gambler who had set out to inform against him. But his fate and the general shaking up consequent on the investigation of his case appear to have made no lasting impression on his fellow officers, for the investigation of the recent murder of Ruth Cruger, an innocent girl of tender years by a lecherous brute in human form, has brought to light a horrifying prevalence of vice in New York that has again subjected the police of that city to renewed suspicion and started an official inquiry.

According to complaints on file more than 800 girls between the ages of ten and twenty years had disappeared from their homes in that city between the first of January and the twentieth of June. How little attention was given these complaints is shown by the fact that the police had no accurate figures as to how many of these missing girls had returned to their homes. Presumably those of the missing girls that were not otherwise accounted for had fallen victims to the white slave traders. The business being thoroughly and systematically organized the regular practise is to hurry the girls, as soon as captured, to a distant city beyond the range of search by their friends and relatives.

German People Tired of Autocracy

RECENT food riots in German cities and other public demonstrations of unrest indicate that the German people are tired of military despotism, but Prussian bayonets and the hope of victory through a separate peace with Russia have enabled the war lords to keep them in leash. Now that this hope has been blasted by the brilliant victory with which the Russian army has initiated its resumption of hostilities the peace party has become insistent in demanding that the people be given a voice in the government, and the Kaiser has offered some concessions. This is a gratifying development tending toward an early ending of the war.

The Message

Anna S. Ells

Each message had touched the baby lips; each prayer was sent out across its downy head.

The sleet stung him; he shook his head to clear the icy drops from his eyelids.

He was alone with God.

Copyright, 1917, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

LONG after he had left her she sat motionless in the home that was now only a house, for he was gone—gone forth as did the men of old, to fight for home and country.

Tensely she sat listening. The sound of cheers came to her from the distant streets, crowned by martial music, triumphant as though victory were already won. The cheers and shouts of the people who drowned sorrow with noise, was as a dull background for her new and awful outlook on life, pierced by the lightenings of the bugle's call.

She was very bitter; for years each had struggled alone to bring about the perfection of their home together, and now this Juggernaut of war had blighted it. Love had shown a gentle God to whom it had been easy to pray, but this grim reaper of death was a stern Presence to whom a puny, individual, human soul was lost in the onrush of horror. No, she could not pray to the God of war. She was left quite alone.

Strangely still it seemed as though the world held its breath in silent suspense. She started and looked wildly around. No sound came now from the empty streets; the tramping feet were moving on—on toward the line of fire. They were not going to go; they were gone, beyond love's recall. He was gone! Great God in heaven, he was gone, gone to fight with death, and she was left alone.

She reached out her hands to the empty world, and the moan, so long suppressed, escaped her tortured lips. For a moment she seemed to see again his boyish face, then the darkness came.

When life struggled back, and those watching feared remembrance, a great light shone in her gray eyes; she had remembered her child, the little, loved one who was to come to bless her lonely days, and make the empty house a home again. Remembering she forgot the bugle's cry in the hope that held, like a single thread, her trust in God.

A month later her boy was born. She fought her own great battle with death on woman's common battlefield, and the victory was hers; she held in her weak arms his son. Could her full heart but bridge space and let him know! Hour after hour she thought of him; through the long nights she saw him fighting amid a rain of fire; she heard his moans as he lay dying, untended, on the field of battle; she saw him dead and cold and alone. When the sun shone she saw him doing wonders with his brave young life, his face aglow with victory. Out into the unknown she reached blindly, wildly for news of him. Only her dreams answered her dreams. There was no news from the front.

As she grew stronger her tireless hands found work to do for some brave man, perhaps for him who was more than man to her, the keeper of her heart, the father of her boy. Day after day she knitted the homely, warm, woolen socks so scorned at home, so welcome in the field, and in each sock she put the same message:

"John Brewster Winter:
"I hold our son in my arms while I wait for you. Keep brave for Tanette."

As she pushed each slip with its message of cheer deep into the toe of every sock, she sent into space toward that mighty force called God, a prayer. Perchance He might rest for a moment from looking at death, and catch the little cry as it sped through the air. Each message had touched the baby lips; each prayer was sent out across its downy head. God had reverenced motherhood.

Knee deep in half frozen mud stood John Brewster Winter in a trench at the front, his eyes lined along the gun he held in his red, chapped hands, too numb to sting with the biting cold. His brown hair was matted, the bristle of unshaven beard an irritation, not a protection to his weather-worn face. The sleet stung him; he shook his head to clear the icy drops from his eyelids, the better to see to kill. His gun barked; a peeping head crashed down. John Brewster Winter smiled grimly; his cracked lips bled as he moved them. He lined the gun again, but before he cold pull the trigger there came between him and the rain-soaked wretches waiting for "honorable death," a picture, Tanette, little Tanette. For a moment she stood before him as he had left her, trying bravely to smile, then through a darkness he could see her tossing in her pitiful agony. Great drops of perspiration stood on his half frozen face as he seemed to see her silent and cold, the tossing over, the brave little heart gone away into unfathomed mystery. Could he ever find her again amid the thousands who passed, unshriven, through the narrow gate of death? He only thought of her, Tanette. He had forgotten the child.

Half blinded by misery, he bleared along the line of his gun, and it spoke; another soul crowded among its fellows in the silent road to eternity. Could he bear another day like this?

Darkness came early this November night. The wind shrieked above the trenches; the sleet turned to snow that cut as it fell. It sank into the trodden, reddened mud, and blushed to find earth so foul. Other soldiers came to save their country with dying souls, wrecked lives, buried hopes, the glory of war, the honor of a nation. John Brewster Winter limped painfully away to rest, if rest there might be for body carrying its own pains, and soul full of anguish.

The word went round that supplies had come. There were forced mirth and rivalry, wild betting and rough jokes.

"Me for the silken hose," cried a Beau Brummel. "What's your color, old man, orange or rose?" He pointed to the box of clumsy, warm socks of every hue save white. John roused for a moment. Warmth to a soldier on a frozen battlefield is one of the little voices of God. He reached out his hand.

The Beau had chosen a mauve some artistic maid had wrought.

"Some blawsted maid with an eye knit yon foot-warmers, bless her heart!" he cried. "What say you to the crimson?"

"Brown for mine," answered John.

They looked so warm, like a jolly, little brown dog. Tanette had loved brown. John ran his bruised fingers along the long, soft length of them. How good they felt! How they reminded one that women still lived in this soul-tortured earth; that women still cared; that there were still homes to fight for, that God must still dwell on high. With misty eyes he held them closer. Around the curve of the heel his numb fingers crept. It was like touching a woman's hair. He was still human, still a living man. Perhaps Tanette still lived; perhaps—it was then he touched the toe; his fingers lingered; into his somber eyes a wonder crept. He turned aside to draw out the slips of paper. With assumed carelessness he swung toward the faint fight; no man should chaff over these notes from some woman's hand. His heart beat thunderously; no battle had shaken him like this. No, oh, no, he hoped nothing, but some woman from the world of women had spoken across the line of fire, and from that raging hell he reached out his hand, and found:

"John Brewster Winter:
"I hold our son in my arms while I wait for you. Keep brave for Tanette."

There were no battlefields for him; no comrades of the night. He was alone with God, and Tanette held "our son" while she waited.

Van Allyn's Circus Nightmare

By Joseph F. Novak

See front cover illustration.

VAN ALLYN stretched luxuriously, and picking up the flaming circus poster, he looked with boyish interest at the pictures emblazoned thereon. For some time he studied the sheet by the flaring light of the camp-fire. Behind him stood the tent, tinted red in the ruddy light, behind it rose the tall, silent trees, their shadows the blacker because of the firelight.

"Say, Gordon," he called softly, to a supine figure almost lost in the shadows.

"Ah-m-m-m-yaw-m," was the vague response.

"Gordon!" He gently kicked the soles of a pair of shoes lying at his feet, then his eyes followed the line of khaki trousers which ended at a leather belt. The rest of the man was lost.

"Ah-m-m-yaw, oh, don't bother me," mumbled Gordon.

"Let's row across the river to the circus tomorrow, shall we?"

"Yaa-s, anything you like, only don't disturb my dreams," Gordon yawned.

"I've a good notion to wait and see the circus come to town," continued Van Allyn. "Will you stay up?"

"Not me," answered Gordon, more promptly than a presumably sleepy person would answer.

"Did you ever meet Miss Leonora Galesworthy, Tommy? The golf champion, I mean?" inquired Van Allyn after a moment of silence.

"Naw," answered Tommy Gordon inelegantly. "What makes you mention her?"

"Because I understand she's camping around here somewhere," replied Van Allyn.

Gordon grunted.

"Well, I think we ought to try and meet her," persisted Van Allyn.

"Oh, don't bother me!"

"Well, if you're so stupid and sleepy and don't want to talk, go to bed. This night air is pretty heavy."

Gordon sat up with a sudden spring and rubbed his eyes.

"Coming too?" he inquired.

"No, I'm going to enjoy the lovely night and look my fill of that aggregation of stars," Van Allyn replied. "This is a wonderfully lovely mid-summer's night. Why, I wouldn't be a bit surprised if a drove of elves and fairies didn't visit me and tell me wonderful stories."

"Better be careful that a mob of imps don't fill you full of malaria germs," laughed Gordon. "Just see the heavy dew on the grass, and look at those fireflies! Did you ever see them so thick? It looks as if there is an electrical rain over the river. Good night, I'll leave you to your dreams," and he went into the tent.

Van Allyn stirred the fire a bit, and it snapped and cracked into a brighter blaze. He put on another log from the supply near-by, and when it flamed, he turned his attention to the poster again.

It was one of the old-time wood-cut affairs. A dozen splendid horses stood tirelessly upon their haunches, an immaculate ring-master cracking his whip above them. A dainty equestrienne stood on tiptoe on the flank of another splendid example of horse-flesh. A be-painted clown thrust his head through a paper hoop, another was rubbing his star-laden pate, the aforesaid stars being caused by still another clown who had just landed a slap-stick upon his colleague's head. Up in the air above all this, trapezists of both genders in gaudiest of tights and fleshlings, indulged the wildest sort of aerial flights, with proudly smiling faces.

"The best part of it is that they do exactly what they picture here," mused Van Allyn, as he looked at the bewildering lay-out.

He leaned back and stretched full length, his head resting on his hand on an elbow bent akimbo. The firelight lit up his handsome tanned features and dark curling hair thrust carelessly back from a fine forehead and temples.

As he lay thus, a faint meow came to him. He roused up a bit and in a not particularly inviting voice called:

"Come, kitty."

"Kitty" responded to the invitation, and nestled up. This feline wayfarer, a yellowish creature of mongrel breed, had strayed into an adjoining camp that day, and the children had adopted it temporarily. "Kitty" was now evidently seeking new pastures.

Van Allyn stroked the kitten for some time, when suddenly it said:

"Petting is extremely well for kittens, but now that I am grown up, it is hardly befitting. I am a lady and it isn't according to Dame Grundy for you to caress me, even if you are a human."

Now, if a little mongrel kitten should suddenly grow up to a full-sized female tigress and almost before your very eyes, wouldn't it be enough to make you use your favorite ejaculation? It was for Van Allyn, and he exclaimed:

"Suffering Cæsar! what does it all mean?"

"If you wish to know, sir," the lady tigress answered, "it simply means that we have captured you and you are to be a part of our circus. I am your trainer."

"Great heaven, have I changed into a beast?" he exclaimed. He looked at himself, but he was still clad in his gray shirt, whip-cord trousers and tan leggings, and he was still, to all appearances, human. Then he looked up at the lady tigress, and she regarded him as if he were a handsome collie.

"I don't think I'll put you through your act today; you look as if you were a little tired. Besides, I want to talk to Tessie, the lioness. She has been having trouble with her human."

And with the words, the lithe creature rose up and started off. Van Allyn rose to follow her, but she shooed him back sharply, opened a barred door deftly with her paws, and sprang out. The door locked automatically behind her.

"Well, this is certainly a pretty mess," mused Van Allyn. "Am I truly penned up?"

Indeed, he was, he discovered. But his cage was furnished most tastily. There were plenty of comfortable chairs about, a table, smoking set, cigars, matches and a bottle of seltzer. He sprang to the bars in protest, and railed angrily.

At this, the tigress came forward, but being a tender-hearted creature, she did not brandish a whip, but merely said:

"Now, behave yourself, Mr. Arthur Van Allyn. If you raise a fuss, the manager may order you flogged, a thing I wouldn't like to see. Take example from our species 'American Guide' across the way."

"This is splendid, being penned up by wild beasts and commanded to do their bidding. But what—as I live, I won't stand for that!" for across the way in a cage was Sam Billings, their guide, being whipped by a leopard.

"Quit that!" Van Allyn roared.

"Please stop," said the lady tigress angrily, "or I shall be obliged to do likewise."

Just then, Sam Billings began trowelling the air beautifully, in the manner Van Allyn had seen him do time and time again on the river, whereupon the leopard condescended to hand him a cigarette and an encouraging pat.

"Well," thought Van Allyn, "either I've gone crazy, or the coming circus has gone mad, or else the world is turned upside down. Changes are occurring before my very eyes, and seem plausible. Well, well, who'd ever think it?"

He turned and walked to the end of his cage. Just obliquely from it was another, and looking through the bars, he saw Gordon reading a magazine.

"Gordon," he called.

"Good morning," that gentleman greeted, as if it were perfectly proper that human beings should be penned up and under the care of jungle beasts.

"Talk gently," continued Gordon, "and we'll get along all right. My trainer doesn't pay any attention to me if I talk low or sing softly." The trainer in question was a noble-looking lion.

"Suffering Cæsar, Tommy, what does it all mean?" Van Allyn demanded.

"Mean? Why simply that these beasts came along and captured us to exhibit us to the denizens of the wilds, even as we show them off in our circuses. We're all properly labeled, though I can't read mine. You are designated 'Society Man of Leisure.'"

"Society Man——" began Van Allyn, but sure enough, he was clad in immaculate evening clothes!

"But Tommy," he protested, "I just had my camping outfit on a minute ago."

"Artie, don't growl so loudly. You'll be disciplined," was Gordon's reply.

"But Tommy how did we get here?"

"How did we get here? We were lassoed in regulation fashion and caged up."

"That's downright scandal, Tommy! This cage just grew up around me, that's all. I was sitting by the camp-fire when all of a sudden I found myself caressing a bloodthirsty tigress. I swear, it's a shame."

"Well, this has its compensations," returned Gordon philosophically. "I had a charming conversation with a pretty girl whom they have labeled 'Society Girl.' I understand you've got to fox-trot with her!"

"I?"

"Yes, for the edification of the beasts of the jungle. But tell me, what am I labeled?"

Van Allyn leaned up against the bars of his cage and glimpsed the sign on Gordon's.

"You're labeled 'Successful Lawyer.'"

"They got my profession, didn't they?" Gordon laughed. "Say, Artie, I believe that they're going to have you do a little practising. Here comes the girl."

Van Allyn turned his eyes in the direction Gordon indicated. A cage door had been opened, and the daintiest of girls stepped forth. She was dressed in a gown of shimmering white, over which was thrown a cloud of flimsy gauze. A wide girdle of rose silk encircled her waist, and she wore a great cluster of pansies. A big sun hat, adorned with a few rose-buds and streamers of deep-rose velvet, rested lightly on hair the color of dull gold.

Altogether she was a most charming picture, a girl of dreams.

She walked proudly and came toward Van Allyn's cage, the door of which was presently opened, and she entered. The tigress came in, so did the big white polar bear, who was the girl's keeper.

"How do you do?" she greeted. "I hope you don't think me unconventional, but I'm afraid we're obliged to cater to these beasts, who wish us to fox-trot and do others of the present day freak dances. Do you dance, sir?"

"Somewhat, Miss ——" he hesitated.

"I am Leonora Galesworthy," she laughed merrily.

"The golf champion?"

"I have that honor," she responded.

"I am Arthur Van Allyn. So sorry that this thing has occurred—that is, sorry for your sake that we must obey these creatures."

"I don't seem to mind when I have you nearby," she said naively.

"Thanks," he returned, and just then as the order to dance came, Van Allyn held out his arms.

Miss Galesworthy seemed to float into them, and in a moment they were executing some very graceful steps to the great admiration of the circle of beasts who crowded around outside, and who commented on the performance.

When the dancers finished, these beasts engaged each other in conversation.

"Have you heard anything from your uncle who is with Ting-a-ling Bros.' Circus?" asked one elephant of another.

"Not recently," was the reply.

"My two sisters and three of my brothers are with Farnum & Hailey's," chimed in another elephant. "They are horribly provoked. Those enterprising humans are an ungrateful lot. My brothers and sisters were formerly the stars of Farnum's. Now they managed to capture some stranger and brought him to Farnum & Hailey's, claiming he is the biggest elephant in captivity. All he does is simply march around the arena in the Grand Entree, wearing a glittering cloth of gold blanket and a gilded howdah on his back, in which three painted humans lounge. My brothers and sisters were mighty angry and for a while refused to do their tricks, for they can do things that humans do in their daily life."

"What did Dandy of Bells Brothers' Show write, Lioness?" queried a black bear.

"Oh, he's got so accustomed to his lot that he doesn't mind it. At first he used to rage and tear about and he almost killed his keeper on several occasions. But now he says that the fire of youth is leaving him and he is content to just sit in his cage. He's well fed and can sleep as much as he likes. It bores him somewhat to be stared at all the time, but now and then he gets a little thrill when he observes how he frightens visitors. He says he is the most popular creature in the whole menagerie as that he always has a bunch of humans admiring him, so his life isn't as bad as it might be," said the lioness.

"Well, it is nearly time for the afternoon performance, so I suppose we'd better get ready. I expect the whole jungle will turn out! Gracious! What is that noise?" exclaimed a zebra.

The giraffe stretched his long neck above all, and sniffed superciliously. "Oh, it's that bunch of human freaks. Because they are placed on pedestals in the side shows of Ting-a-ling Brothers', Farnum & Hailty's, and other circuses, they fancy they are our equals here. I wonder what they've been scrapping about?"

Van Allyn looked out of his cage. Sure enough! There were a couple of Midgets, the Giant, the Blue Man, the Circassian Beauty, the Albino Couple, the Bearded Lady, the Legless Wonder, Zow-Zow, the strong man, and several others.

These freaks burst out laughing as they beheld the human menagerie.

"'Hang it!" exclaimed Van Allyn, "I don't propose to be sneered at by any freak. And I'll be hanged if I'll let any animal have dominion over me, any longer. I'm going to rush those creatures and get out even if they tear me to pieces!"

"Oh, Mr. Van Allyn!" Miss Galesworthy screamed. "Please don't leave me!"

"You'll come along too. There, they're opening the door!"

He sprang up, seized the girl in his arms, and fled toward the door. A wild howling arose, screams and shrill shrieks of: "The Society Man! The Society Man broke loose! Head him off!"

Van Allyn fought his way. With one arm he

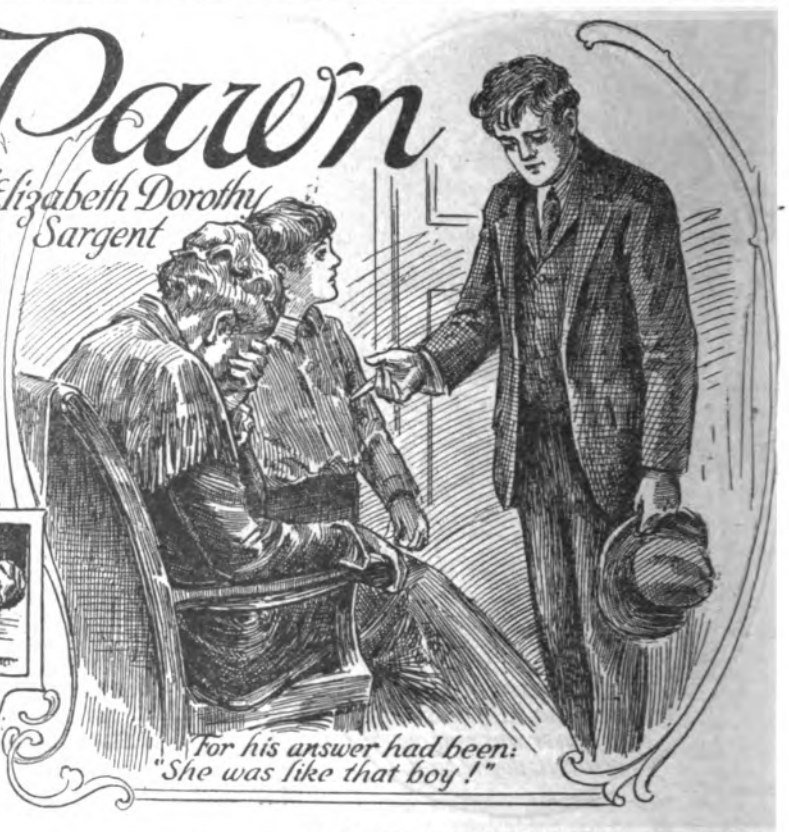
The Pawn

By Elizabeth Dorothy Sargent



"Oh, Juan. I'm so glad, so glad. Hurry now and hear my song which mother sent today."

"I will work, missee. work for you and you can forget the Captain."

"The Cross—to kiss the Cross—"

For his answer had been: "She was like that boy!"

Copyright, 1917, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

JUAN GARCIA three years before as happy and carefree a nature as ever came out of happy carefree Spain, sat this evening in California, in a bunkhouse room of a foothill mining camp, thinking. He sat on a box before a rough table looking at the spinning cylinder of an Edison phonograph—"at last to learn to kiss the Cross, to kiss—" he dropped his head into his hands and the cylinder spun on. It was worn smooth in places and some of the words were gone entirely. A man's voice joined the woman's and the last verse was repeated. The song was ended; the record grated against the tiny needle and whirled on with low, squawking jerks, but the man on the box sat still, his head in his hands and made no move to stop it.

For him it was two years ago and he was far away on an island of the Pacific, a soldier at Manila in the service of the United States. He was going up the steps of a broad veranda, a girl was running toward him, eager, laughing. Behind her a phonograph was playing. The words on her lips were:

"Oh, Juan, I'm so glad, so glad. Hurry now and hear my song which mother sent today. It's 'The Rosary' I've been telling you about. Oh, there, it's on the last verse and I don't like that—It's the first two verses that are so beautiful and the two voices at the end of the second. I always stop it before it gets to the cross. Now sit right here and listen."

And he had sat right there and listened and she had turned it off when it came to the cross. Then they had visited the afternoon away. It was in the early twilight that he said, as she was starting "The Rosary" just once more.

"The Captain wants to meet you."

Even in the shadow he could see the new eagerness in her face. It was in her voice, in spite of the attempted carelessness with which she said:

"Bring him with you some day, if you like."

Then as she questioned him about the captain, about what he had said and when he thought he could come, he noticed while she didn't that the singer had finished the two first verses and was well through the third—"at last to learn to kiss the Cross—to kiss the Cross." She turned impatiently and moved the lever.

"I can't bear that verse," she muttered. "I hate it."

She shivered a little and he thought that the breeze must be colder up at her exposed corner of the veranda than it was where he was sitting.

The needle chewed around the edge of the cylinder until the point grating on the record aroused the man on the box. He turned it off mechanically, stared absently at the cut cylinder and dropped his head again, this time upon his arms outstretched upon the table.

Again he was going up the steps of the broad veranda. His feet got heavier with every step until on the last he stood still and looked around, keeping his eyes from, yet directing them at last to the corner where the girl knelt beside the low phonograph table. Her hands clutched its sides; her eyes followed the revolutions of the small blue cylinder, at times her lips moved slowly. Though he knew what he'd hear, he stepped toward her and listened to her low murmuring:

"The Cross—to kiss the Cross——"

Again it was early twilight, but this time he knelt beside her, this time it was he who turned off the phonograph and he who said with no impatience, only a wondering dreariness:

"I can't bear that verse; I hate it."

The dreariness when he spoke again had given way to a tone half comforting, half imploring.

"Oh, missee, come with me, come with me to the great California. I will work, missee, work for you and you can forget the Captain. You will forget him and this cruel Manila."

The man on the box shook now to remember. He left his seat, walked to the window and stood staring out into the black, winter night. There in the flickering, reflected light of the lamp at his back, he saw her as she started up and shoved him away. He heard her again as she mocked:

"Go with you to the mines, to the California mines, with you, you who brought him here. And forget the Captain. You'd take what the Captain's thrown aside and tell it to come with you and forget the Captain? How long would you forget him? As long as he remembered me and for the same reason. Ha! forget the Captain! Yes, Juan, I'll forget him, but here in Manila. I won't have to go to California to do that. California——" the word came slowly from her lips. Her manner had changed at mention of it, and when she spoke again it was to question musingly:

"Ah, Juan, you brought him and you didn't know—how could you know—how could anyone know? And he's gone and I'm here and not here. I'm back there with the girl I was before he came."

She was quiet, then spoke suddenly, changed again in the moment's pause.

"Juan, where are you going in California? To Amador county. Surely, that's where they all go. You're bound to make amends, you can. It's easy too. Never tell anyone in California my name. Never in all the world mention my name to a living soul. Forget that I have one—forget me. Ha! I won't have one much longer. A name, my name—Ha!"

The man at the window drew back even now, remembering the new recklessness of the last words:

"And, Juan, I'm giving you a present. You must take my phonograph. For I'm forgetting the Captain, you know, and I'll be rid of everything that makes me remember—the phonograph most of all. Now you're going to tell me good by, because Senor Howard is coming and I must be pretty for him, la bonita senorita, eh, Juan? la bonita!"

So he had left her. And now he was here with her phonograph and her song and his memories; for he had done it. He Juan Garcia had brought the Captain to her. Why not when the Captain had asked to come, when he was so beautiful and she was so beautiful and he had loved them both so much. But the end! And he had done it—he! He sat down on the bunk to think; he was always thinking lately.

There was a short knock at the door followed by a laughing:

"Clear the decks, Juan, I'm here," and the boy stuck his head in. The boy whose dancing blue eyes and mouth that was meant to be laughing though it was old and drawn now, reminded him vaguely of Azile Cherton, his missee, the girl whom he had found, a happy-go-lucky, dance-sing-and-be-merry creature of the moment, teaching school in Manila, and had left cast off, bitter and in her bitterness, with her old love of happiness turned into recklessness, making of herself a pretty senorita, "la bonita senorita, eh Juan?" The boy who reminded him of her was laughing now and pulling at his arms.

"Come on, Juan, come down to the house and talk Spanish to me. Don't sit here thinking. Mother'll love to have you, too. She said so this morning and told me to bring you. She's always mighty glad to see any one from the Philippines. I asked for your mail today and there wasn't any."

So chattering English and remembering now and again to say a few sentences in Spanish they went down the hill to the low, white house which rambled over the knoll above the bend in the river.

During the evening before the fireplace the boy told of his doings at High School, Juan of his boyhood in Castile, his working in his father's mines and his early years of service in the Philippines. The mother sat in a large chair at one side of the fireplace, putting in an occasional word, smiling now and again, but not, until Juan was going, showing any eagerness. then she leaned forward, her tone half hopeful, half hopeless, wholly imploring.

"Mr. Garcia, did you, in Manila, know, perhaps, a girl, a young lady, Azile," her voice broke, "Azile Cherton? She was a teacher there."

Juan was standing in front of the fireplace idly framing his adieux when she began and had bent toward her to catch the low words. At the name Azile, even before the voice broke, he straightened up and squared his shoulders—then he remembered her command—"Never in all the world tell my name to a living soul." His hand fell from where it had rested on the mantle, to his side. He stood as at attention and said slowly:

"I'm sorry, I did not know her."

The words sounded cold, formal, even cruel in his ears. He turned with a mumbled goodnight and left the room.

The boy followed him out and down the walk.

"Juan," he said, "didn't you really know her? You acted so funny."

They reached the gate and the boy stood with his back to it, facing the man.

"She's my sister, Juan," his voice was hoarse, "tell me what you know about her. I know you know something."

Juan's eyes were old and tired, his lips twitched beyond the control of the resolution which gave the new setness to his face.

"I have said I know nothing," he repeated and made a move toward the gate. His one idea was to get home, to think and to adjust his thinking to the terrible new state of affairs.

Anger, quick and uncontrolled, made of the suppliant boy, a coarse and intolerant man. He drew himself up beside the gate until he met Juan eye to eye.

"I'm Tom Cherton," he thundered, "and I'll know about my sister, Azile, and why you're sneaking around hiding something about her or I'll—what! Oh, Juan!"

He was all boy again and throwing his arm around the shoulders of the shaking figure whose hands were gripping the fence, whose head was upon his hands.

"I'm crazy, Juan, crazy to insult you so, but she's my sister, Juan, my sister. She's been lost for over a year and we can't get any word of her. It killed my father; it's killing my mother and I guess it's killing me. Can't you tell us something? Everything else has failed. We've done everything. Tell me what you know."

The man at the fence heard the voice, but the words he understood were in a voice like this one, laughing eager: "Bring him over some day, if you like," low and terrible: "to kiss the Cross, to kiss the Cross;" reckless, defiant: "la bonita senorita, la bonita, eh, Juan?"

"Missee!" he choked, "Missee!"

His agony startled the boy so that he dropped his arms and drew back. Juan lifted his head, stared dully at him, stumbled out through the gate and up the road, home.

He sat on the bunk that night and in the morning his resolution was made. He must get away before he added to what he had done already by telling about it. He would go back to Spain where girls didn't leave home—where lots of things were better than they were here.

So he made his plans and by the end of the week was ready to start. The evening before he was to leave he was sitting again before the fireplace with the boy and his mother. He had brought the phonograph to give to them, for in some vague way he felt that it was theirs. He had made up his mind that he would tell them nothing. He would just leave the phonograph and go. They had made up their minds that he would tell them everything, so they kept him on while they tried out pieces.

When the boy who was putting on records, came to one at the end of a row in a far corner he slipped it on, murmuring:

"Here's sister's song, mother," and before Juan realized it "The Rosary" was begun, was through the first verse, was beginning the second, had finished it, was starting the third. The worn record blundered on and Juan blundered on and the boy blundered on. The mother watched it all. Juan's first blunder was, as usual, to drop his head into his hands, the boy's was to drop on his knees beside him, put his hands upon his shoulders and beg.

"Tell us what you know, Juan. Tell us about the girl who used to play the record."

Over Juan came the feeling that he was a pawn moved about by the Great Hand in the game for the destruction of this family.

"Tell us, Juan," said the boy.

The mother sat and waited. The needle was grinding at the end of the record. Juan looked up, gazed thoughtfully at the spinning cylinder, reached out his hand and turned it off. He glanced at the mother, looked hard at the boy, saw in his face another face and felt the Great Hand move him.

"Tell us," the boy whispered.

"The girl who owned that record was in Manila. She was a teacher there. The Captain came. I brought him—I brought him," he spoke as one whose mind has wandered far, "and then he left, and left her—so now she loves all the soldiers. Now she's a pretty senorita—la bonita senorita—for all the soldiers."

The mother had moved forward to the edge of her chair, her hand on its arm trembled. When she spoke each word came with a gasp.

"And her name?"

The word changed him. He was remembering his command.

"I do not——"

Before he could finish she broke in:

"Her face, her face! What was she like?"

Again the Great Hand moved him; he spoke—the game was over. He ran from the room, left the next morning for Spain, his happy carefree Spain—happy no longer—and carefree—bah! Carefree! Everywhere he turned he saw them—the girl—"la bonita senorita, eh, Juan?"—the boy, all the laughter gone from his dancing eyes, the too-old mouth drawn and desperate—the mother, pale and terrible, overcome at last, by a blow greater than anything her greatest fears had conceived of. For his answer had been:

"She was like that boy!"

held the girl to him, with the other he disposed of any attempts to block his passage. The tigress snapped at him. He seized her by her waving tail, swung her around his head and she sailed off through the ether. Another beast got in his way, he kicked him soundly and sped on. The giant with great strides intercepted him with his big bulk. His abdomen was on a level with Van Allyn's shoulder. Van Allyn crashed his fist with horrible force——

A very real howl came from Van Allyn's own throat and he opened his eyes to find himself standing before a very tough old tree whose trunk he had hit a resounding whack, as his bleeding fist testified. Up in the boughs of this same tree, the poor mongrel kitty, blinking and bewildered from her sudden aero-planing into space, hung and meowed weakly. Under his arm he clutched a log of wood, evidently the beautiful "Miss Galesworthy!"

From the tent Gordon emerged, wild-eyed and terrified, brought to stark wakefulness by Van Allyn's scream. He now stood open-mouthed as Van Allyn crawled up into the tree and released the kitten, crushed between a crotch.

"Thunder and dynamite!" ejaculated Gordon at last, "what's the matter with you?"

The two men stood facing each other in the morning dawn. In the trees, the birds twittered their morning songs; from a blanketed bundle on the ground issued the unmistakable evidence that their guide still slept.

"Well, what's the rumpus?" queried Gordon.

"Nightmare, 'Successful Lawyer.' I've just escaped from my keeper, a splendid lioness. She made me fox-trot with stunning Miss Leonora Galesworthy—behold her," and he held forth the log.

"Tell it all from soup to nuts, boy," Gordon said, as he raked together the scattered sticks which Van Allyn had kicked about.

Van Allyn did, and finished up with a declaration of finding the girl and winning her if she really existed.

"Are you still awake?" queried Gordon, pityingly.

"Oh, yes. Look across the river," Van Allyn directed, and their eyes crossed the shimmering water where the early morning dew clouds rested on the glassy surface. "I see blue tent poles and canvas and hear dim murmurs as the shouting of the builders of the tented city, so you see I am awake."

All the morning he harped upon the nightmare, and as soon as breakast was over, he insisted on going to town to the circus-parade.

The two men joined in the jollity of the day, buying traps and gew-gaws lavishly. But privately, Van Allyn was watching, wondering if perhaps he might not actually see the girl of his dreams, or more properly, his nightmare, for he knew there was a Miss Leonora Galesworthy, the golf champion, that she was camping thereabout, and he wondered if she was anything like the girl of his dreams.

And, wonderful to relate, he saw her! She wore a simple white dress, and a sun-hat with pink rose buds and velvet streamers. Her hair was dull gold! And she wore a cluster of pansies at her belt!

"Miss Galesworthy!" he exclaimed.

She looked up, ready to smile, then her features relaxed into the look of one who has made a mistake.

"Are you not Miss Galesworthy?" he persisted, desire overcoming caution and good breeding.

"I happen to be, yes," she replied, evenly, and with terrible frigidity, "but I believe we have not met."

"Pardon me, I didn't mean to annoy you——" he stammered, flushing scarlet as he realized his solecism. But Gordon came to the rescue.

"Miss Galesworthy, pardon me. I know you, but merely through reputation, and from having seen your picture in the paper. Please do not mind my friend. He is not responsible. We are camping across and a little up the river. Arthur pleaded so hard to be allowed to visit the circus that I simply had to take him. You'll pardon us, I hope? My name, if you care to know it, is Thomas Gordon, attorney for the Consolidated Steel Company."

Miss Galesworthy bowed and moved away with her friends.

Van Allyn's eyes blazed.

"What did you want to make a 'nut' of me in her eyes for?" he demanded.

"How else did you act?" coolly returned Gordon.

Van Allyn laughed outright. "You're right, Tommy, I did act like a fool, but I'll keep up the comedy. But say, boy, how do you account for my getting such an excellent picture of her in my dreams? I don't believe I ever saw her before."

"Possibly you saw a picture of her and your sub-conscious mind made note of it, unknown to you, until the dream brought out the impression," suggested Gordon, and they let it go at that.

When the big tent flop was opened to admit the audience, Van Allyn watched for Miss Galesworthy. And when she entered he followed and took a seat next to her. He smiled at her as if at an old acquaintance, and she smiled back, humoring him evidently!

During the performance he told her of his nightmare, in detail, but relating it as an actual fact. She listened with perfect good-humor. Once he thought he heard her murmur, "too bad he's crazy," and there was a note of sympathy in that murmur that made his heart leap.

The show finally ended, but all too soon for Van Allyn, and as they left the tent, he whispered to her:

"Won't you let me call and see you sometime when you are in town? It would make me so happy."

And Leonora Galesworthy, the dear, sympathetic heart, pressed his hand gently and said, "yes."

* * * * * * * * * * * *

It was October, the month of brown leaves and chill winds. Miss Galesworthy was at home in the city. Often she thought of a frankly friendly, boyish young man in whipcord suit, soft gray shirt and leggings, who had asked to call. And she had granted his request, because, poor fellow, he was harmlessly crazy.

One evening a card was brought to her. The name was not familiar. But she would see the gentleman.

She went down the steps slowly, her studied descent setting off her gown of shimmering white over which was thrown a cloud of gauze. A wide girdle of rose silk encircled her waist, and she wore a great cluster of pansies.

She bowed graciously to the gentleman who rose courteously. His opera coat opened as he did so, displaying his faultlessly fitting evening clothes.

"Your madman, Miss Galesworthy," he said politely but with roguish tone, nevertheless, "I expect you do not remember me."

"Well——" she hesitated a bit, "well, perhaps I do."

"I called, Miss Galesworthy, to apologize. I am Arthur Van Allyn. You remember the rubbish I told you at the circus? It was all true—an actual nightmare. With the nightmare vividly in mind, I was much amazed to see the girl of my dreams materialize, and interest got the better of my caution. To shield my breach of etiquette Mr. Gordon put on me, the guise of a madman. Since then, I've thought a great deal about this, and I felt you deserved an apology. It was all mid-summer-night madness, Miss Galesworthy, and I trust I may appeal to your generosity and ask your forgiveness?"

"No apology is necessary," the girl smiled forgivingly, "You really made me believe that you were not in your right mind, though. I thought it was a great pity."

"Did you really give the poor young madman a thought after that day?" he queried, his eyes so bright that Miss Galesworthy averted hers.

"Yes, I did. I speculated, womanlike, as to what it might have been that caused you to become a distracted person. I'm glad it was a joke," she answered, more fervently than she realized.

"Thank you. Well, I shall detain you no longer unless it be for one more request. May I not find a mutual acquaintance who will introduce us according to the conventions, and then may I not make a formal call?"

His brilliant eyes were fixed upon hers, and they were saying things—all those things that make a man seek out a woman—but those things convention does not allow spoken upon first acquaintance.

"I give you the privilege, Mr. Van Allyn," she said.

"Thank you. Good night."

THE END.

What's that?
Were they married? Why, of course!

This Department is conducted solely for the use of COMFORT sisters, whereby they may give expression to their ideas relative to the home and home surroundings, and to all matters pertaining to themselves and families; as well as opening a way for personal correspondence between each other.

Our object is to extend a helping hand to COMFORT subscribers; to become coworkers with all who seek friendship, encouragement, sympathy or assistance through the interchange of ideas.

Any abuse of this privilege, such as inviting correspondence for the purpose of offering an article for sale, or undertaking to charge a sum of money for ideas, recipes or information mentioned in any letter appearing in this department, if reported, will result in the offender being denied the use of these columns.

Do not ask us to publish letters requesting money contributions or donations of any sort. Much as we sympathize with the suffering and unfortunate, it is impossible to do this as we would be flooded with similar requests.

Do not request souvenir postals unless you have complied with the conditions which entitles you to such a notice. See postal request notice in another column.

We cordially invite mothers and daughters of all ages to write to COMFORT Sisters' Corner. Every letter will be carefully read and considered, and then the most helpful ones chosen for publication, whether the writer be an old or new subscriber.

Please write only on one side of the paper, and recipes on a separate sheet.

Always give your correct and full name and address, very plainly written; otherwise your letter will receive no attention.

Address all letters for this department to MRS. WHEELER WILKINSON, CARE COMFORT, AUGUSTA, MAINE.

JUDGING from the letters received from farm women who are doing their bit by working in the vegetable garden, or even helping with the larger crops, it will not be a hardship for them to turn their overalled or otherwise appropriately garbed persons to the flower garden and devote a little of their time and newly acquired muscles to the planting of bulbs for next summer's flowers. Next month, September, seems to be the best time for this work as the early planting enables the bulbs to make the necessary root-growth before cold weather and insures earlier blossoming in the spring. Old barnyard manure is the best fertilizer and should be used liberally, thoroughly mixing it with the soil. One sister asks about her tulips and narcissus, and these bold leading place in most gardens though hyacinths and various others are close seconds. The tulips and hyacinths should be set about five inches apart and about four inches under the surface, while the narcissus should be set at least seven inches apart and four inches under ground. Personally I prefer keeping the different colors of tulips and hyacinths separate but a bed of mixed colors is such a delight to the eye and heart that the most methodical person can but approve.

SHILOH, MICH.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I was much interested in Northern Spy's letter for I never could understand why it was all right for my brother to go to public dances, etc., and yet my parents said they were not fit places for me to attend.

I wish some of the sisters would tell me what to do for my narcissus and tulips. They grow all to foliage and do not blossom. Do they need taking up? If so, should I replant them at once or wait until fall? Perhaps some of you have had the same trouble and can tell me how to make them bloom.

I was a primary teacher before my marriage but for nearly five years I have been a farmer's wife and like housework and farm life better than teaching.

I will be glad to hear from some of the sisters and will try and answer all letters.

Best wishes to you all, MRS. R. H. MIKESELL.

MISSOURI.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

I want to join this interesting circle and see if I can help a little.

There is just husband, baby and I in our family and, of course, to us baby is the most interesting little creature ever seen. She is now twenty months old, fat and chubby with rosy cheeks and a wealth of dark hair, which I keep bobbed. She can talk very plainly for her age. I have a very quiet, Christian husband. He is kind and attentive to baby and I think we have a happy home.

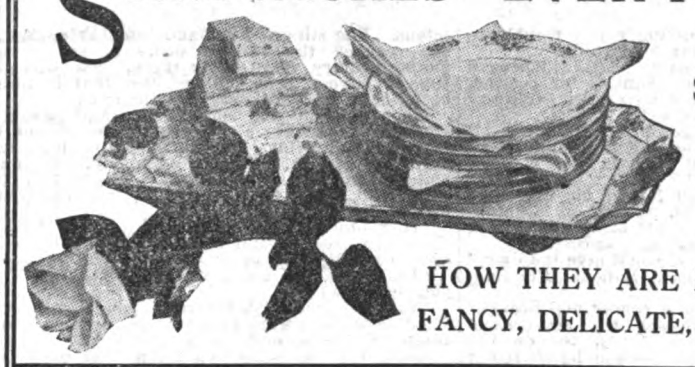
To the sister who wrote for a baby outfit, I want to tell her what I made for my baby before she came. First I bought two silk wool skirts, then enough Shaker's flannel half wool and half cotton) to make two petticoats which I made one yard long, with opening on shoulders so if one got soiled I could remove it and put on a clean one without removing the dress. I got ten yards of bleached canton flannel to make twelve diapers. I had two tablecovers made from cheese-cloth that I cut up into twelve little bands, twenty by six inches (straight). I also had a band pattern with straps over the shoulders. I made four of these from long cloth. I made three flannelette gowns, cut in one piece and opened in the back. Then I made a nice dress and petticoat, of white batiste and trimmed with lace and insertion. Instead of hemming the bottom of the dress I scalloped it and put a lace ruffle around the scallops. The underskirt I made somewhat the same way only I did not scallop it around the bottom. I made two plain white dimity dresses for everyday wear and out of the tablespreads I made squares eighteen inches wide to use for diapers the first three days so they could be burned. As for hose, cap, coat and such, wait until later before buying these. Have good pure soap, plenty of wash rags and bath towels and vaseline, camphor and talcum also. For yourself have a good-sized roll of absorbent cotton, a small vial of carbolic acid and plenty of soft, sterilized cloths. This is as good an outline as I could give an inexperienced person.

Mrs. H. L. Holder, if you will have the child that your baby bites, bite him until he cries, he won't attempt it any more. I've seen this tested with good results.

Mrs. L. T., if your disposition were like mine you would soon show Mr. L. T. who would boss the placing of the furniture, no matter what he said. I fear you are too good and easy.

Foodstuff in Missouri is scarce and dreadfully high. I wonder if it is that way everywhere.

I hope my letter will find its way to that expectant mother. Yours as ever, "Willie."



Willie and others. The U. S. Dept. of Labor in a book on Prenatal Care gives a list of supplies needed if the confinement is to take place at home, as follows:

Two to four pounds of absorbent cotton.
One large package of steril gauze (25 yards).
Four rolls of cotton batting.
Two yards of stout muslin for abdominal binders.
Twelve old towels or diapers.
Two old sheets.
Two yards of bobbin, or very narrow tape, for tying the cord.

From these supplies the mother or nurse may make the necessary pads and bandages, which should then be sterilized, in accordance with directions which follow. Other things that may be needed are:

One hundred bichlorid of mercury tablets.
Four ounces powdered boric acid.
One bottle of white vaseline.
One pound of Castile soap.
One quart of grain alcohol.
One douche pan.
One stiff hand brush.
One slop jar or covered enamel bucket.

SANDWICHES—EVER POPULAR

NOTHING SO GOOD FOR MANY OCCASIONS AND PURPOSES

HOW THEY ARE MADE—PLAIN, FANCY, DELICATE, SUBSTANTIAL

TO make thin, even sandwiches, use bread baked the day before and be sure it is fine grained. Cream the butter with a spoon in a warm bowl so it will not break the bread while spreading. Cut off the end slice and then butter the loaf before cutting the slice from the loaf. Make a cloth damp by wetting one half in cold water and wringing dry as possible and then fold over the dry half and roll and wring together which should make the whole cloth just damp. Keep this cloth thrown over the sandwiches while making and when finished wrap around them till ready to serve. Cut sandwiches either in rounds, square or three-cornered.

CHEESE SANDWICHES.—Mix together equal parts of cream cheese and finely chopped walnuts and season with salt and a dash of cayenne pepper. Moisten with just cream enough to make the mixture spread evenly. Either sweet or sour cream can be used. Spread between buttered slices of graham bread.

SANDWICHES IN BASKET.—Anyone desiring a change from the usual way of serving sandwiches and coffee, particularly for party lunches, will find the above suggestion of interest. Arrange the sandwiches and little cakes on doily, either cloth or paper, in basket tray.

SANDWICHES IN BASKET.

GRAHAM SANDWICHES.—Cut bread in rounds with cake cutter, large size, and spread with any desired filling.

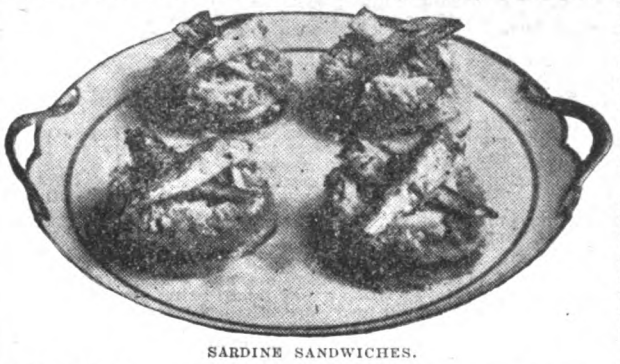
BAKED BEAN SANDWICHES.—Mash cold baked beans to a paste, season, add a little chopped celery and spread between thin slices of buttered brown bread.

VEGETABLE SANDWICHES.—Mix raw tomatoes, cucumbers, chopped tops of green onions and small pieces of bacon with cottage cheese and place between slices of bread.

MARMALADE SANDWICHES.—Take very thin crackers of any kind, spread one with orange or peach marmalade and the other with cream cheese and press the two together. Spread both marmalade and cheese thinly.

SHRIMP SANDWICHES.—Mix half a cup of shrimps with one half cup finely chopped chicken, half a red pepper and quarter of a Bermuda onion. Chop all together and mix with mayonnaise dressing. Spread on slices of brown and white bread, putting the slices together and cutting into fancy shapes.

SARDINE SANDWICHES.—Take graham bread, cut it in small rounds, fill it with a paste made from hard-boiled eggs and sardines, mashed together. Cover it on the top with a slice of hard-boiled egg and crossed sardines on the top.



MARY H. NORTHEND, Salem, Mass.

APPLE SANDWICHES.—Slice tart apples very thin, spread with salad dressing and put between buttered slices of white bread. Make just before serving.

BOILED SALAD DRESSING.—Melt three tablespoons of butter with one teaspoon of mustard, one scant teaspoon of salt, one tablespoon of sugar and a dash of cayenne pepper. Cook in double boiler five minutes and pour over three well-beaten yolks of eggs; add one half cup of hot vinegar, one cup of rich milk and the beaten whites of eggs. Return to double boiler and cook till mixture thickens, taking care it does not cook long enough to curdle.

False Economy of Leaving Out Sugar in Canning Fruit and Berries

Again we urge our readers to can a liberal supply of all kinds of fresh vegetables, fruit and berries, but do not make the mistake of putting up fruit and berries without sugar. There is no economy but there is positive disadvantage in leaving out the sugar. It is strange how inconsistent people are and how they go from one extreme to the other. Following the recent mad rush of the housewives to buy and hoard large quantities of sugar in anticipation of future scarcity and higher prices comes the talk of canning without sugar in order to save expense.

There cannot be any saving in leaving out the sugar now unless sugar should happen to be lower in price next winter when you come to use your canned fruits and berries. As there is small prospect of sugar being much, if any, cheaper during the war, and it may go higher, you take a speculator's or gambler's chance on that, for the sweetening, if omitted now, must be added when the contents of the cans are eaten.

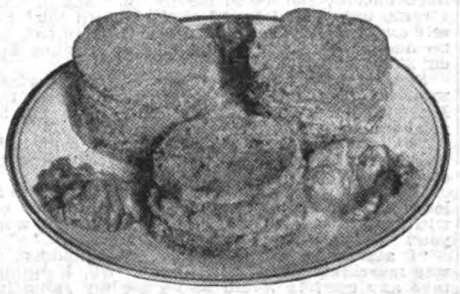
Just stop and reckon how little would be saved by canning without sugar in case the price should drop later on. The requisite quantity of sugar varies according to the kind and ripeness of the fruit, but the average is less than half a pound to the quart jar. At the present writing (July 6), the retail price of sugar in twenty-five pound bags ranges, according to locality, from eight and one half to nine cents per pound. If the price should drop two cents a pound next winter the saving would be only one cent per quart jar.

Some people seem to think that at the present price of sugar they cannot afford to put up much fruit and berries nor make much jam, jelly or marmalade. Sugar is fuel, producing animal heat and bodily energy, and even at the present price is one of the most economical forms of this class of necessary nutrients. Sugar in goodly allowance is recognized as a necessary constituent of the army ration, and jam is one of the mainstays of the soldiers in the trenches of the Allies and the Germans.

Five years ago sugar sold at the exceptionally low price of five and a half cents per pound. Even now at nine cents it costs only one and three quarters cents more per quart can of fruit or berries.

Jam, jelly and preserves can be used to a considerable extent as a satisfactory, wholesome and nourishing substitute for butter now retailing at forty-five cents or more per pound.

Fruit and berries put up without sugar are never so good. Sugar has much to do with keeping the fruit flavor and preserving the fruit. Fruit and berries canned without sugar are so inferior, and as there is nothing saved in the end by leaving out the sugar, we advise the use of the usual proportion of sugar in canning, unless you happen to be unable to obtain it; in such case, of course, it is better to can without sugar than not to can at all.



CANNED PEACHES.—Wipe peaches and put in boiling water long enough to loosen skins. Remove skins and cook fruit in syrup made by allowing one third weight of fruit in sugar and two and three quarters cup of water to each pound of sugar. Boil this ten minutes to make a thin syrup; then add peaches and cook. Fill sterilized jars with fruit and add syrup to overflow. Put on rubbers and fasten sterilized covers on. Let stand till cool and again tighten covers.

CANNED PEARS.—Pare fruit. Remove stems, cut in quarters and core. Follow directions given above for canning peaches. A little lemon rind cooked with the syrup, improves the flavor of the pears greatly.

CANNED PINEAPPLE.—Remove skin and eyes from pineapples; cut in thin slices and then into cubes. Follow directions for canning peaches. If the pineapple is to be used for sherbets, etc, it may be shredded and cooked in one half its weight in sugar, adding no water, and then sealed in jars.

CANNED QUINCES.—Wipe, quarter, core and peel equal amounts of quinces and apples. Follow directions for peaches.

TOMATO PRESERVE.—Cover two pounds of tomatoes with boiling water and let stand until skins may be removed easily. To this add two pounds of sugar and let stand over night. In the morning pour off syrup and boil till thick; skim and add tomatoes, four ounces of preserved ginger and three large lemons, which have been sliced and seeds removed. Cook.

GRAHAM SANDWICHES.

CARROT MARMALADE.—One dozen raw grated carrots, one cup of sugar to each cup of carrots, juice of three lemons, and three quarters teaspoon each cloves, cinnamon and allspice. Mix carrots and sugar and let stand over night. In morning add lemon juice and spices. Cook three quarters of an hour.

RASPBERRY JAM.—Clean and wash six pounds of raspberries. Put on stove with just enough water to keep from burning and boil half an hour. Add one pound of raisins, stoned and cut into small pieces, and three and one half pounds sugar. Boil until thick. Blackberries may be used instead.

PICKLED PEACHES.—One peck of peaches, one quart of vinegar, one quart of water, two quarts and a half of sugar and a few cloves. Wipe the peaches carefully with a clean cloth and divide into two parts. Bring the water, sugar and vinegar to the boiling point and add one half the peaches and boil for one half hour; remove and put in other half and cook same length of time. Stick a clove into each peach, put peaches into jars and cover with the boiling syrup and seal at once. Do not use peaches that are too ripe. The skin should be removed.

SWEET PICKLED PEARS.—Remove the blossom end from five pounds of pears, not quite ripe, and cook in boiling water till tender. Remove fruit and strain water. To one pint of this water add one pint of vinegar, two and one half pounds of sugar and one quarter cup of mixed whole cloves, allspice, cinnamon and mace. Boil for half an hour and then add pears. When well scalded remove and pack in glass jars. Boil the syrup down to just enough to cover fruit, pour over and seal.

WORCESTERSHIRE SAUCE. (Requested.)—Ten large ripe tomatoes, five medium-sized onions, three sweet green peppers, one tablespoon cinnamon, one tablespoon allspice, one tablespoon salt, one tablespoon ginger, one tablespoon mustard, one cup sugar, one quart vinegar and a little celery if desired. Boil slowly one and one half hours. This makes about five pints.
MRS. W. A. HAYNES, McClure, N. Y.

CANNED PORTER APPLES. — Wipe, pare, quarter and core Porter apples then weigh. Make a syrup by boiling one third their weight in sugar with water, allowing two and one half cups to each pound of sugar. Cook apples in syrup, until thoroughly done, doing a few at a time. After they are done, then boil syrup ten minutes, putting the apples back in syrup and heating them to a boiling point. Fill jars and seal.

GRAPE JELLY.—Pick the grapes over, wash and remove stems. Mash a few in the bottom of preserving kettle using a wooden potato masher. Heat to boiling point and boil thirty minutes. Strain through coarse strainer, then let juice run through a double thickness of cheese-cloth or a jelly bag. Measure, bring to boiling point, and boil five minutes; add an equal measure of heated sugar, boil three minutes, skim and pour into glasses. Place in a sunny window and let stand twenty-four hours. Cover the top of glasses with paraffin and keep in a cool, dry place.

Three pottery or agateware basins, one 16 inches, and two 11 inches in diameter.
Pitchers, at least three, holding one quart and upward.
One and one half yards of rubber sheeting, at least 36 inches wide, or
One and one half yards of white table oilcloth, to protect the mattress.
One two-quart fountain syringe.
One medicine glass.
One medicine dropper.
One drinking tube.

GREENVILLE, PA.

DEAR EDITOR:

Some time ago I wrote to you about a wheel chair for my little girl who had been helpless since a baby. She was then four years old. I sent in several subscriptions and the reason I did not send more was because the Lord gave her strength and she now walks. She still has the lump between her shoulders and walks like all who are in her condition but she walks and can get along with the rest except in the game of running. She had whooping cough a year ago last June and was sick until September. Then she began to get stronger and in October walked. I am sending you a small snapshot showing her with her baby doll and carriage, given her by one of the nurses at the hospital where my husband is employed. Mothers, don't let younger children carry the babies around in their arms. I have been careful since little Erla got hurt and oh, how I wish I had been careful before. A neighbor's girl who dearly loved babies but who was not accustomed to handling them used to hold her every chance she could get and did not support her back and let her fall, causing her lameness. She is now six years old and is very bright. She will sign her name to this letter. She says to tell you to hurry along with the next COMFORT as she wants to see the Dapperlings. She delights in hearing the little stories and we all enjoy the paper and read it from cover to cover.

If any kind person sends in subscriptions for her wheel chair just credit them to some other unfortunate.

With best wishes, MRS. J. G. MCCOY.

Mrs. McCoy. If it were at all possible I would like to print little Erla's picture and reproduce her well-written signature, so the sisters could see what a smiling faced, intelligent child she is, but since that cannot very well be done perhaps they will take our word for it.—Ed.

MY DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

Just as soon as I receive my paper I sit down and read it.

I was very interested in the letter written by Mrs. H. B. B. about adopting little orphan children. She surely knows about the wistful eyes when someone comes to adopt an orphan. I lived in an Orphan's Home for nine years and I can truthfully say the happiest moment of my life was when the superintendent called me into his office and told me he was sending me to relatives down in North Carolina. During the nine long years I cannot recall one loving face of any teacher or matron but can distinctly remember much cruel abuse and hard punishment. My mother had never whipped me when she was living. I was nearly seven years old when she died of tuberculosis and I suppose I was quite spoiled and I received my first whipping the second day after my arrival and not until then did I miss my mother. I have two little girlies of my own, eleven and seven years old and how I love them, but I hope they never will have to go where people try to raise children by the wholesale or by the tap of the bell and where they are dressed alike (like prisoners) and their hair clipped close to their heads. My husband, who is twenty years my senior, does not earn a large salary but I had rather stint myself over and over again than to think they would ever be in an Orphanage.

And now sisters that we've discussed all kinds of problems in our corner, let's hear how many different ways we are trying to cut down expenses during these terrible war times. I am working out in the fields every day, just like a man, trying to raise vegetables to eat and to sell and my little girlies help too. For with only one dollar a day to spend on a family of five (we have given a poor, crippled old man a home) and with flour one dollar and five cents a sack, it surely takes the sleep from your eyes to find ways and means to feed us. I wish some of the sisters would write to the old man we have given a home to; he has been crippled for thirty years and although he is able to wait on himself he is not able to work. His name is "Uncle" Charlie Hayman and if the sisters think more of their Uncle Charlie than we do of ours they are loving him some. So please all of you write some cheering letters to him. His address is Kitty Hawk, N. C.

I will close, with best wishes to all of our sisters,
MRS. W. H. MIDGETTE.

Mrs. Midgette. Keep up your courage and have faith that some way will be provided to care for you and your family. Your goodness to the crippled old man deserves a reward.—Ed.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

I have just read a letter from a soldier boy. They are having a great many hardships and I am wondering how much the women are doing to help out in the war. A few brave women are taking active part by going as Red Cross nurses and some sad mothers are sending their boys to fight. That is well enough, and maybe they are doing all they can to make their boys as comfortable as they can but are the rest of us doing very much? We are in the midst of a work unfinished. Who knows but what every son, husband and brother may be called to help fight for our liberty so let us be prepared to feed and clothe them. Let us get busy now before it is too late to do any great amount of good. Now is the time for us to lay our fancy work aside. I would suggest that we organize canning clubs instead of embroidery clubs. A reliable canning outfit for the entire neighborhood (one that would can vegetables as well as fruit) would cost about fifteen dollars and they are indeed a great time and labor saver. The high cost of canned goods would soon enable a neighborhood to pay for their outfit with the surplus vegetables and it is the duty of everyone to have one on their farm this year. And why couldn't we have just as much fun at a canning club

MRS. SIMPSON looked at the door with a nervous shudder. "Yes; but I can't bear going to bed in it. There's a broken window, and I always think," speaking very fast, "that if my husband were to come at night and try to get in, he would try the bedroom window first, and I wouldn't be able to keep him out. I keep the door locked, so that he can't surprise me in the daytime."

"Why are you so frightened of him?"

"You'd be frightened of him if you knew him. He's a bad man, Simpson, for all he's a gentleman and has manners like a lord. And he's terrible angry with me now for something I did the last time I was on a spree——" She pulled herself up sharply. "Oh, I didn't mean to tell you. You'll never come near me again if you think I drink. Drink!" Her voice rose wildly. "You'd drink, too, if you were all alone in the world, but for a husband who hated you and a brother he'd ruined. I'd go mad if it wasn't for drink sometimes—and if it wasn't for Snap!"

Nerine put a quiet, gentle hand on the rose-pink satin shoulder.

"You poor soul!" she said. "You won't need to drink while I'm here to come and see you, will you? May I go into your room and see if there isn't a sofa I could bring in here for you? I could draw it close by the fire, so that you could put on coal without getting up. It would keep you more cheerful in the evening."

"You couldn't move the sofa," doubtfully, "do you think you could? Oh, you don't know what last evening was like, sitting here in the dark! The night before"—with a sullen sort of shame—"I was drinking, and I didn't care; but last night I sat here and listened till I thought every sound was him trying the door."

Nerine shuddered herself as she thought of the woman sitting alone all those dark hours, clutching the dog to her for warmth and protection, while she listened, lame and helpless, for the coming of the man she feared.

"You ought not to be left alone," she said, indignantly. "Don't you think I could get some woman who would stay with you?"

Mrs. Simpson shook her head.

"They're afraid of me about here. They say I'm violent, but I'm not—only sometimes, when I get excited. But don't you be afraid, miss, will you?"

"If you frighten me I shall go away and not come back again," smiling. "But I don't think there is much danger."

Nerine unlocked the bedroom door as she spoke, and went in. It was as untidy as the sitting-room, with clothes, brushes and combs, boxes and bottles. A pane of glass had been completely smashed in the window, and the chilly spring air blew unhindered through it. The bed was just as it had last been slept in, but it looked rather clean, and Nerine approached it gingerly, but when she laid her hand on the blankets they were soaked with damp. It had rained in the night and the wet had blown on the bed.

A sofa stood at the other side of the room, and, being out of range of the window, was perfectly dry. Miss Lispenard wheeled it briskly into the sitting-room. "Your pillows are damp, and so are your blankets," she observed. "But if you will tell me where to find a rug, some of these cushions will do instead of pillows." She picked up a once gorgeous cushion, covered with dirty red satin.

"There's a new eider-down quilt in one of the boxes there, I bought it when I was in London. The key's in it." Mrs. Simpson was sitting erect, rocking with pain, for the effect of the strong liniment had worn off a little.

"If you will help me, I'll lie down now," she said. "I feel sick."

"I'll bandage your foot properly in a moment," the girl said, when the transfer to the sofa had been completed with some difficulty.

Going into the bedroom, she knelt down by the trunk which had the key in it, and pulled out from the very top a down quilt covered with common silk. When it was out, she gave a choke of mingled horror and surprise, which was nearly being a shriek; the next thing to the new bed covering was her own black-and-purple brocade skirt, rolled up into a ball.

Nerine, on her knees beside the open trunk, fell to trembling. No wonder she had seemed to recognize Mrs. Simpson, and no wonder the woman had thought her figure familiar, as she bent over the fire; for that was the very way she had been leaning over the bag when the chloroformed handkerchief had been put over her mouth.

Her old wild horror of the woman came back to her. For a minute it was all she could do not to seize her skirt and fly from the house forever. She clinched her hands on the edge of the trunk, while she drew her breath hard.

"No, my good Nerine, you won't run away," she said to herself, grimly. "You've got to the edge of a mystery, and when you've got to the bottom of it, you can run away—not before."

Oh, how she wished for Agatha to help her through. Should she go and confront Mrs. Simpson now, skirt in hand, or should she wait? She felt less angry with the milk-girl for her impertinent giggle; no wonder no woman would come and look after Mrs. Simpson if that was the sort of person she was!

CHAPTER XXII.

MR. FAIRFAX OFFERS SOME ADVICE.

A call from the other room brought her back to the present moment; decided her too—oddly enough—on her course of action. The words were nothing, the voice that of a woman in miserable pain.

"Can't you find it?" Mrs. Simpson repeated.

"I'm coming," Nerine answered quietly, putting the cover of the box down on her own gown, as if it were nothing out of the way to find it there, and rising to her feet. She felt curiously stiff and tired, as though she had been kneeling there for a long time. As she looked about the room, for something to tear up into bandages, the hand with the quilt in it shook like Mrs. Simpson's own; she felt glad of the cool air from the window. She picked up the first linen garment which came to hand, a clean but ragged petticoat, with remnants of lace on it.

"I suppose I may tear this?" she asked, and Mrs. Simpson only nodded; the moving to the sofa had jerked her foot and she was speechless with pain. Nerine, to her own wild surprise, as she remembered the first time she had ever seen Mrs. Simpson, found herself kneeling by the side of her enemy, binding up the aching foot with the careful fingers of a born nurse.

"That's better, isn't it?" she inquired when she had tucked the eider-down around her patient and put another cushion at her back. "I think you will be as comfortable there as if you were in bed."

"It's like heaven," weak and grateful tears running down her pale face. "I can't bear to think of the likes of you doing all this for me."

Nerine surveyed Mrs. Simpson curiously through her long black lashes, while she went about the room arranging it for the night. She found oil, and filled the lamp, and put it with some matches on the table by the sofa; and then filled the coal box with lumps easily thrown on by the not too fastidious fingers of the invalid.

"I've put you very close to the hearth; I hope you won't catch fire in the night," she observed. "I think you will have to manage with milk and biscuits for the night," putting them within reach, "and I will be over early in the morning. If your foot aches, you can take off the outside wrapping, can't you, and pour some liniment on the bandage?"

"I didn't think I would ever be so comfortable again," with a sigh. "But don't you trouble to come over early, it's so far," wistfully.

"Oh, I don't mind walking." Miss Lispenard felt rather guilty at being thanked for coming, when wild horses would not have kept her away after that discovery of the skirt.

"I wonder if I can't get her to tell me all about it," she pondered as she locked the bedroom door and made all fast in the kitchen. "I will try to make her."

"There, now you are all locked up, and here are your keys," Nerine said, putting on her well-worn coat and gloves. "I could bring you a book tomorrow—if you like reading," uncertainly.

"I've a book over there, if you'd give it to me," eagerly. "I brought it from—London. I'm fond of reading."

Nerine found the book in a corner and brought it without a syllable, though her self-control was stretched nearly to breaking, for on the cover, in a well-known and odious handwriting was "C. Mayne."

She was getting nearer to the mysterious robbery by every minute she was in the house. But she felt, somehow, that she must act shrewdly if she wished to come at the real truth.

"Good by," was all she said. "Oh! and you'd better let me have the front-door key, so that I can get in tomorrow morning. I will come in time to get your breakfast."

She let herself out of the unused front door, escorted to the threshold by Snap, and locked it after her, greatly to the astonishment of a solitary individual who was slowly approaching across a field. Nerine was so wrapped in her own thoughts that she did not see him till he vaulted over a stile into the lane just in front of her.

"How do you do, Miss Lispenard?" said a familiar voice, as she looked up sharply. "I hope I did not startle you!"

"No, no! Not at all."

Absently she shook hands with Fairfax, who turned and walked beside her. He was saying something about the stuffing of Tommy, but she did not listen, only surveyed furtively his strong, but clean-cut face, and the pleasant expression of his mouth. He looked trustworthy.

"Tell me"—she cut in ruthlessly on his account of the beautiful and lifelike appearance Tommy was to assume—"you live near here; do you know anything about that woman?"

Fairfax hesitated.

"Not much," he said at last. "She is not one of the village people, but a stranger, though she has been here for a good while. I've heard she was somewhat dissipated."

The last was a mild statement, and he felt rather proud of it.

"If you want to know about her, I could ask the vicar; but I believe you'll find her rather a difficult subject for district visiting," he concluded, dryly.

"I don't district visit," she hotly responded; "and I banged into the cottage one day when I was caught in the rain."

Fairfax looked at her lovely face, flushed with the hard work and excitement of the afternoon, and thought of the unpleasant tales he had heard of the occupant of that lonely cottage.

"If you will forgive my saying so, I don't think you ought to go there alone. I don't see how you got in at first, for I hear she has a pleasant way of threatening to shoot strangers."

Nerine nodded gravely.

"She was going to shoot me at first, but when she saw I was inoffensive, she let me in, and gave me tea."

"What!" Mr. Fairfax was surprised into standing quite still in the middle of the road. He had known, from personal observation, that Miss Lispenard had a good courage of her own, but there are not many even courageous girls who would go into a lonely cottage and take tea with a woman who had threatened the moment before to shoot them.

"Yes." Nerine, quite unconscious of his opinion of her courage, stood still, too, and looked at him with lovely gray eyes. "And I think she quite liked me, for she asked me to come again. And I came today, and found that she had hurt herself and had had nothing but biscuits to eat, and no one to do anything for her, ever since Sunday."

She blushed suddenly at the thought that she was pointing out her good deeds, also that Mr. Fairfax had stopped, of course, to bid her good by, and that she was keeping him.

"Oh, your ogress is not so bad," she said, lightly. "Don't let me keep you; you were going the other way."

"I am going to walk home with you, if I'm allowed. Miss Lispenard, you will take some one with you if you go to that house again, won't you? Or perhaps you're not going again."

"I am going in the morning." Unbidden, he was marching along beside her. "Oh, I couldn't take any one! It would be no use my going if I did."

Fairfax marveled in silence.

"But a nurse, or some one, could be got to look after her. I could manage that," he suggested at last.

Nerine turned on him with a sharp touch of that imperious manner to which she had treated the milkmaid.

"I would rather be alone with her."

"As you like, of course; but it is not safe for you," obstinately. What a high and mighty, self-reliant young woman this was, to be sure, and how prettily her determination became her. "If you are so set upon visiting your unpleasant protegee," he said, smiling, "I may as well show you the short cut across the fields to Combe Farm," pointing to the stile just ahead of them.

Nerine looked doubtfully at the young grass.

"Perhaps I ought not to tramp over the fields," she said.

"Oh, I think so. They are my fields, you know," laughing.

He gave her a hand over the stile, and the two walked on through the fresh spring fields in the quiet sunshine of the late afternoon. It was not far to the farm, but to Fairfax it seemed the shortest walk he had ever taken.

"I am afraid you have a long walk home," she said, as he bade her good by.

"No, only a couple of miles or so, and my solitary dinner is a movable feast. I expect Tommy tomorrow," smiling; "I suppose I may restore him to his owner when he arrives."

"You have been very kind about him," with friendly, sweet eyes meeting his. "But you won't bring him till the afternoon, will you? Because the children are going into the village with nurse in the morning, and I shall be visiting Mrs. Simpson."

"You are incorrigible with your Mrs. Simpson," he said, as he shook hands with her. "Well, then, Tommy shall arrive in the afternoon."

CHAPTER XXIII.

THE MISSING KEY.

As Miss Lispenard surmounted the second stile on the way to Mrs. Simpson's abode, the next morning, she stood gazing over the sunny landscape, her dark, slight figure sharply defined against the sky. Mr. Fairfax, from a distant post of vantage, shut up his field glass with the air of a man who has seen what he expected.

"That girl possesses uncommon qualities," he said, and filled his pipe in preparation for a long and idle morning. He was taking an uncommonly vivid interest in this determined slip of a girl. As he sat smoking in the sun, he explained to himself that it was because she was so unlike other women he had met. He fancied Lady Satterlee tying up old women's ankles and lighting their fires, and laughed to himself. It would not be precisely in dearest Dora's line.

Nerine meanwhile marched on quite unconscious. She slipped her hand into her pocket as she reached the cottage door, to see if her mother's diary were safely there. She was getting to have a superstitious idea that it would be unlucky to go anywhere without it.

Mrs. Simpson was better. She had passed a good night, without any nervous tremors, she informed her visitor, and ate a better breakfast than she had eaten for many a day. She made many protests as Nerine proceeded to tidy the room, and put fresh bandages on the greatly improved ankle.

"How long are you going to stay at the farm?" she asked presently. "I suppose you will be going away soon, and I'll never see you again."

"I'm not going for a week or so. Why? Will you miss me?"

"I'll be just lost without you," earnestly. "You've been as kind to me as my own daughter could have been, and you a born lady."

Gratitude and soap and water had made her look a very different woman from the dirty virago who had threatened to shoot her visitor on that wet day last week. Her eyes followed Nerine as a dog's might who had been lost and found again.

"I was thinking last night I'd like to give you something to remember me by," she said suddenly, "if you wouldn't be affronted by me offering it."

Nerine surveyed her.

"The best thing you could give me would be that case of whisky to throw out," she said. "And then to know that you were going to leave this lonely place, and go to your friends in London, where you would have something to do, and people to see."

She was a little frightened at her own boldness, but Mrs. Simpson did not go into a fury, as might have been expected. Instead, she sat perfectly quiet.

"Don't you think I'm right?" Nerine asked at last.

"I know you mean me kindly," with a choking voice, "but I told you the truth the other day. I haven't a friend in all the world but the dog, and what's London better than this, if, after you have walked the streets and bought things, you've no one at home to show them to? And Simpson would never send me another penny if he thought I was leaving this place. He'd be frightened of my getting to know people in London, and talking. He knows there's no fear of my telling on him here. No, no," wildly, "the best for me to do is to stay here and drink myself to death. Heaven knows my life's no pleasure to me."

She began rocking herself to and fro, crying.

"Oh, if I'd only had a child, I might have been better, I'm not bad, I'm not indeed; only when I've been drinking I get fits, when I'd do anything to get money or to be revenged on Simpson. I'm his wife; I've my marriage lines, and I darn't show them; for if ever I do, he swears he'll ruin Jim, and put me in an asylum. So he lives like a lord, with his nieces and nephews, and I live here like a pig."

"What does he know about your brother, that you're so frightened?"

With steady gray eyes which would not be denied fixed on her, Mrs. Simpson had to answer.

"Manslaughter!" she said in a sickly whisper. Then, as Nerine started back, "No, no, it wasn't murder," she almost shrieked. "I tell you Jim couldn't be hanged for it."

A thousand thoughts were whirling through the girl's brain; she sat down rather dizzily on the nearest chair.

"Tell me, could you live without the money your husband gives you?" she said after a time.

"No, I'd starve in the gutter; or I'd have left here long ago." She was utterly outspoken once she had begun, and she went on with a horrible frankness. "If I have no money, and the craving comes over me for drink, I'd do anything to get it. I don't want to leave here only to die in jail." Her excitement died away as suddenly as it had come. "Oh, it's no good talking," she said, wiping her eyes; "I've been like this for many a year; it's too late to change things. I suppose you won't take what I want to give you, now you know what a bad lot I am."

"I don't want you to give me anything, unless you would really like to." Her kind soul was unwilling to hurt the feelings of even a woman like Mary Simpson. "I wish——" She stopped abruptly; it did not seem time to introduce the subject of the skirt, or to tell Mrs. Simpson that she had indeed seen her before. She must find out something more first.

Mrs. Simpson misunderstood her silence.

"You don't want to take anything from me," she said, bitterly.

"It's not that," Nerine quickly replied; she did not want Mrs. Simpson to get excited again.

"Well, then, if it isn't," only half mollified, "would you just give me that box over there?" She pointed to a leather case on a shelf, and the girl brought it.

As she took it down, Mrs. Simpson said slowly:

"It's funny that your back should seem so familiar to me, and I don't recollect your face at all."

Nerine, from the midst of her preoccupation about the skirt, laughed outright.

"Perhaps you've seen my back oftener," she said, putting the heavy case down on the sofa, and narrowly observing if her hostess' forgetfulness was real or assumed.

"Perhaps I have." The answer was really unconscious. "There!" opening the box; "you see I've a few things left that I haven't sold."

A few things! Nerine gasped. Certainly there were not many ornaments in the box, but they were gorgeous indeed. Diamond rings winked at her, a string of lovely pearls stood out milky white against the crimson-velvet tray, all tangled up with barbaric Indian ornaments of carved gold and emeralds.

Mrs. Simpson held up a ring.

"Would you believe that ever fitted my finger?" she said. "It did once, and I had as pretty a hand while I took care of it as any lady, Simpson used to say. But these aren't what I meant for you; they're not good enough!"

She lifted out the tray.

"There!" triumphantly, "what do you think of that?"

She held up a far more beautiful ring than any Nerine had ever seen Lady Satterlee wear, which was saying a good deal. It was a half hoop of five huge pearls, beautifully set in fine gold wire, and Nerine sat staring at it.

A horrid thought possessed her. How had Mrs. Simpson obtained all these fine things? With a sick shudder, she remembered the chloroformed handkerchief clapped so firmly over her own face.

"I know you wouldn't want to have any things Simpson ever gave me, and I wouldn't give them to you either; they might bring you the bad luck they did me." Mrs. Simpson was looking hard at the ring and did not see Nerine's pale face. "But Simpson had no part in this; it was before ever I saw him. You wouldn't think, would you," dreamily, "that I ever was a dancer at a theater? Well, I was, and a good one, too, and I was going to be married to a man who gave me this." She paused, holding the ring tenderly. "He died just before we were to have been married, and I was wild, just wild! It was after that I fell in with Simpson. I had to go on and dance the night he was buried."

"But are you sure you want me to have a thing you value so much?" The woman was telling the truth about the ring, Nerine could see that; and, indeed, with all her sins, Mary Simpson was no liar.

"No one has been as good to me as you since he died," she rejoiced. "And if I had to burn it Simpson should never get it."

She leaned forward to put it on the girl's slim finger, but Nerine, with wide eyes, was staring into the box.

What was that little silver key lying among the trinkets?

Her hand fell to the pocket of her dress and clutched her mother's diary.

"What a funny little key!" Her voice was amazingly calm and natural to her own ears. "What does it open?"

"It's none of mine; it was among some rubbish of Simpson's I took to provoke him. I don't know why I put it in here; it must have been here for ages," she added, indifferently.

"I wish you'd give it to me."

"Take it if you fancy it. It's a pretty little thing. Look at them two stones set in the handle of it!"

Nerine, with a wildly beating pulse, and in dumb astonishment, felt her fingers closing on the key of her mother's diary. For that it certainly was; the work on the key was the same as on the silver clasps of the book and it was exactly the size and shape to fit the odd keyhole of the diary.

"You'll have the ring, too," Mrs. Simpson said; "that trumpery key's nothing."

Nerine shook her head.

"I would rather have just the key." Then she continued, as she saw the other woman's keen disappointment. "But before I go, if you still want me to have it, I will take your lovely ring. Only don't make me take it today."

"Well, perhaps you're right; you might lose it knocking around a farmhouse. But you'll take it for good by when you're going!"

"If you still wish me to."

"Who would I rather give it to?"

Nerine rose, and began to see after her hostess' dinner. The morning had been getting on, and by the time she had heated some soup, and got Mrs. Simpson to eat it and some potted meats and biscuits, she put on her coat to go home. She was aching to get out into the fresh air and unlock her mother's book; the problem of Mrs. Simpson's connection with Mayne had faded out in comparison with that. She had brought over a parcel of books, and she put them within easy reach of the invalid, promising to come back the next day.

"Or I might even come this evening, but I must go now."

She cast a glance at the jewel box as she turned away. It did not seem a safe possession for a woman in such a lonely place.

"Hadn't I better put that away for you before I go? I suppose you want me to lock you up as usual."

Mrs. Simpson laughed.

"Put it under my sofa; I'll take care of it." And she reached over to a small table just behind her. The top lifted up in her hand, and Nerine saw a small shining revolver. "I told you I could shoot any one who meddled with me. How do you suppose I've kept Simpson's hands off those things all this time?"

She spoke simply, and as a matter of course, but Nerine shuddered.

"Do be careful," she entreated. "But I know you wouldn't use it. Good by; and if I come again to night I'll knock at the window. I wouldn't like you to make any mistake, and imagine I was Simpson!"

She hurried out of the house, and ran as hard as she could to the stile that led into the fields. When she reached it she was dizzy with excitement; she leaned breathless against the stile.

Her mother's book was open to her at last, but it was not that which made her heart beat and her hand shake. It was the thought which was getting so plain in her mind, growing fast from a suspicion to a certainty. Could Mayne be Simpson? And, if so, what difference would it make to her?

She mounted the stone stile and took her book from her pocket. The key slipped in, and the covers sprang apart. The book was full of loose papers crammed between the thickly written leaves.

CHAPTER XXIV.

THE CONTENTS OF THE BOOK.

Fairfax, from his seat beyond the cottage, saw the girl come running from the house, and saw how blindly and dizzily she stood leaning against the stile.

"That beast of a woman has frightened her," he said to himself. "I knew it wasn't safe for her to be there alone."

He was glad he had come to keep an eye on Miss Lispenard's safety, and he strode down through the fields to the stile, to see what the trouble was, with a comfortable "I told you so" sort of feeling eminently masculine.

Nerine had her back to him; and as he reached her he saw that she was crying, for she turned her head sharply on his approach.

"My dear Miss Lispenard," furious within himself that he had not taken up a post nearer to the cottage and looked after her properly, "what has that wretched woman been saying to you? I'm afraid she has frightened you horribly."

Nerine shook her head, making a desperate lunge for her handkerchief.

"Oh, don't say that; you mustn't say that!" rather widly. "It was not that she frightened me, only——" She held out an old-fashioned leather book with silver clasps. "That is my mother's book, and I found the key to it at Mrs. Simpson's," incoherently.

Fairfax stared at her. She was trembling, and her cheeks were wet with tears.

"I don't understand," he said, quietly.

"Neither do I. If I did, do you think I should be sitting here, crying with rage?" she exclaimed, with angry impatience. "Oh, I wish Agatha were here! I don't know what to do, and I want some one to help me."

Fairfax sat down beside her on the roomy stile.

"Will you tell me, and let me help you?" he asked with a slow diffidence very foreign to him. "That is, if you feel like trusting me!"

Nerine looked at him through her wet eyelashes.

"Oh, it would bore you," she said, wretchedly. "And yet—oh, I don't know! I must talk to some one."

"Nothing which concerned you would ever bore me."

Something in his eyes, in the very quality of his voice, told her he was in earnest.

She pushed the book and the loose papers into his hand.

"Read those—the papers and these leaves," she said, "and tell me what you think is in them."

Fairfax looked up after a long period of silence, more puzzled than ever at the girl's excitement. He thought it extremely odd that she should find the key of her mother's book in the possession of a perfect stranger.

"I see that you and your sister were baptized twenty-two years and six months ago, and your brother Maurice just a year later, just before the death of your father. And this," holding up a paper, "seems to be the certificate of Mrs. Lispenard's marriage with your stepfather, when you were four years old."

"And my stepfather has always said that Agatha and I were twenty this year, and Maurice nineteen. And we have been of age, all of us, while he has been living in our house, and grudging us the bread we ate. Oh, why did I not find it out before!"

"You are sure?"

"Sure that I have often gone without proper food, and have been cold in winter, while Clarence Mayne stayed on, knowing he was no better than a thief! Oh, indeed! I am sure," she exclaimed.

"Well the sooner we get him out the better.

The Sign of the Corner

By W. W. Hatfield

Copyright, 1917, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

SIGNS and hunches were the guiding stars and compass by which George McMahan always steered his course. He believed in them firmly, and no matter where they led, there he followed. More than once they led him to see and hear and do strange things.

On this particular evening he brushed the unromantic dust of the Walker Manufacturing Company from his hat, bought an evening paper, and boarded a city-bound car of the folding door type. A conductor with a nervous disposition highballed the car and shut the doors hastily—so hastily that McMahan's paper was caught between them. In extricating it a little irregular strip was torn from the corner of a page.

McMahan, somewhat peeved, paid his fare and sat down. He had the typical American spirit in regard to his daily paper—he wanted the news all there. Consequently, the first thing that commanded his attention was the corner of which he had been partially defrauded. The mutilated item was of one paragraph, and, boldly headed, ran thus:

$1,000 REWARD.

Herman Spatz, famous book collector, states that the "Dante's Inferno" which he recently secured has been t is without doubt the most valu extant. He put it upon his by the next day had disappe its intrinsic value is smal contains important secret worth. One thousand dol offered for information "Dante's Inferno to re

McMahan read it twice, and after due deliberation decided that it was one of those prognostications of fate which were the basis of his philosophy. For some good and sufficient reason which was hidden from him the goddess had seen fit to destroy a portion of this intelligence. Possibly it was with a view to arresting his attention. Possibly—but there was nothing to be gained by questioning her motive. It was enough that she had shown him the sign.

A newsboy boarded the car at the next stop, and McMahan drew some change from his pocket with the intention of buying another paper. But he replaced the money, guided by the hunch that Fate, if she had wanted him to read the entire item, would never have torn the corner from the page.

So on the way home he occupied his time by filling in words to complete the meaning. This was not difficult. It was apparent that a book, Dante's "Inferno," had been lost by, or stolen from, Mr. Herman Spatz, and just as clear that a thousand dollars was offered for its return. Also, he easily divined that the value of the volume lay not in its market price, but in the mysterious secret contents.

Now McMahan was a book fancier of sorts himself. Many an evening, in fact all of them for the last week, he had spent in the little second-hand bookstore of old Levi Levi, browsing around among the musty volumes, eventually emerging with an episode of Nick Carter or an adventure of Sherlock Holmes. In addition to these, he had during the past week purchased six volumes of the works of Mary J. Holmes. You are right, he was in love. The disease had attacked him in its most virulent form, that subtle, insinuating, untractable variety commonly called love at first sight.

But even such a tremendous occurrence as this will not lead a man whose literary taste runs to Poe and Diamond Dick to enjoy himself reading different versions of the story of the false scrub girl and the beautiful duchess. McMahan had not bought them to read. He had bought them, primarily, on account of that intangible, evanescent odor of violets. That was the sign which fate had used to point out the girl. Incidentally, when the young lady had left the shop with the dime old Levi had given her for her dog-eared book, McMahan had become aware of the shy, half-recognizing glance; aware, too, that in spite of her worn, commonplace, factory-girl clothes, and her pinched, starved cheeks, there was something ineffably tender and appealing about her—something that was tying a hangman's noose in his heart-strings. So, in the absence of any other tangible clue, he had bought the book, and taken it to his room at the Cosmopole Hotel.

The novel, however, contained nothing enlightening on the subject, or object, of his heart's desire, beyond the intangible odor of violets. The inscription on the fly-leaf had been carefully erased.

The next evening McMahan had gone back to the bookstore and undergone a replica of the previous night's experience. In short, the scene had recurred each evening of the week, with no change in the relative standing of the actors, beyond the possible exception that the nightly glance which she bestowed upon him had gradually assumed an expression as near to scornful hauteur as her poverty-stricken appearance would permit. And from his six volumes of duchesses and scrub girls he had elicited only one fragment of information. An erasure less thorough than the others had enabled him to trace the letters of her first name, "Mary."

This evening, being Monday, he had not seen Mary for two whole days, although he had spent the entire Sunday searching for her according to the most approved methods of Sherlock Holmes and Nicholas Carter. Therefore, on reaching the Cosmopole Hotel, which was an ordinary lodging house filled with commonplace people, drab, uninteresting all, from the quiet little lady with housekeeping privileges in the attic room just above him to the fat, garrulous dressmaker in the first floor front, he was not slow in changing his clothes and setting out for his self-appointed rendezvous.

It was two hours before she came. She was a little paler this evening, and laid her book down for Levi's inspection with such a tired, resigned air that McMahan wanted to pick her up in his arms and carry her home. He tried to speak to her, but just then a hot flash came over him, a lump of his heart jumped up into his throat, and locomotor ataxia developed in his knees. By the time he had recovered she was gone.

McMahan, when his violet-struck wits had reassembled themselves, picked up the book which she had brought. Involuntarily an exclamation of surprise arose to his lips. He checked it, trying to appear calm and unconcerned, as though casually inspecting an ordinary book. Just because it was a Dante's "Inferno" one had no right to assume that it was the Dante's "Inferno." But when he had turned a few pages he came across a slip of colored paper, and shut the book with a snap, fearful lest the other should see it too.

"How much?" the query trembled on his lips in spite of himself.

"Seventy-five cents," answered Levi, craftily.

McMahan tossed him a dollar, muttered something about keeping the change, and dashed out upon the street with his prize, leaving the old Jew staring after him in wide-mouthed amazement. The girl had already disappeared, and although McMahan made hurried trips around all the adjacent corners, and thoroughly scoured the vicinity for an hour thereafter, he found no trace of her.

At length he gave it up and went to his room. A thorough, painstaking search of the book, leaf by leaf, brought to light ten of the colored slips. McMahan got his paper and read again, carefully, the lines:

"its intrinsic value is smal * * contains important secret * * worth. * * * * *

"Holy mackerel!" he ejaculated. "'Important secret!' Donner und blitzen! No wonder Mr. Herman Spatz wants his book back! No wonder he's willing to pay a thousand dollars for it!"

He placed the precious bits of paper in his wallet, thrust the book into his pocket, and went out, muttering to himself:

"Well, me for that little old thousand dollars, anyway, just as quick as a directory can tell me where to find this man Spatz."

His objective was a drug-store a block down the street. Halfway there he came to a dead stop, scratching his head in perplexity. In the excitement of his important discovery he had for the moment forgotten the girl.

Privation, no doubt, had driven her to the theft. As a mere book, it was a petty thievery which might have passed unnoticed, but viewed in the light of his own startling discovery, her crime had assumed ominous proportions. He would in all probability have to furnish information as to how the book had come into his hands. This would bring about a cross-examination of Levi, which would result in the arrest of Mary.

McMahan stared thoughtfully into the window of a delicatessen store. It was useless, he decided, to attempt to reason out his proper course. According to his theory, there should be a sign to indicate his next move.

It came to him, after several minutes of gazing at a roast chicken in the window, that he had had nothing to eat since noon. Could anything be more evident? Not accident, but design had halted him before this window. His path was clear as day. Besides, that roast chicken gave him a hollow feeling clear down to his toes. A spread in his own room would be a welcome change from the fare of the local beaneries.

Ten minutes later he was back in his room laying out the feast. Besides the roast chicken, there were spring onions and all the appropriate trimmings, everything from canned soup to pickles and peach pie and a fresh newspaper for the tablecloth. From a bureau drawer he resurrected a tin teapot and an alcohol stove. While the water was coming to a boil he engaged the teapot in conversation.

"Well, old tin-face," he expostulated, "who cares if she did steal it? I reckon if you were as near starved as she was, you'd have done worse than that. Thief or no thief, the next time we come together, there'll be arrangements made for a wedding."

As the pot made no answer other than a gurgle indicating that the water was boiling, he threw in a handful of tea and set it aside to steep while he washed the onions.

"What's a feast without an onion," he muttered blithely as he placed his favorite delicacy upon the table. Then he stared ruefully. "And what's an onion without salt? I wonder what made me forget salt. Could it be——?"

McMahan broke off and gazed interrogatively at the teapot.

"It is," he decided. "It's a sign. But where am I to get the salt? Not outside, for the tea will get cold. I'm to borrow it of someone in the house. But who? Let's see, only two housekeeping roomers in the shanty, the first floor front and the attic."

He drew a coin from his pocket.

"Heads up, tails down," he said as he flipped it.

The coin fell heads.

"Me for the attic," grinned McMahan, as he felt his way up the dark stairway. "Wonder if she'll have me pinched."

"Come in," a soft voice sounded in answer to his rap.

Somewhat doubtful as to the propriety of his act, he opened the door. The dim light of the flickering gas jet showed him a woman seated at a bare table across the room. She started up, frightened, as she saw him standing there.

"I—I beg your pardon, madam," he stammered. "I live in the room below you. I came up to see if you would lend me a little salt."

"Certainly," she smiled. "I thought you were the landlady when you knocked, or I would have come to the door. Nobody ever comes to see me but the landlady," she added with the bitterness known only to those who find difficulty in raising their rent money.

The woman had crossed the room toward him with the salt-shaker. McMahan noted that her dress was tattered, and that she walked unsteadily. She would have fallen if he had not caught her arm to support her. And then, his nostrils were filled with the delicate fragrance of johnny-jump-ups and the hangman's noose in his heart-strings had tightened to a throttle hold.

"Mary," he whispered, almost unconsciously.

Mary looked up at him with the expression of one who has heard the voice of her Prince Charming after she has given him up. Then she smiled.

"Yes—George," she answered.

McMahan almost let her fall in his surprise.

"You know me, Mary," he exclaimed wonderingly.

"I've lived here for a year," was the smiling reply, "and until a week ago I worked for the Walker Manufacturing Company, where I saw you every day. Then I fell sick and lost my job and I—I've been living on the ten cents a day that I got for my books," she finished weakly, closing her eyes.

McMahan did not answer—in words. He picked her up bodily, carried her down to his own room, and deposited her in a chair which he had drawn up to the table.

"Now," he ordered gruffly, as he poured her a cup of tea, "when there's nothing left of this chicken but the bones, you can talk—no sooner."

The warm tea and wholesome food soon brought color to her cheeks and sparkle to her eyes. To McMahan, as he watched her, the world seemed filled with great possibilities and johnny-jump-ups. Words are inadequate here. It is worse than folly to attempt to describe a picnic dinner on the altar of Isis, with Cupid shooting shafts through the holes in the doughnuts. I can only say that, though those ready-roasted delicatessen store chickens at a dollar thirteen per are mighty small, a wing and the neck was still left when Mary promised to be Mary McMahan.

"Why not?" she said. "I've made eyes at you for a year. And you," she pouted, "you never even looked at me."

"I never saw you," McMahan confessed, "until you came into Levi's last Monday evening."

"Oh, my books," she sighed. "That was the worst of it. It was like parting with my old friends."

"There they are," he pointed to a row of books upon the mantel. "I bought every one of them as soon as you got out of the shop."

Mary ran over to them with a little cry of delight.

"My poor, dear friends," she said. "They were all that I was able to save when father died, two years ago. Everything else was taken for debts. Everybody thought that father had money, but he was such a poor business man. He made all sorts of foolish speculations, and when they got his affairs untangled there wasn't a penny left." Here she broke off and stared wistfully at the books.

"Didn't you get—the other one—the last one?" she asked in a strained voice.

McMahan had forgotten it. He drew it from his pocket now like one performing an unpleasant duty, and handed it to her in silence. He wondered what she would say.

"It nearly broke my heart," Mary was saying, "when I sold my own books. But this one—it was like committing a crime. It was the only thing of his very own that father left me. And I never read any farther than the first page."

"What?" exclaimed McMahan, "you say your father left you that?"

"Yes, I always kept it in the bottom of my trunk, wrapped in——"

McMahan did a war dance about the room.

"You little goose," he fairly yelled in his excitement. "Living on ten cents a day with—look here! This is what I found in your book."

He extracted the slips of paper from his wallet and thrust them into her hands.

"Each one of those slips," McMahan went on, "is a certificate for one hundred shares of Bay Lynx gold mining stock. Two years ago you could have bought it for a dollar a share. Today it's selling for a hundred. A hundred thousand dollars in the bottom of your trunk, and you living on ten cents a day!"

Then there was a heated discussion about who owned the money, and as neither would take it, they decided to spend it together, in the plans for which the evening passed rapidly.

It was late when they separated for the night.

"Well, old tin-face," he interrogated, "where do you suppose Mr. Herman Spatz comes in on this?"

As the teapot maintained a discreet silence, McMahan set about to clear away the remains of the repast. He was in the act of wrapping up the remnants in the pewspaper which had served as a tablecloth when this paragraph, in the corner of a page, caught his eye:

$1,000 REWARD.

Herman Spatz famous book collector states that the "Dante's Inferno" which he recently secured has been tested and is without doubt the most valuable cure extant. He put it upon his corn, which by the next day had disappeared. While its intrinsic value is small, the fluid contains important secrets of medicinal worth. One thousand dollars' reward is offered for information of a corn which "Dante's Inferno Corn Remedy" is unable to remove. Get it at any drug-store.

"Well, well, old tin-face," McMahan mused as he restored the teapot to its hiding place in the bureau drawer, "signs are funny things, ain't they?"

How to Make an Iceless Refrigerator

By Ella Gordon

Copyright, 1917, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

A VERY useful convenience for the farm home where ice is not obtainable is the iceless refrigerator, and may well be called a companion convenience to the fireless cooker for hot summer days. To be a conservator of every bit of food is becoming a household rule throughout the country, and here the iceless refrigerator can serve a war purpose.

There are many ways of lowering temperature by utilizing the fact that water when evaporated draws off heat from surrounding objects. Every nurse is taught that if a pitcher of water be wrapped with a cloth which is kept saturated and exposed to a draft of air, the temperature of the water in the pitcher will be lowered by several degrees, and this is exactly the principle upon which the iceless refrigerator is operated. Any one can easily construct this refrigerator, and the preserving of supplies, and the keeping of left overs and unused portions until they are needed will be made easier.

CONSTRUCTION.—A wooden frame is made forty-two inches high, with a solid top and bottom sixteen by fourteen inches. The door is made to fit closely, fastened onto the frame with brass hinges and kept closed with a larger wooden button. Make adjustable shelves of strips of wood three inches apart. These rest on side braces placed at desired intervals. A covering of white canton flannel, smooth side out, or of white duck is fitted to the frame; one edge on opening down the side where the door is not hinged, and the other on the edge of door with hem to overlap one inch to keep the cool air from escaping through the crack. The lower edge should extend into a drip pan which will be necessary if the refrigerator is kept in the house. On top of the refrigerator is placed a pan filled with water as large, or nearly so as the top itself. Extending down each side is a wick made of double canton flannel abo t half the width of door. Several inches of the ends of the wicks lay in the top pan and they then fall to nearly the bottom of covering. It is well to fasten each wick where it passes over the top edge of covering, as when it is wet the weight is liable to pull it out of the pan.

The pan on top should be kept well filled with water; let the upper ends of the four wicks overlap in the pan and place a stone on them where they overlap as a weight to keep them in place. The wicks, as they hang down the sides should be kept in close contact with the covering so that the water soaked up by the wicks will be carried to the flannel covering and keep the latter always wet. It is the evaporation from the wet covering that carries off the heat and thus lowers the temperature of the interior of this kind of refrigerator.

When opening the refrigerator, lift back the front wick and lay over the top of door as shown in cut. When the refrigerator can be kept in a shady place where it catches the breezes, the temperature may be reduced to fifty degrees Fahrenheit. Days when the air is damp and lifeless, the refrigerator will not work as well.

CARE OF REFRIGERATOR.—Clean and sun regularly. It is well to have two covers, so that a fresh one may be used each week. Give the woodwork and pans two coats of white paint and white enamel.

Care of Food Suggestions

In using butter, try to turn back the paper in which it is wrapped and cut from it without letting the hands come in contact with the butter. Rewrap and place in deep bowl of light brine and keep covered.

Left-overs of rice, cereal, or cooked macaroni should be put into bowls, the surface smoothed and covered half an inch with cold water. Drain before reheating.

As canned fruit rapidly loses its flavor after being opened, any remaining portion should be put into a glass jar.

To insure the keeping of fat taken from gravy, bacon, stews, etc., it must be boiled in water with a few slices of raw potato added, put away to cool and the fat removed and heated hot in the dish it is set away in.

Berries should never be kept in boxes, but turned out on platters and kept separated and in a cool place. This prevents mold and treated in this way, berries will keep from one to two days longer.

Do not let food of any kind remain in a warm kitchen.

Food that is a little warmed will spoil very quickly. Therefore, when reheating stews, baked beans, soups, vegetables, etc., make sure they have been brought to the cooking point all through.

Food should be kept covered.

Pack yeast cakes in salt with the tin foil wrapper left on. In this way several yeast cakes may be kept on hand.

When sweet cream is on the point of changing, add a pinch of cooking soda to each cup.

If butter becomes rancid, soak in water to which cooking soda has been added, one teaspoon to a quart. Wash in sweet milk and the unpleasant flavor will have entirely disappeared.

Poultry should be carefully drawn as soon as killed and hung in the coolest available place.

Eggs packed in bran, oats or dry salt will keep longer than if exposed to the air.

Smoked fish and meats should hang in cloth bags.

LYNCHINGS LAST YEAR.—Records of the Tuskegee institute at Tuskegee, Ala., show that 54 persons were lynched in the United States in 1916. Fifty of the persons put to death in this manner were colored and three of these were women. Forty-two of the 54 victims were charged with offenses other than assault. In 1915, 67 persons, 54 colored and 13 white, were lynched. In 1914, the record was 52. In the past 30 years about 3,600 persons have been summarily executed by lynchers.

CHAPTER XI.

A SURPRISE IN GARDENING

"NOW we have our two sets of garden tools," said Pittysing one day, "we've got to make some gardens. 'Cause, what good are they if we don't use 'em?"

"We could play with 'em," suggested Simmie-Sammie.

"It's rather late in the season to commence a garden," said their father. "This is August, and frosts may come next month. Seeds are usually planted in the spring."

"I guess maybe they could SPRING up 'most any time, couldn't they?" asked Pittysing. "They'd grow a little while, and 'twould be fun to watch 'em. And, don't you see, we'd learn something about it, and be all ready to do it good next year? Have you got anything we could plant?"

A search of the house brought to light corn, peas, beans, radish seeds, and, for flowers, sweet peas and nasturtiums.

Out in a corner of the vegetable garden there were some empty beds where radishes and lettuce had been growing earlier in the season, and here the children set to work. Shovels, hoes and rakes were plied with a will, and when the beds were smooth and soft, the seeds were planted.

Pittysing planted some of all the kinds she had, putting them very close together, so if some didn't grow there would be sure to be plenty to make a good showing.

Simmie-Sammie planted mostly beans, secretly hoping that they might spring up in a night, like Jack's in the shivery story his Christmas book told about.

"Now we must water the gardens every single day it doesn't rain," said Pittysing.

Next morning Simmie-Sammie ran out early in his little pajamas to look at his garden, and came in with a disappointed face.

"Mean old things!" he said. "My beans didn't gwowed any yet."

"Well, what did you expect?" asked his sister. "That they'd be up this morning?"

"Jack's did," Simmie-Sammie declared. "Way up—big, big! An' he climbed up on 'em!"

Pittysing looked at him pityingly, then smiled in a grandmotherly way. "When you're six years old, going on 'most seven," she told him, "you'll know better than to believe such things. Mamma told you it was only a story when she read it to you. We'll have to wait days and days before our things grow, so you might just as well be patient, and think of something else. Bring your clothes, and I'll help you dress, so you'll be ready for breakfast when mamma calls us."

Every day the children watered the gardens with the little green watering-pot, and every day Simmie-Sammie dug up his seeds to see if they were growing. When the beans swelled and began sprouting, he pulled them apart to see the tiny leaves inside, then jammed them down into the earth again. Of course, as might have been expected, the beans refused to grow at all after such treatment.

After a few days, nasturtiums and beans pushed up through the soil in Pittysing's garden, followed soon by radishes and corn. She was delighted, but Simmie-Sammie didn't enjoy it.

"'Tain't any fair!" he complained. "You had the best garden, an' the best seeds! You taked your choose, an' left things for me what wasn't any good."

"'Twas just because you dug them up," Pittysing told him. "You'll understand better what to do next spring. Or maybe you could plant some more things now," she added, watching his unhappy little face.

A bad little thought came into Simmie-Sammie's mind, but he didn't say anything about it. That night, after supper, when Pittysing was helping mamma with the dishes, he softly called to Gyp, and together the little boy and the puppy dog went out into the garden.

And the next day, when Pittysing, carrying the little green watering-pot full of water, went out to her garden, what do you think she found? Her beautiful little garden bed all trampled and spoiled; every little seedling, every tiny green leaf, scratched up and killed. It didn't take her long to decide what enemy had been at work.

With fast-beating heart and flashing brown eyes, she ran back to the house.

"Mamma, mamma!" she shrieked. "Oh, WHAT do you think that naughty boy has done now? Spoiled my lovely garden, every last speck of it, just 'cause he'd spoiled his own, and didn't want me to have one!"

Then she threw herself face downward on the couch, and lifted up her voice and wept.

Simmie-Sammie's face was very red, and he stooped over and began tying up his shoestrings.

"Oh, Samuel," asked mamma sadly, "did you really dig up the things in sister's nice garden?"

"No, I never!" declared Simmie-Sammie. "An' there ain't any Samuel here. Papa's Samuel. I'M Simmie-Sammie!"

"Oh, hear how he fibs!" cried Pittysing, sitting up and showing a face all red and smeary from crying. "After he promised me, too, he'd be a good boy so I wouldn't have to watch him! And I was going—"she went on, her voice trembling, "I was GOING to give him the very first radish that was big enough to eat, out of my garden, 'cause I was so sorry he'd spoiled his!"

"Now, Simmie-Sammie," said his mother firmly, putting her arm around the little boy," I want you to tell me the truth. Look up here. Leave your shoe-strings alone—you're tying them into hard knots. Now, what did you do to Pittysing's garden?"

NO WONDER PITTYSING WAS ASTONISHED AT WHAT SHE HAD FOUND.

Simmie-Sammie couldn't look up in his mother's face. He did manage to raise his eyes to the pin in her collar, but they wouldn't go any farther.

"I never pulled up her plants," he said. "I—I just planted something else in her garden."

"What do you mean?" asked his mother. "I'm afraid, oh, Simmie-Sammie, I'm afraid I shall have to put you to bed until you can tell me the truth."

"Wait—wait!" cried Simmie-Sammie; "I AM a-tellin' the twooth! I planted some STICKS in her garden, an' Gyp digged 'em up! He must have spoiled her plants when he scwatched for the sticks. Gyp's a bad puppy dog. MAYBE you better punish him."

"Yes, and who told him to scratch and dig? It's bad enough to spoil folks' gardens, but it's a good deal worser to try to have a poor little puppy dog punished when you're to blame your own self!" Having said this, Pittysing buried her face in the sofa pillow and went on crying.

"Don't you think," said their mother, "that you ought to do something nice for Pittysing to make up for your part in it? Gyp didn't know any better, but you did."

Simmie-Sammie thought a while. He was sorry for what he had done. He hadn't thought Pittysing would cry so over it. But he didn't like to say so.

At last he climbed up into his mother's lap and whispered, "I'll make it all wight. You'll see."

Then he kissed Pittysing's ear, which was the best he could do, with her face buried like that, and her hair tumbled all about.

"I'll twy not to be bad to you any more," he promised. "I'll give you half my hen, an' I'll take the milk over to Gwandma Bwown's all the nights for a week, an' I'll—I'll—I know! I'll wipe the dishes in the morning, two mornings, so you won't have to."

Then he went out and watched his hen a while, wondering which half of her he would give away, and thought that if Pittysing wasn't satisfied with his peace-offering she must be hard to suit.

In the morning, Pittysing was swinging in the hammock, while Simmie-Sammie wiped dishes, as he had promised.

"Guess I'll go and look at my garden," she thought. "I can smooth it out, and have it all ready to plant seeds in next spring."

Five minutes later, she rushed into the house, more excited than she had been when she found her garden spoiled.

"Mamma! Simmie-Sammie!" she shouted. "Oh, come! come quick!" Then she darted back again toward the garden, her mother and Simmie-Sammie following.

Simmie-Sammie was dragging the dish towel after him as he ran. Of course Gyp thought it was for him to play with, so he seized it and ran off under the barn with it, and what became of it Simmie-Sammie never knew.

No wonder Pittysing was astonished at what she found. So was her mother. And so was Simmie-Sammie. Not even Jack, whose beanstalks grew so tall in a single night, had a greater surprise.

For there—maybe you won't believe it—but there, all around Pittysing's garden bed, were some pretty, round stones for a border; next to the stones a row of dainty maiden-hair ferns were growing; there were six pansy plants, with large, velvety purple and yellow pansies all in bloom; and in the very center of the bed, a clump of tall scarlet poppies were nodding gaily.

Of course you've guessed who had prepared the beautiful surprise. Yes, the Dapperlings!

Skippywink had been skipping around, and had heard all about the children's gardens. When Nattie learned from him how badly Pittysing felt over her spoiled plans (and plants) she coaxed the other Dapperlings to help her, and all in the silent night, with only the starlight and glowworms to see by, they had made this beautiful garden.

They didn't expect any thanks, but did it just out of the kindness of their Dapperling hearts.

Of course the tiny ferns grew in the woods, and the round stones could be picked up almost anywhere, but don't ask me where they got the pansies and poppies, for I know no more about it than you do.

The next chapter tells how dreadfully frightened the Dapperlings were when Pittysing found them all having an open-air concert and she caught little Nattie and held her. What do you think she did to Nattie? What happened to the others?

as we could at an embroidery club? Unless the war stops very soon, on our women will rest the responsibility of caring for the aged and feeble. Let those of you who live in the city remember this and begin right now to organize sewing circles and make useful garments for the poor little children who need them. The money spent for embroidery material would buy almost enough clothing but most of you have out-of-date clothing that will do very well. Try this and I am sure you will be a thousand times happier and better satisfied with your day's work.

Those of you living on ranches where fruit and vegetables do not grow and who wish to be of service to your country, and to make money besides, can raise a few more sheep.

That will help to supply the 200,000 pounds of wool that is needed for soldiers' uniforms.

I would be pleased to hear from all the crippled girls from twelve to twenty-five years of age.

Sincerely, MISS EDITH SCHERER.

SEBASCO, MAINE.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

Will you admit a sister from 'way down in Maine? I have read COMFORT ever since I was a small girl and used to borrow Grandma's. I enjoy the letters about children as I have two, a boy nearly five years old and a girl three years of age. When they cry and pout I don't scold them but say, "I wish my good little boy (or girl) would come. I don't want a naughty baby." In a few seconds I hear, "Here I is, Mamma, I'se come."

I live in a small fishing village and for about two months have been a shut-in. I haven't any folks or friends here and I live quite a distance from any other house so sometimes it is weeks that I never see a person except my husband and the children. My husband goes to work in the early morning and doesn't get home till night and I get very lonely here. I am praying as I write that this will be published but I cannot write an interesting letter for I never had the privilege of securing even a common school education. I am the oldest of twelve children. We lived a long distance from the little schoolhouse and when I grew old enough to go I had to go to work. My parents were poor and sometimes it was impossible to make both ends meet. By studying nights after my work was done I learned to read and write and spell a little. I also studied arithmetic and that study was the only one I could manage to make much headway in alone. At the age of eighteen I was broken down from hard work and when a young fisherman offered me a small home and his care I was glad to accept, but my health was ruined and I can truly say that in the seven years I have been married I have never felt well one day. Have been in the hospital for a serious operation. Do I believe in large families? No, unless there is plenty of money (and good health on the part of the mother) for in poor families the oldest children are always sacrificed for the younger.

I will close by asking the sisters to please send me reading matter or anything that will help pass away the long, lonely days and will you pray that I may have better health to care for my little ones.

Mrs. Wilkinson, may the Lord bless you and may you live many long years to carry on the good work you have begun.

Very sincerely, MRS. ADA PERRY.

MONTANA.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I have been a reader of COMFORT two years and think there is no other paper like it. I find so much in it and I have come for help today and I feel sure I will get it.

I have been married four years to a "dear Jack" and we have a baby girl two years old whom we both love dearly. Jack is good to me and kisses me good by when he goes to work and when he returns but here is my trouble—he has been married before but his wife lived only two months. He has told me hundreds of times that he loves me more than he loved his first wife and has told me all about his past life and I believe him. But he has three sisters living near who seem to think the world of me and I know would do anything for me but at times they will tell me how happy Jack was with his first wife and that no man ever thinks so much of his second wife and things like that and it nearly breaks my heart. Sometimes I fancy I cannot endure it to think my husband loved another woman. Do you think he ought to go to them and talk to them about it? I have told him that and he says it would be no use for they don't know anything about it and they did not live with him at the time. He was only nineteen then and twenty-eight now. I often think why shouldn't he love me better? We have lived together longer and have a dear baby to love and we are so happy together. Will someone who is a second wife give me her idea of it.

With love to Mrs. Wilkinson and all the sisters,

MRS. J. M.

Mrs. J. M. I think maybe that Jack of yours ought to administer a spanking to you the next time you show signs of doubting his love. Now be sensible and ask yourself which is the more lasting, the love of a boy of nineteen or a man's love at twenty-eight? How lasting were your own love affairs when you were sixteen or seventeen years old? Of course he reverences the memory of his dead wife but there is every reason why he should love you more. What do the others think?—Ed.

CLEATON, KY.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I have been married eight years and have three boys, Lois, seven years, Otto, five years, and Marion, three years. Also a baby girl, Bertha Grace, five months old. We live with my father and baby sister, Nettie, six years old (my mother has been dead over two years), so you know that I am very busy and the sisters' letters and helps are always interesting. We live on a small farm in the western Kentucky coal fields. Most all farm and garden produce finds ready sale here.

Now sisters I am going to say a few words on a subject which I have never seen in our corner—the high cost of living. Try to reduce the high cost of living by raising all for your table at home, and canning your own fruits and vegetables in their season when they are best and cheapest. A very small garden, rightly cultivated, will be a great help. A small back yard (if you can't do any better) has its possibilities. A row of tomatoes or beans along the back fence will more than pay for their trouble if you do not keep chickens. A pig, kept in a pen if necessary, fed the table scraps and enough corn and bran to keep it growing steadily is a paying proposition at killing time.

For last winter we canned about seventy-five gallons of fruit and tomatoes and lost only three or four gallons. We also put up dried peaches, sulphured peaches and apples, canned beet pickles, salt cucumber pickles, sweet and Irish potatoes, cabbages, dried peas and beans and some meat and lard. Some of you will say, "You live on a farm so that is easily done." No, it is not easily done, but it is worth while.

Another suggestion and I will stop, sisters, teach the little folks their alphabet and how to read and spell some before you start them to school and it will save the teacher a lot of work and worry and give the children a better start, too. A set of letter blocks are a great help.

Long live COMFORT and all its staff.

I cannot answer letters. MRS. PEARLIE GRAHAM.

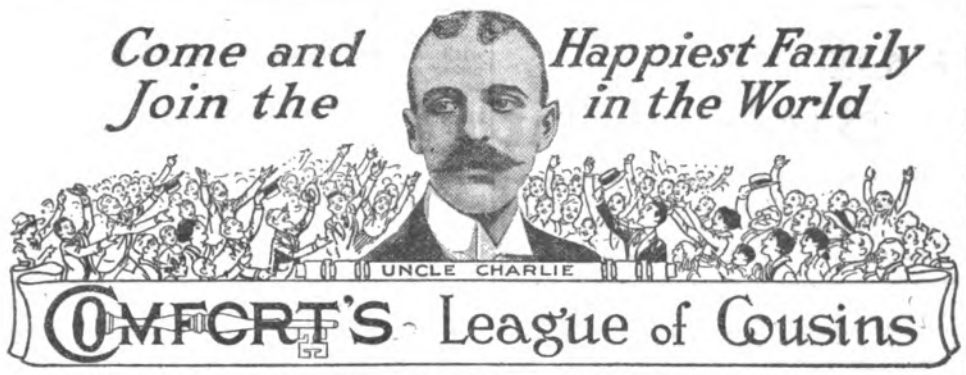
Mrs. Graham. Your recipes for canning fruits and vegetables would be a great help to the sisters and I hope you will favor us with a few of them. In a recent number of COMFORT the editor has spoken of the possibilities of the home garden and I can only agree with him—and you.—Ed.

MONROE, Lock Box 570, N. Y.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

I received so many letters in reply to my letter in February COMFORT that really it was impossible for me to answer all of them, some two hundred or more. However, I answered all who enclosed stamp. I received many kinds of seeds and will plant all of them and to those to whom I haven't sent the hollyhock seeds—it is because my supply ran short and if you will write again, about August or September, and enclose a stamp, I will send you some of all the kinds I have. Those who asked other questions, if they will write again and enclose stamped envelope for reply I will answer their questions. One person asked about chickens but I could not make out what the name was so couldn't answer. But if you will write to Dept. of Agriculture at Washington, D. C. and to the capital of your state, they will gladly send the bulletin on chickens, artificial brooding, etc. These farm bulletins are free. I don't want money for any information I send to anyone. We are all sisters and brothers through Christ and I think it a very small thing not to willingly give any information I may know, whether it be about the climate, chickens, farms or historic places.

I am an Episcopalian but I trust I am broad minded enough to be a friend with all, no matter what their faith may be. We all think we are right in our belief and are striving to live the right kind of a life and hope to reach the same goal with the same reward for all who come in His name.



I thank all who sent me pieces for my quilt. I am making it "Odd Fellows' Chain" in all kinds of calico; with the heavy goods I am making it "Uncle Tom's Cabin." All colors are appreciated, light or dark.

To the sister from Harrisburgh, Nebr., I lost your letter. If you will write again I will answer.

Since I wrote my last letter to COMFORT I have moved and am now on a very large farm and expect to raise lots of pigs, calves and chickens. I have two heifers now, and one cow, one pig, one horse and two hundred chickens. I just love the great outdoors and am now in perfect health.

Some of you thought I was too happy and had no cares. Ah, you didn't know that for the past three years I had been in miserable health. I used to sit in the house and sew or embroider and my health was very poor. But since I moved up here, right under the mountains, almost, I have been out of doors almost ten hours out of the twenty-four. I haven't lung trouble now, and can laugh at most any trouble. I always think everything happens for the best, so why question God's superior wisdom. I almost radiate and my friends wonder why I am so healthy looking. Good health is the foundation of all beauty. Anyone can make the most of their looks, whether ugly or pretty, if their health is good. Women ride too much. Instead, walk one or two miles, or more, a day. There is no better exercise than walking. It is the best exercise for the expectant mother. Don't stay in the

IF this country is to continue to exist and your homes and children made secure, you will have to have Wake up America talks dealing solely with the war in these columns, until every man, woman and child in the United States realizes that the very existence of this country is at stake, and unless each one does his or her bit with all the frenzied, patriotic intensity that the men, women and children of Germany are doing their bits, this war and the cause of world freedom will be lost.

It is a terrific job to arouse a people, a people that has been doped and poisoned by the propaganda of peace at any price traitors, largely in the pay of our enemies, and poisoned with the lies of the reptile foreign language press, a people occupying a vast continent and indifferent to anything but local and parochial affairs, to the grim realities of a war which may yet dim with sorrow every home in the land. You have simply got to realize we are at war with the most savage, relentless enemy that has ever cursed the earth and face the music, and that music may be a funeral dirge for you and yours, and for liberty and freedom the world over, unless you take the issues of this war to heart with passionate intensity.

For years I have been warning you of the great crisis that was coming into your lives and the life of this nation. I am a deep student of world affairs, and everything I have prognosticated so far concerning this world struggle, has come true. It cannot be wondered however that you are asleep. You had your merry, frenzied, peace-at-any-price ghost dancing, and fooled yourselves with the craven, contemptible election cry of "He kept us out of war!"

I often told you that there were certain responsibilities that no individual, and no decent self-respecting, honorable nation could side step or avoid. We had to be true to ourselves and our ideals and principles, we had to meet the impudent challenge of a murderous foe, and we must be prepared to shoulder our responsibilities and to shed rivers of our best blood, ere we can safely lay them down. We did not seek this war, this war sought us, and we simply could not dodge it, and, thank God, we have gone into it, just as our Allies have, with clean hands. I told you you had to fight this fight or become slaves; I told you that there were two forces struggling for dominance in this world, the democratic, republican idea, represented by France, England, Italy, Canada, Australia, Switzerland, Portugal, the United States and other liberty-loving countries, and the autocratic, monarchical, king by divine right idea, represented by the Central Powers and that curse of the world—Turkey.

No one seeks to destroy the German nation, but the German nation will destroy you if you don't protect yourselves and curb the murderous mania of its rulers and people. The Teutonic idea of "Germany over all," the superman, the man on horseback, with its fiendish and brutal militarism, its hateful system of spying and lying, intriguing and plotting, which has cursed the whole earth, and made creation a hell, has got to go, and you've got to make it go, and when it's gone, the world will be rid of its greatest menace, and we can realize dreams of peace and brotherhood and live in a world of roses.

Every nation, more or less, is afflicted with a dominating, exploiting class, but this class is easily kept under control in all countries except those of the Central Powers, where the Kaiser and his junkers, his fiery military satellites, his arrogant nobility, hold despotic sway. You who gave little thought to world affairs could not conceive how the Allies could be fighting and making common cause with a despotic country like Russia. Russia was a menace under the Czar, but not one millionth of the menace that Germany was. You however, did not know that there was more real, revolutionary spirit in Russia, a more intense longing for liberty than there was probably in all the rest of the world put together. Everyone who could look an inch beyond his nose knew that this war would give the Russian his chance to dump the Czar and his bunch of royal hangers-on, who were intriguing with Germany to keep junkerism and royalty in the saddle. When the Czar went the only weak spot in the Allied cause went too. Now the issues are clean drawn, and it is up to you to say what kind of a world we are to have, whether we are to be Belgiumized, Prussianized, terrorized, robbed of everything that Washington and Lincoln fought for and held dear, robbed of everything bequeathed us by the men who wrote our glorious Declaration of Independence, become slaves, wear the Prussian helmet, fight Prussia's battles and be kicked around like dogs, or fight the battle of liberty and remain free men in a free, instead of a slave world.

The Allies have been shedding rivers of blood and expending mountains of gold that we might enjoy in peace all that our freedom loving fathers, with the help of France, won for us. They would have won this war without our help had not the devil placed in the Kaiser's hands an American invention, a slimsy, snaky, crawly, creeping, treacherous, fiendish instrument of destruction called the submarine, which makes murder and piracy a fine art. Not even the food ships for starving Belgium, the cargoes of which have been gathered at such immense cost and sacrifice, and which were given safe conduct permits by the German government, not even hospital ships full of wounded soldiers and Red Cross nurses, not even passenger ships loaded with women and children, are safe from these hell hounds of the deep, typically Prussian in their ferocious methods, typically Prussian in their merciless ruthlessness. To sink ships filled with food for the crushed, tyrannized, enslaved and starving Belgians, whose men and women and young girls have been dragged into a slavery worse than death, whose cities have been sacked, robbed and burned, whose people have been tortured and destroyed as though they were vermin, whose household goods and possessions have been carried off by their pitiless conquerors and whose people like the people of Northern France have been left with only their eyes to weep with, people it was Germany's bounden duty to feed, is the last word in diabolism fiendish cruelty and unspeakable deviltry. This is Germany's policy of frightfulness. She believes just as the Mohammedan believes, that it is her sacred duty to make war as terrible as possible, to be fiendishly cruel, ruthless and merciless, so that no living soul of inferior breed (and in Prussia's eyes we are all inferiors) may dare look the all-conquering Teutonic superman in the face and live. It is absolutely necessary for you, the people of the United States, to know the kind of foe you are going to face, a foe that spares no living thing, neither women, children nor even fruit trees, and to know the kind of fate that awaits you—the fate of France and Belgium—if you do not rush to the battlefields and hurl the brutal hordes of godless and diabolical Kaiserism back to the land from whence they came, and in which hereafter they should be forced to stay. The Kaiser has informed you that Germany has kept the peace for forty years. He forgets however to tell you that Prussia was the first nation to militarize her entire population, an act which forced conscription on nearly all of Europe. The first to start permanent military alliances. Thrice she has sunk her teeth in the living flesh of poor Poland, and between 1860 and 1870, Prussia ruthlessly invaded and dismembered Denmark, Austria and France, and after cutting France to pieces in 1870, a year or two later she wanted to go back and bleed her white all over again, and was only prevented from doing so by Russia and England. There has been peace in Europe only because Germany has had her own way. France, existing miserably, never knowing from day to day when the storm might again break upon her, had to dismiss Delcasse, her brilliant foreign minister, because he succeeded in laying the foundation of friendship between Great Britain and France (who previous to this had been hereditary enemies) thus incurring Germany's displeasure. Great Britain is accused of planning to attack Germany, just as if a nation with practically no army at all, would dare attack the greatest military power of the age. Twice Great Britain approached Germany and begged for a naval holiday, a year in which neither side would build a single warship, and was repulsed.

Previous to war being declared, munition factories in Great Britain were shut down because the government would give them no orders. Democracies always sleep when war is in the air. That great socialist Robert Blatchford, and that fine old soldier Lord Roberts, pleaded with the Britons to arm, the latter pleaded so persistently, that he was officially warned to shut up under pain of losing his pension.

Next month I will tell you how this war started and make plain to you all the historic facts that made this conflict inevitable. The crackbrained vicious idiots who tell you this is Morgan's war, lie and lie wickedly. It comes nearer to being God's war than any other war, horrible as it is, for if democracy triumphs, and I cannot believe that the Almighty will allow it to be defeated, the whole of humanity will simply bound forward on the pathway of progress, and more for justice, righteousness and freedom will be accomplished as a result of this hideous carnage than could have resulted from a hundred years of peace, while if we lie down and let the Kaiser walk over us, the world will degenerate into a Prussian slave pen. No nation has ever showed such great patience under tremendous provocation, as has this nation in the last three years. The greater patience we showed the more arrogant, impudent and murderous the junkers of Prussia became. Now no less than thirteen nations are arrayed against this common enemy of mankind. At the Hague conference of 1907, Germany was hostile to all projects of limited, compulsory arbitration. In conjunction with Austria, her present ally, she succeeded in having these plans dropped though they had been passed by the overwhelming vote of 32 against 9. It was the same way when the munition question was brought up. Germany insisted on selling to the whole world, for the making of munitions is one of her greatest industries. Though her sympathies were all with the Boers, she sold England huge quantities of ammunition to help her down the Boers. Germany objected to us doing what she has always done herself, and which we could not refrain from doing without favoring Germany, and as a neutral nation we had no right to show her any favors. We did what we had a legal and moral right to do and no more. Fanatics and Teuton sympathizers yelled "Put an embargo on munitions and stop the war." That was another bit of subtile hypocrisy. Stopping the war meant at that time a German victory, and a German victory would have meant that we should have had to face the full might of Prussia alone. Now do not deceive yourselves. If you want to keep what Washington and Lincoln fought for you too must fight. Better to fight in France by the side of those French and British and Canadian heroes, our democratic brothers, than have all the horrors of Belgium, Poland and Serbia re-enacted all over again on our shores. Enough nations have been devasted without devastating ours. You read in histories of the great Crusades, of the tens of thousands of Christians who swept from the remotest corners of Europe to the Holy Land to free the Holy Sepulchre from the impious hands of the Saracen infidel. Even the children joined in those crusades, and if you know nothing about those crusades, and probably you don't, for God's sake get your histories and read about them. In those days men were men and women were women. Today we simper "We're too proud to fight. Let George do it. He kept us out of war," while thousands of poltroons are or were hiding behind the skirts of women and marrying and adopting children to save their craven hides. Thank God this war will show us who are loyal Americans and who are traitors. It will cast out the human dross and bring the true mettle of American manhood and womanhood to the front, and put the fear of God into the hearts of plotters and traitors. The American people are at war, the American people are once more standing guard o'er the altars of liberty and freedom, learning anew the glorious lesson of service and sacrifice, giving the best of their blood in a holy cause, ridding the world of tyrants, fiends and despots, and making justice, truth, righteousness and democracy forever secure for mankind.

On the twenty-fifth of next month I celebrate my fifty-fourth birthday and shall be glad to have a word of cheer and encouragement from all my friends. Shall also be glad to hear from my enemies as the Department of Justice is most anxious to get in touch with them.

Don't forget that Uncle Charlie's four wonderful books may still be had. Start in at once to obtain them,—they cost you no money, only a very little time and effort,—and keep at it until you have the entire set. The book of Poems is beautifully bound in ribbed silk stiff covers; the Story Book is bound in two styles, the one in ribbed silk stiff covers like the Poems, the other in paper covers; the Song Book is bound only in heavy paper covers and the Picture Book in handsome stiff covers. Poems or the Story Book in ribbed silk stiff covers, either one for a club of four subscriptions; the Song Book or the Story Book in handsome paper covers or the Picture Book in pretty stiff covers for a club of only two subscriptions. These four books are a library of endless joy and merriment, the best medicine to drive away the blues and the best gifts in the world.

My picture book, too, has started a deluge of inquiries: Is Billy the Goat my daughter, is Maria her Ma? Is there an Aunt Charlie? Is the big boy in the picture book my only baby? I have had a little leaflet specially printed answering all these questions fully, and those who are interested will find the same in every copy of the four Uncle Charlie Books sent out this season.

Now for the letters.

TARRYALL, COLO.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I live on a farm near Tarryall, Colo. It is a nice one; it contains one hundred and sixty acres. My father is away, so my brother and I do all the farm work. Some if it is hard, and some of it is easy. I like to work. My brother and I are training a horse to ride. I went to get on a horse and he whirled and began to buck, but I got the rest of the way on him and got him stopped. It sure was fun. I am thirteen years old but sometimes I feel like forty. I come in from the field as tired and pokey as a donkey.

Yours sincerely, HARLAND H. PATTEN.

So Harland, you are training a horse to ride are you? Well, well, that's quite an idea. I've heard of men training horses to be ridden, but I never yet heard of one being trained to ride. Well, horses have been ridden for ages, why shouldn't they have a rest now and take a ride themselves? In a circus once I saw a horse that was trained to ride an elephant. Are you going to buy an elephant Harland, for your gee gee to ride? If you are please let me know and we will have all the cousins on hand to see the sight. The Goat informs me I'm all wrong as usual and that you mean you are trying to convert a bucking broncho into a gentle saddle horse. That must be lots of fun. Harland, I fear you are doing too much work. It is not right that you should be forced to toil until you are all worn and exhausted and feel like a man of forty. The health of the nation is its most precious possession and the people of the United States are rapidly becoming invalids. Out of 11,000 men who were examined for the Navy the other day, all but a thousand were rejected as physically unfit. Better leave some of the work undone than have a physical breakdown. You are at a delicate age, when not too much exercise and plenty of rest are needed. Tell your papa what I said.

LANDIS, ARK.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I am a country girl. I am sixteen years of age, and have blue eyes, blonde hair, am five feet five inches tall and weigh one hundred and eight pounds.

My sweetheart has blue eyes, blonde hair and is twenty-two years of age and weighs one hundred and twenty-two pounds. We have been keeping company two years and have been engaged seven months. He has always treated me nicely. We are third cousins. Do you think it would be all right for third cousins to marry? He has never made a date with any other girl since we have been keeping company. He walked with a girl one time but he said he didn't walk with her over one hundred yards. Would it be proper for him to accept a tie from me? Asking you to answer and tell me if you think he is true to me or not,

I will ring off, BESSIE LAWRENCE.

Bessie, I don't think there is any objection to third cousins marrying, nor even second cousins. if there is a record of good physical and mental health on both sides. It is only when there are hereditary taints and mental disorders that the inter-marriage of cousins accentuates these disorders and makes such marriages undesirable. So your beau only walked with that girl for one hundred yards. Ah, Bessie, I'd like to bet they were mighty long yards. He might have walked only a hundred yards, but he might have stood still every other yard for a couple of hours and so have made that hundred-yard walk last for several weeks. I think that young man will bear watching. Now as regards giving that young gentleman a tie. I suppose that would be all correct, but what is he going to do with it when he gets it? Who is going to help you dig that tie up, and don't you know if you start appropriating railway ties, you are liable to be arrested for felony? Then too you might cause a wreck. What's that Billy? She means a tie to wear round her best fellow's neck and not a railroad tie? Excuse me. You see it is twenty years since I had a tie round my neck, and as these are practical days when lumber is scarce and costly, it's not to be wondered at that I am liable to get a little mixed occasionally. Wait a couple of years Bessie, before you get married. Four years would be better still. You are twenty pounds below the normal weight for a girl of your height, and that young man of yours needs another twenty pounds. I hope Bessie, by now you have sacrificed him to his country and that he is in the army gaining weight and experience that will make him a better and more efficient citizen, and a more capable defender of his wife and his country.

MAZENOD, SASK., CAN.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I have not seen many letters from Saskatchewan printed. Do many Canadian people take COMFORT, Uncle? (Yes, thousands of them, Uncle C.)

We came to this country from Michigan. We like it fine here. It is a little cold in winter though. This is a great country for raising all kinds of grain.

Last year we raised wheat, oats, flax and barley. We own a half section of land, that is, three hundred and twenty acres. We just live in a sod house now, but we are planning to have larger and better buildings in a year or two. Uncle, I am sending you some snapshots I took with my camera. I like to take pictures and have quite a collection. I am planning to have a nice flower garden this year. Two years ago our municipality had a Junior's Fall fair. I received five dollars, first prize for the best potatoes; first prize of one dollar for a three-minute address on any farm subject. (My subject was, "A Progressive Farmer"), second prize, fifty cents, for bread, and second prize, fifty cents, for a drawing of our schoolhouse and grounds. I think it is a good thing to have those fairs as it encourages the children to be producers.

The one who received the most prizes got a scholarship of one hundred dollars.

My, but this war is terrible. I was glad to hear that the United States had declared war against Germany.

My brother is fifteen years old. He is not quite old enough to fight. I heard they had the Czar of Russia locked up. I guess that is the place for him. Well Uncle, I guess you and the Goat will both be angry with me for staying so long. I am seventeen years of age, five feet seven inches tall, have dark gray eyes and brown hair, Your niece,

MABEL ERB. (League No. 42,667.)

Thanks Mabel, for your newsy, chatty letter, and the pretty pictures that accompanied it. I don't wonder you got a prize for potatoes. We could not make out what those peculiar cylindrical things in the picture were. The Goat thought they were watermelons. Maria thought they were Zeppelins, and I hazarded a guess that they were footballs or balloons. They remind me of potatoes we used to have out West. I was staying on a ranch and volunteered to go out and dig up a few potatoes for dinner. It took me three hours to uncover the top of one, and then we had to get dynamite to blast it out of its earthly bed. Whenever we wanted potatoes for dinner we used to go to this grandpa potato and excavate a few square yards. People who live in the effete East have simply no conception of the tremendous size of the potatoes that are raised on the virgin soil of our Western states. What a lot of prizes you have won, Mabel! I did not know there was so much money in Canada. Just hold on to that money, and I will come up and help you spend it. Billy the Goat has joined a canning club and wants to knew if Canada is the place where cans come from. Billy the Goat is most anxious to can Bill Bryan, then he's going to can all the pacifists that the government hasn't already canned, and too he's going to can all the kings and queens. Later on he is going to can the Kaiser and his friends Stone and La Follette. We are also tickled to bits that Uncle Sam has gone into the canning business in time to prevent the War Lord gentleman with the mailed fist from canning Texas, New Mexico and California. No, they have not got the Czar of Russia locked up, Mabel, they have got him canned and that is better still. It is a pity we could not grab some of the anarchists, impossibilists and extreme socialists who are doing their level best to spoil the whole Russian revolution and turn their country into a jungle and can them too. Canada has done gloriously well in this war. If we had got on the job as soon as she did the war would have been over long ago. If you are going to put out a fire put it out before it has time to spread. That is the only safe, sane and sensible way.

ALBUQUERQUE, 710 N. 6th St., N. MEX.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I am going on a claim shortly so I can raise that one potato you spoke of recently. Well Uncle, give us some more talks on the churches. I am a mother of five children and it seems almost impossible to keep them in Sunday School as everything is so high here. Four potatoes for twenty-five cents.

I think I am as good a Christian as my neighbor who goes every Sunday to church. The question is can one be a good Christian and never go to church. On the wages my husband makes I can't afford to dress well enough to go, as the children come first.

Well, Uncle, I consider you lucky to own a goat. If the high cost of living keeps up we'll all be glad to be goats and eat tin cans. With love,

MRS. GEORGE FRANKLIN.

Don't keep your children out of Sunday School dear friend, because potatoes are dear. Everybody understands (or should understand) that the whole world, or at least the greater part of it, is going through its Gethsemane right now. On the way this country plays its part in this terrific world crisis rests the whole future of mankind. As long as the women of America can feed their children, how they are dressed matters little. Personally I think it would be a glorious thing, if, while this bloody conflict is going on, the women and children could adopt some kind of semi-uniform as simple and convenient as the Khaki worn by the man, and put gaudy trappings aside. We are on the whole the most over dressed nation in the world and we talk more about clothes than any people on earth. Looks and duds are the main topics in nearly every magazine one opens. The war has led to simplicity in dress in the old world, why not here? Our girls seem to be trying to imitate war fashions in the matter of dress, or lack of dress, for most of them don't wear enough clothing to flag a hand car or make a pair of pants for a humming bird. The modern mother too often is a slave to her children, and she would starve herself and go around all the year in a gunny sack if she could succeed in making her pampered brats resemble a bunch of brazen chorus girls. I don't believe children like to be all dolled up like a sore thumb, or like a millionaire's Christmas tree, in fact I know they don't. This competition amongst mothers as to whose kid shall most nearly resemble the feathered denizens of a Brazilian forest, is all wrong. The more people have on their backs, as a rule, the less they have in their heads and pocketbooks. The great Count Tolstoy clothed himself in the costume of the Russian peasant. He wanted to get down to Christ like simplicity. The barefoot business however is dangerous. You don't need to do the Tolstoy act, and you mothers don't need to worry so much about clothes. It is what the children have inside their heads and not what they have on their backs that counts, and it's mighty little any of you worry as to what the girls have in their heads. Going to church does not make one a good Christian, but all good Christians ought to go to church at least once a week. If we can pack the movie picture theaters every night, we ought to be able to pack the temples of our God once a week, and the churches will be packed when we get the right

You had better write to your sister and brother at once. But tell me about the book? Have you always had it? And could you never find the key?"

"The key is the strangest part of it. I found the book this winter in Mr. Mayne's room. That was the first of the queer things. And Mrs. Simpson is the last."

Sitting on the stile, in the warm morning sunshine, she told him of the robbery of the silver; of finding her skirt in Mrs. Simpson's house; of the book with "C. Mayne" on it—evidently taken at the same time.

"And now I find my mother's key, and Mrs. Simpson says she has had it for ages!" She paused for a few moments, and then added: "What do you think? What would you do?"

"I think," said Fairfax slowly, "that you are the bravest little lady in this world."

Nerine flushed scarlet at this praise.

"Oh, nonsense!" she said; "I do things from anger, not courage. I was deathly frightened when I shoved the silver into the chimney."

"It is all the more to be proud of, then, that you did it. Look here, Miss Lispenard! You have found out that Mr. Mayne has deceived you about your age, while he appropriated an extra two years' income. Well, I think you are going to discover more facts about him, if you act carefully with Mrs. Simpson."

"What do you mean?" Nerine asked, very pale.

"I mean that I think Mayne is—Mr. Simpson!"

"So do I." She put her hand on his arm excitedly. "I feel as if I must go back to Mrs. Simpson at once, and get all out of her," she cried. "Would you? Or would you wait till to-morrow?"

"You are sure she does not know who you are?"

He would have liked to kiss the brave little hand lying on his arm, but he did not even look at it.

"Yes, certain. She has been going to ask me what my name was twenty times, but I have always put her off the subject."

"Well, she is tied by the ankle. She can't get away from you, and I think you have had quite enough of her for today. Why not go home, and write to your brother and sister, and tell them what you have found out before you try any more?"

"I think I will. Do you know," half laughing, as she slipped down from the stile, "I feel quite ridiculously tired."

She was very silent all the way to Combs Farm; she was tired, indeed, and her face was very white when they reached the door.

"Good by," Fairfax said. "You look quite done up. Take the advice of an experienced and elderly person, and eat all the lunch you can obtain."

"I don't think I want to eat; I never can eat when I'm angry; and"—she clinched her slim young hand—"you can't imagine how I'm feeling about Clarence Mayne."

"That is a waste of energy," he returned, quietly. "You are just beginning to get the upper hand of him; you ought to feel rejoiced instead of angry. It is Mr. Mayne," smilingly, "whose impotent rage, if he knew of your discoveries, should prevent him from enjoying his meals."

The girl surveyed him gravely, with eyes very dark from worry and fatigue. What was there about him which made him so good to rely upon?

"You are quite right," she gave him a rather pale and watery smile, "but I am so accustomed to being defeated in my battles with Mr. Mayne that I am not very sanguine about this one."

"I am," Fairfax returned, firmly. "Now, do go in, and if you really can't eat, have a sleep."

"I'm not sleepy."

"Oh! Aren't you?" He laughed as he took off his cap and departed.

Sleepy or not, she was glad to lie down on her bed when she got up-stairs, and let nurse bring her some luncheon on a tray. Every limb ached; and when nurse, unbidden, drew down the blinds, the girl turned her head restfully on her pillow and fell into a sound sleep of exhaustion.

It was four o'clock when she woke. She sat upright and looked about the room, full of the soft, mellow light of an afternoon sun through the blinds. She felt rested, and herself again, but as she put her feet on the floor and felt for her shoes, a sudden strange feeling came over her. Mrs. Simpson was alone in that cottage; she must go to her at once. Everything depended on it.

"Oh, what nonsense!" half aloud. "The woman had been alone there for years, and what was this afternoon more than another? Besides, she could not go. Mr. Fairfax was coming over with Tommy, and it would be rude to go out."

Yet, even as she laughed at herself, she was bathing her face and dressing with steady haste in her blue serge frock, with the book in the pocket. It was odd that when Fairfax was coming to tea, she did not put on her black frock; odder still that she pinned her hat to her coils of black hair and put on her jacket.

Fairfax, established comfortably in the sitting-room, with May and Joan hanging over the recovered and life-like Tommy, heard the front door shut sharply, but took no especial notice. Joan had informed him on his arrival that Nerine was sound asleep in the middle of the day.

"And nurse said we was not to disturb her on any naccount"—Joan was fond of n's—"for she looked very poorly."

So his advice had been taken. Mr. Fairfax subdued his soul to patience, and sat conversing with the two children quite contentedly, till nurse entered with the tea tray, half an hour behind time.

"I was waiting for Miss Lispenard to ring, Miss May," she said as she put it down, vexed that her nurslings should be kept waiting.

"She's asleep," Joan returned, promptly. "I shall pour out."

"She was, Miss Joan; but she's up and gone out, this hour and a half gone. I did not have her told that you were here, sir," turning apologetically to the secretly dismayed visitor, "fearing to disturb her; but when I went to see if she was awake, Mrs. Palmer told me that she saw her going out about four o'clock. Will you be pleased to take a cup of tea, sir, with my young ladies?"

"Thank you, nurse, if Miss Joan will pour it out for me."

Even in his annoyance and secret uneasiness about Nerine, he could not disappoint the children by flying off after her without his tea. But he swallowed it very perilously hot, and ate his cake in indigestible gulps, allowing only a sufficient time to pass to save appearances in the astute eyes of the stout and respectful nurse, before he seized his cap and stick and went off at a good round pace in the wake of Miss Lispenard; for, in spite of his excellent advice as to waiting, of course she had gone straight back to Mrs. Simpson.

At all events, he would be in time to walk home with her. He wished he dared scold her well for her childish impatience. Surely Mayne had enjoyed her money for so long that another day could not matter.

He was very warm, and rather put out, by the time he reached the stile nearest the cottage. Not because Miss Lispenard had gone out when she knew he was coming (hunting through his pockets for a match to light his pipe; and smoke while waiting), but because it was so unsafe for her to be alone with that abominable woman, who might be drunk and violent, and half kill the girl.

He sat smoking, with his eyes on the cottage, waiting for her to come out. Presently he saw a figure coming round the back corner of the house. It was not Nerine, it was a man, and he was making his way very quietly and cautiously past the kitchen window to the door.

The kitchen door was fast, and the man tried the window, wiping his fingers fastidiously after their contact with the damp frame. Then, more cautiously than ever, he passed round to the front door and disappeared from the watcher on the stile.

"Now, I wonder what that means," Mr. Fairfax observed.

He put his hot pipe in his pocket, regardless of a good coat which did not deserve such treatment, and walked toward the cottage, with his hands in his pockets.

Through the open door came a sound of voices; as he listened one rose shrill and furious.

"I tell you I'll kill you if you lay a finger on the girl!"

Mr. Fairfax took his hands out of his pockets and disappeared within the door.

CHAPTER XXV.

PREPARING THE NET.

Mrs. Simpson had looked up joyfully as Nerine tapped at her window before letting herself in at the front door. She was flushed and lovely after her hasty walk from the farm, and rather mischievously pleased at having left Fairfax in the lurch, for he really was too silly with his warnings about the cottage.

"Here I am, after all," she cried; "just in good time to have a cup of tea. Down, Snap, my dear—down!" as the dog jumped joyfully up at her. "Run out, Snappy, and have a run while I make some tea for us all."

"I feel gladder than ever to see you, the day's been that long, and I've been nervous somehow. I was wishing terribly that you'd come when you knocked at the window."

"Perhaps your wishes brought me," smiling, as she came back from filling the kettle in the kitchen, "or perhaps I just wanted to come. I wish I had brought some bread and butter; you must be very tired of biscuits."

"I never eat bread or meat," with a superior air. "But I wish you wouldn't wait on me; I was trying my foot a while since, and it's quite strong."

The Kingdom of Our Birthright

In running this series we are not advocating belief in astrology or faith in the pretended talismanic charm of birth-stones, although these beliefs have persisted from remote antiquity and have not a few devotees even in this present age of reason. Yet as myths and superstitions that have dominated through the ages they possess historic interest and educational value. Miss September will appear with a pleasing message next month.—EDITOR.

MISS AUGUST.

THE sign Virgo (The Maiden) is strongest felt from August 22 to September 23, and influences that great vital function, the solar plexus, which controls the digestive forces, and may be called the chemist of the human organism. "Eat after your own fashion; clothe yourself as others do," is an old adage not to be despised by persons born under this sign, for the appetite will dictate what they should eat, if allowed to. The desire for food and its digestion will be controlled by the general physical condition, work and surroundings, and such persons should get far away from the idea that when the appetite lags, it should be whipped into activity by highly seasoned foods, or stimulating drinks. Artificial stimulation of the gastric juices leads to enervation of the digestive organs, which is but the beginning of a long line of disorders. Fasting and sleep are Nature's restorative for such persons, if they would accomplish all that nature intended. "As a man eats, so he works."

Men and women born under this sign have unusual aptitude for learning and teaching. They possess fine discriminating powers, and will succeed wherever accuracy and rapidity are the qualifications, and develop great endurance if their duties are in accord with their natural impulses. They are very sensitive to flaws in color combinations, things awry, or discordant sounds.

Such women are devoted and worshipful and control husband and children by a natural, pure love that quickly discern anything destructive to their well-being, and will rally all their forces to its elimination. They make acceptable companions to their children in all outdoor pleasures, and have youthful endurance.

The children may be peculiar about their diet, and what appears to be notional, is but nature's way of expressing their needs. Their senses are acute, and any extended sickness will greatly reduce them. They should choose their own vocations, guiding them only through education and developing a tendency toward greater deliberation before action. They will readily follow studies pertaining to anatomy, physiology and chemistry.

The August Birth-stone is Sardonyx for Happiness

Lovers born in August may proudly wear a sardonyx engagement ring, for it symbolizes happiness, and is very beautiful as well, being a variety of onyx and consisting of alternate layers of sand and milky-white chalcedony.

The Ancients prized it very highly for the making of cameos, and in preparing for some noble mission, or when some great contest was on foot, that happiness might follow, the sword-hilt was often ornamented with sardonyx and an amulet of the same jewel worn next to the heart, carrying the symbol of their hope. Faith in the tradition of the gem caused the brave to be braver, and the strong, stronger.

Happiness is entirely from within and defies conditions; it is more from enjoying than possessing. Its first principle is the love of something outside of self. There must be the incentive to labor, to concentrate on the deeper and simpler things of life, which take away all desire for sham and pretense. The wife who can, with a modest income, concentrate on making her home bright and happy, so that it shall be the cleanest, sweetest, most cheerful place her husband can find refuge in, has found happiness in her consciousness of well-doing. The husband who appreciates a standard of living, who is unselfish and kind, ever ready to hearten the struggling ones, who makes himself something more than "the man that pays the bills," is certain to reap a reward of happiness.

Miss August, in her tennis costume, comes to proclaim the gospel of the great outdoors, where the very essence of happiness reigns; where, with head and chest up, and shoulders back, you give yourself a chance to breathe. Miss August tells us the familiar fact that it is difficult to walk, just for the sake of walking, which alone is sufficient reason why outdoor sports should be cultivated. Furthermore, that the best kind of exercise is that which works, at the same time, both brain and muscle, and here no greater opportunity is offered than an the diversion of the fields, streams and woods.

If you are not blessed with a family for companions, write some congenial spirit to meet you just as "Old Sol" peeps up over the distant hills and hie yourselves to the woods and stream, clad in raiment and footwear conducive to a cheerful frame of mind. It is life, and when you recall the orders of the doctor to walk with shoulders squared and chest arched, you will discover the fact that you are already doing so.

Wear the birth-stone and seek the simple, deeper things of life, that you may be happy and healthy.

How to Make Miss August

To make Miss August, shape a doll from white cloth and stuff with cotton or sawdust. Cover with yellow crepe paper, representing a princess dress. Make buttons of red and tie to match; also put a touch of red on a white paper cap. In the right hand fasten a racquet made by covering a heavy cardboard racquet shaped, with brown wrapping paper, and represent the stringing with wrapping twine. In the left hand fasten a round button or marble to represent a tennis ball. Outline face with water colors.

Dont's About Fingernails

DON'T tear a hangnail, if one develops. Clip it carefully with your manicure scissors, and rub on a little cold cream or vaseline. You can form the habit of hangnails and it is an unbeautiful as well as an uncomfortable one.

Don't let the cuticle grow up on the nail at its base. Learn to push back between thumb and forefinger every time you wipe your hands, and painstakingly do this every night with fingers dipped in olive oil, vaseline, or cold cream.

If you have never cut the cuticle at the base of the nail, don't begin, even though it has grown up over nail. Push it carefully back once a day, with the blunt end of an orange-wood stick, after soaking the fingers in warm, soapy water, scrubbing thoroughly, and working back the cuticle as much as possible with the thumb of other hand.

Do not shape the nails with the manicure scissors, but with a nail file. Be careful not to file too deeply on the under surface of the nail, as you will rub and roughen the skin of the finger.

Do not polish the nails too brilliantly. It is not considered in good taste. Burnish with the palm of the other hand.

Do not use a steel nail cleaner, but an orange-wood stick. Scrub and soak nails in tepid soapy water, and dip the orange-wood stick in same before each movement with it. Go, also, over outside of nail where it joins cuticle at base, with orange-wood stick wrapped in a bit of cotton and dipped into the soapy water.

Do not try to shape nails while they are soft. The shaping should be one of the first steps in a "home manicure," before the hand is put into water. When the nail is softened with soaking, it is much harder to file. You can put the hand to soak after filing and before cleaning nails.

If the nail is difficult to clean, dip the wet orange-wood stick in a nail bleach, such as you can buy at any druggist's, and clean under the nail with this. This may also be rubbed around the edge of the cuticle where it touches the nail at sides and base.

Always be careful to thoroughly scrub nail free from all bleaches, polishing powders, or other substances, at the close of manicuring, using soapy water and a nail brush. Then rinse the fingers thoroughly, dry and rub in some hand lotion to keep the skin soft and white. A good lotion is as follows:

To Soften and Whiten Hands

Rosewater, four ounces; orange-flower water, four ounces; borax, one half dram; spirits of benzoin, one dram; bruised almonds, one ounce.

Add rosewater and orange-flower water to the almonds, and shake. Let stand for twenty-four hours, then strain, add the soda, shake until dissolved, then add the benzoin, drop by drop, shaking constantly.

Do not affect oddly shaped nails or nails of unusual length. They are not in good taste, nor are they beautiful to look upon. Round the nail to conform to the contour of the finger-end, and have it just about as long as the finger itself.

Keep the knuckles thoroughly scrubbed and softened, so that they will not be an undue mass of wrinkles. Thorough rinsing is essential to prevent the skin from becoming harsh and dry from soap left on.

If the nail is ribbed, your body lacks some of the elements it requires, as is also the case when the nails are brittle and crack easily. Rub them in such cases, with vaseline nightly, but in the meantime reform your diet and your bodily habits. You need, quite likely, more water more vegetables, and probably more fats, such as cream, milk and butter.

Do even half of the things, and you will have ample reason to be proud of your hands, I can faithfully assure you.

Answers to Questions

Proud Old Thing.—I thought your letter remarkably sensible and sane. Indeed you have every right in the world to take care of your personal appearance. I should wear gloves wherever gloves were correct to wear, and never any place else. You will not need to wear gloves, however, I am sure, if you will coddle yourself a little. I know you cannot do much of this with a house and family to take care of, but try to do a little. To begin with, you want to remember that skin cracks for several reasons, but the most usual one is too sharp a change of temperature. If you have your hands in very hot water, give them a hasty wipe on apron or towel, and go to the door for something, you may be sure a crack or two will soon appear. Moisture is also responsible for many cracked hands. If your hands are in hot water and you must go to do something else, rinse in warm water, then in cool water, and dry very thoroughly indeed, so that there is not a bit of moisture. Too much time, you say? It will get to be second nature if you practise it for a little while, and if you want to save your hands you must never go with them wet for a minute out of water. If you could keep a jar of almond meal on your toilet table or, rather, your washstand, and pour a little into the palm of your hands always after washing them, rubbing them thoroughly on each other until they were perfectly dry, you would find it of great use in keeping them free from chapping and also firm and white. Even corn-meal kept in the kitchen for this purpose is not to be despised. Be sure you keep it in a jar, however, and never put your hands into jar but, rather, pour meal out on hands. Putting your hands in moistens all the meal and takes away its value. Get an orange-wood stick, and wind a little bit of cotton around one end, dip in peroxide and use to mop off the stains at side of nails, of which you speak. Be careful to clean nails thoroughly with orange-wood stick when washing them—not every time you have them in water, of course, but every time you wash them just to wash them. Have the stick just beside the wash-bowl. Indeed, try to group the things you may want to use, conveniently. A little low shelf above the bowl is sometimes the best way. Here is a good lotion to rub on your hands after washing or at night. I think it may prove cheaper than the preparation which has helped you, and be as effective.

Lotion for Hands

Orange-flower water, four ounces; rosewater, four ounces; borate of soda (borax), one half dram; spirits of benzoin, one dram; bruised almonds, one ounce.

Mix first two ingredients and the almonds, and shake until creamy. Let stand for twenty-four hours, strain through cheese-cloth, add the soda, shake until thoroughly dissolved, then add the benzoin a drop at a time, keeping the mixture constantly shaken. It is convenient to use a long olive bottle for this, with a cork. Benzoin always softens water, and your water may be hard and thus crack your hands unnecessarily. Borax added to hard water will soften it, also. It takes only a few drops of tincture of benzoin to soften a bowl of water. I shouldn't use alcohol on my scalp, nor bay rum. Shampoo the hair once in two weeks—see what I have said to others this month—and massage the scalp when you have time. Alcohol dries up the scalp, and that is not good for the health of the hair. I could not tell you how much milk to take for the baby, without adding fat to yourself. You can only tell that by trying. If you have'a't enough nourishment for it and rich enough milk, then you need more food of some kind—milk or something else.

Mrs. S. V. P.—Building the body up all over will build up legs also, but in addition you should take leg exercises. To develop the calves of the legs, there is nothing better than rising slowly on the very tips of the toes and then very slowly and gradually indeed sinking to the heels again. You should keep this up for five minutes, if you can do so without too much fatigue. You will feel the strain in the calf of the leg, which shows that you are exercising and developing that muscle. The squatting exercise is also good. Put heels together, hands on hips. Now, keeping the body perfectly straight above waist, sink slowly to a squatting position, the buttocks resting on the heels. Without removing the hands from the hips or bending the upper half of the body, rise to an erect position again. You can see that this will exercise the legs thoroughly.

Mrs. G.—You should not use either the peroxide or ammonia and "leave the face dripping." Merely mop it on the hairy spots, not on the whole face. A couple of times a day is enough, and you most certainly should wash your face in addition. Every night, wash your face thoroughly with warm soapy water, and rinse many times. After the last rinsing in cold water, and drying, you may carefully mop the hairy spots with peroxide or ammonia and let dry on. But do not touch any other part of the face with it. In the morning, wash the face with tepid water without soap, dry, then apply the ammonia or peroxide, and let dry on. You may, if you choose, use it one more time during the day; and you can, after an hour, wash the face at any time it needs it. I am glad the hairs are getting whiter and finer. Keep right on with the remedy. The ammonia you are using is all right, and you need not weaken either it or the peroxide, if it does not irritate your skin.

Kathleen H.—Your cheeks and neck will thin down again, I am sure, before you are two years older. This is just a temporary condition. But, in the mean time, you can practise this exercise.

To Reduce Fat Neck

Standing perfectly straight, turn the head as far to the left as possible, as if trying to see over the left shoulder; then turn back and as far to the right as possible. Continue for ten or fifteen times. Drop the head on the chest and, letting it hang as if it had no connection with the body, roll it around toward the left shoulder, then over the shoulder, and let it fall back as far as it will, roll it along to the right shoulder, over the right shoulder, and let it fall front again. In other words, roll it around in a complete circle, starting with it hanging on the chest; letting it, later, hang backwards, and finally hang on the chest again.

Lottie.—You should weigh from one hundred and ten to one hundred and fifteen. Wear your dresses at fifteen, about an inch above the shoetops, if you wear quite high shoes. If you do not wear such high shoes, wear skirts about nine inches from the floor. Part your hair from forehead to neck. Comb one half up behind the ear, and braid. Do the same with other side. Now, tie the first braid to the part where the second braid begins, with a big bow of ribbon. Tie the second braid to where the first braid begins, using another bow. Really, I like to see the hair of young girls in one or two braids hanging loose. It is quite a fashionable way to wear the hair.

Country Girl.—For the hair that has been burnt around the face, there is nothing to do but wait. Massage that portion of the scalp nightly, to stimulate its action, and brush it, as well as the rest of the hair. In time, a new growth will come, I feel sure. You do not weigh too much for your height, though more than a girl of your age usually does. Your measurements are not much out of the way, and will get into proper proportion later. I expect, however, you need a little more exercise than you are getting. You should be outdoors every minute you are not needed in the house. And you should play every outdoor game possible. Roller skating would be good for you. Your skin peels because probably, you use too much soap or do not rinse sufficiently. Use a camel's-hair complexion brush at night, as I have so frequently advised. Rinse face very thoroughly, always, and rub entirely dry. Take care of your bowels at least once a day, and drink lots of water, and your skin will not trouble you much longer.

H. L.—See answer to "A South Carolinian" in last month's issue. Sorry that it is against the rules of this department to answer inquiries by mail.

Mrs. W. H. C.—Use the ordinary household ammonia. I imagine what you are using is diluted too much, or rather that you diluate it too much. You might try it at its full strength on the skin of the leg, and see how much too strong, if any, it is; then dilute it accordingly. Of course, the stronger it is, so long as it does not irritate your skin, the more effective its work. I am so glad you enjoy the magazine.

B. J. H.—The way to get over being fat, Miss Sixteen, is to cut out fat-building foods. Quite likely you are rather fond of candy, cake, pies, preserves and other sweet things. If you really want to reduce, you must cut them out for a while. Oh, no, not for always, only until you are a normal weight. Then you can eat them in moderation. Don't eat between meals,—that is another thing to remember; and do chew every particle of food until it is liquid. Don't eat potatoes, rice or macaroni, either. If you read last month's COMFORT, you learned a lot about how to reduce. You need exercise, too. Don't you play tennis? I wish you did—that's a mighty good way to reduce a too fat bust. So is swimming. And practise the arm exercises you find in these columns from time to time.

L. C.—Your hair will begin to get stronger and come back as you regain your strength. That is the only sure way to improve it—build up your entire body. As to the dandruff, a shampoo once in two weeks may be sufficient, if you anoint the scalp the night before with olive oil, well-rubbed in, and tie the head up in a towel. Always take down the hair at night and shake and air, and then either let it lie loose or braid very loosely indeed. A sunning, whenever you have time in the day—letting the hair down and occasionally shaking and lifting it, as you sit in the sun—is very good for it. If the sun is too warm for you, take the crown out of a broad-brimmed farmer's hat, and slip the hair through the opening thus left. The brim will shade your face, while the hair can be left to hang free in the sunshine, getting warmed and vitalized. Your general health should be your main concern, for on that the health of your hair depends. I hope you read what I had to say to club members in some of my answers last month.

O. B.—If your face and hands are dry, and you have blackheads, your body is not functioning properly. Probably you are drinking altogether too little water, not eating the right kinds of foods, and not seeing that your bowels move freely daily. Cut out hot breads, pies, sweets. Take an entire bath every night and rub the skin thoroughly with a coarse bath towel. Sponge off the skin each morning with cool water. Before using powder, rub a little cold cream into the skin. Scrub all this off at night with warm, soapy water and a complexion brush, and many rinsings of warm water, with finally a cool rinsing and then a cold rinsing. You won't have blackheads if you take these precautions.

S. P.—You may use the ordinary household ammonia, instead of the toilet ammonia—there is scarcely any difference.

Miss E. M. C.—The pimples which come under your eyes and on chin and only stay a week are probably due to your age, and a little later they will not trouble you in this way. However, if you will be careful to see that your bowels move freely every day, you can help this condition very much, even now. Drinking quantities of water and eating fresh fruit at least twice a day helps to keep the bowels free and to clarify the complexion and make it white and clear. The pimples would not leave scars, I am sure, unless you pick them. Do you? You should not do that, as little scars will surely result. Touch them with alcohol or boric acid, but otherwise let them alone. Pulling out the thick black eyebrows over the nose with a pair of tweezers is probably the best way of treating them. They are too near the eyes to make it safe to use a depilatory. They will come back, but you can pull them out whenever they do. If your freckles are the summer freckles, they will probably yield to the application of the following lotion:

Freckle Remover

Horseradish root, ground, one ounce; boiling water, one pint; borax, two drams.

Apply just to the freckles and not to rest of skin, and be very careful not to get it too near the eyes.

The Sheltering Hand

By Arthur W. Peach

Copyright, 1917, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

RACHEL turned gray, beautiful and scornful eyes upon him. "If I were you and had your money——"

"You may have it, if you will say one word—'Yes.' Of course, you will have to take me in the bargain——"

She rose in the quick graceful way that was in keeping with her athletic little body. "Merton, I shall send you home, if you joke about such things!"

He interposed his big frame between her and the door toward which she was about to escort him. "I am serious, dear——"

"Don't call me 'dear' until I give you permission!"

"Well, then, I am in dead earnestness, Rachel. I think this scheme of yours in going down into the slums to do settlement work is all foolishness. Wait just a moment, please. The Lord made you to make me happy—not some dirty little urchin who will misunderstand your desire to help him——"

"That's enough. I have made up my mind; Auntie is willing. I'm going to go down tomorrow and join the staff of the Morse House. You are big and lazy and the good you do in the world won't make the world much better. I think you better——"

The fun had gone from his blue, merry eyes. "I think, myself, that settlement work is a noble calling; but to do it you ought to have a long and special training. Besides you weren't made for such work. The Lord called a certain type to be His disciples, remember. There's sin and sorrow and privation—and other things there which I wish you wouldn't see."

"May I ask how much you, with your cars, your leisure, your clubs, your hunting know about the sin, privation, and other things there."

His lips parted as if he were about to speak; then they sat rigidly. "Good by."

He started to leave the room, but with a swift stride, after watching his face, she caught his hand. Her voice was gentle. "Really, though, Merton, you make a splendid friend."

He glanced down at her, and she knew the struggle that was going on within him to keep him from seizing her in his arms; but she knew he would not do it without her permission; so she felt safe.

"Little girl, I spoke the way I have because I love you—you know that. Much that you have said to me is true; I am big and lazy, and have money—yet—well, good by."

She watched him go with a little regret, but the regret soon passed, for she was happy in her preparations to take up the work of a good Samaritan.

She reported at the Morse House the next morning, going down in her aunt's car. The grave weary face of the Superintendent lightened as she appeared, then shadowed. Very carefully the Superintendent explained to her the work; and Rachel found that she was expected to stay at the house and teach one of the children's classes. She immediately in her quick way rebelled; and the end of it was that she had her way. After a little training she was to go out.

The Superintendent was so reluctant about giving permission that Rachel was afraid for a moment. She recalled Merton's unnecessary brutal words—so she thought—to the effect that they would let her do what she wanted to in the end, for her gifts of money to the House were part of the support that kept it alive.

But she went—down into the region which of all places under heaven should not be called Eden and yet was. Saloons on every corner, shadowy alleys, dirt, dust and destitution; and she came and went unmolested. She saw sin and privation and "other things" and she lay awake many a night over her memories; and more than once she was willing to give up. At the House the Superintendent's face always lighted with relief when she appeared, and she found it a constant trouble to avoid being given an escort or sent on some light errand of no danger.

On the last day of the week, she overheard the Superintendent discussing a case which was pitiful; and nothing would do but that she was to go to succor it. Her money made possible that succor; and she went.

The place she sought was in the worst section where she had never been; where the rotting buildings were piled upon each other, sheltering lives that were black.

For the first time she was frightened as she stepped into the dark entry of the building, and that is the reason why, perhaps, a man with a face that bore the deeply bitten marks of a life of dissipation accosted her.

"My, what a pretty one!" he said softly, his eyes greedy.

She started up the stairs—to find herself gathered in strong arms—held by a man's arms in a clasp she had never known. Stricken and frightened, she struggled and started to scream. A hand closed her mouth, and she was borne swiftly inward. The terror in her soul made her faint, and half-fainting she dimly saw herself brought into a room where three men were sitting. She heard the voice of her captor:

"See what we have here!"

She saw, in that instant, one of the men start up with an oath, and beating upon her consciousness word by word came his words. His manner was savage.

Faintly she heard—"Put her down—know what you're doin'—want the Boss—to skin you?—She's Hale's girl—and the Boss sent word—if a man touched her—he'd get his—Put her down—quick!"

She was put down, and a glass of cold water held to her lips. Her brain cleared. She sat up trembling, but confident from the attitude of the men about her that she need fear nothing. They all seemed frightened, the man who had seized her especially so. She was puzzled.

The younger man of the three who had first spoken, looked at her with anxious eyes. "Are you feeling all right?"

She nodded, half in tears. "I'd like to go, please."

He turned to the man with the scarred face. "Jack, go up to Eber's and get his car. I'll take her."

It seemed only a few moments before word came that the car was ready. She was almost weeping in spite of the efforts of the young fellow to comfort her; she still felt the rude grasp of those arms about her and in her mind was the threat of what that grasp meant.

She barely heard the pleading tones of her abductor begging her to say nothing. She promised—to get rid of him. Through her mind one question was beginning to take form: What power was it that had saved her? the Boss? Could it be O'Hanan—the boss of the Ward—a man she had never seen?

Once more in the open air, she steadied herself, and she asked questions. The young fellow with her refused to answer at first; then he turned to her with a brief, curt statement.

"You're in the wrong place, Miss. You don't belong down here. You're too pretty. I don't know anything 'cept the Boss sent word everywhere that if you was hurt somebody'd get his, an' nobody wanted to get what the Boss meant, see? Jake's just come on from Chicago, see? He didn't know. The rest of us are wise—all 'round here. You've been looked out fer." He glanced around furtively. "I guess I'll let you out here; then I'll hustle to the Boss an' explain things."

She went up the street, into the house, and into her room; and there she surrendered completely. Finally she managed to say she would like to see Merton.

She was nearly herself when he came, for he had been in the country hunting, and had been stopped twice for over-speeding on his way back to her.

His face was gray with anxiety as he stepped in at her bidding. He knelt on one knee by the chair in which she was sitting and took one of her hands in his. The old mischief came to the surface—proof that she was herself if anything could be. She let him hold the hand, but she propounded a question:

"Will you tell me the reason why it seems that 'Hale's girl' has been safe everywhere in Eden?"

He glanced away for a moment. "I am sorry I didn't tell you, that other day. I don't wish to tell you now, but every year I give O'Hanan money to use in helping those who need help down there in Eden. O'Hanan is a rank politician, but he knows and loves his people. I suppose he feels grateful to me. Anyway, I told him I wanted him to protect you—that I loved you—and that if a hair of your head was harmed—Well, I told him a lot; and he sat there smiling. Then he told me that he understood; that his girl was in Ireland—had been for thirty years—in a Kilkenny cemetery—and he'd see to it that you were safe."

He turned his face, and she saw the lines that anxiety for her had engraved there in the few hours; she saw the signs too of some hidden pain; she took his hand and drew his arm around her shoulder; then she leaned toward him ever so slightly, and whispered in his ear with a whisper that was tremulous:

"Now, if you wish, you may call me 'Dear'!"

Lift Corns out with Fingers

A few drops of Freezone loosen corns or calluses so they peel off

Apply a few drops of Freezone upon a tender, aching corn or a callus. The soreness stops and shortly the entire corn or callus loosens and can be lifted off without a twinge of pain.

Freezone removes hard corns, soft corns, also corns between the toes and hardened calluses. Freezone does not irritate the surrounding skin. You feel no pain when applying it or afterward.

Women! Keep a tiny bottle of Freezone on your dresser and never let a corn ache twice.

Small bottles can be had at any drug store in the United States or Canada.

CHAPTER XXVII.

MRS. GODDARD BECOMES AN EAVESDROPPER.

WHEN, after her interview with Edith, Mrs. Goddard went out to make her call, leaving her brother to keep watch and ward over their fair captive, she proceeded with all possible speed to the Copley Square Hotel, where she inquired for Mrs. Stewart.

The elevator bore her to the second floor, and the pretty maid, who answered her ring at the door of the elegant suite to which she had been directed, told her that her mistress was engaged just at present, but, if madam would walk into the reception-room and wait a while, she had no doubt that Mrs. Stewart would soon be at liberty. "Would madam be kind enough to give her a card to take in?"

Mrs. Goddard pretended to look for her card-case, first in one pocket of her wrap, then in another.

"Ah!" she exclaimed, "I must have left my cards at home! How unfortunate! But it does not matter," she added, with one of her brilliant smiles; "I am an old acquaintance, and you can simply announce me when I am admitted."

The girl bowed and went away, leaving the visitor by herself in the pretty reception-room, for she had been told not to disturb her mistress until she should ring for her.

Presently the sound of muffled voices in a room beyond attracted Mrs. Goddard's attention.

She started and bent her ear to listen.

She could catch no word that was spoken, although she could distinguish now a man's and then a woman's tones.

With stealthy movements she glided into the next room, which was even more luxuriously furnished than the one she had left, when she observed that the portieres, draping an arch leading into still another apartment, were closely drawn.

And now, although she could not hear what was being said, she suddenly recognized, with a pang of agony that made her gasp for breath, the voice of her husband in earnest conversation with the woman who had been her guest two nights previous.

As noiselessly as a cat creeps after her prey, Anna Goddard stole across that spacious apartment and concealed herself among the voluminous folds of the draperies, where she found that she could easily hear all that was said.

"You are very hard, Isabel," she heard Gerald Goddard remark, in a reproachful voice.

"I grant you that," responded the liquid tones of his companion, "as far as you and—that woman are concerned, I have no more feeling than a stone."

At those words, "That woman," spoken in accents of supreme contempt, the eyes of Anna Goddard began to blaze with a baneful gleam.

"And you will never forgive me for the wrong I did you so long ago?" pleaded the man, with a sigh.

"What do you mean by that word 'forgive'?" coldly inquired Mrs. Stewart.

"Pardon, remission—as Shakespeare has it, 'forgive and quite forget old faults,'" returned Gerald Goddard.

"Forget!" repeated the beautiful woman.

"Ah, if you could," eagerly cried her visitor; then, as if he could control himself no longer, he went on, with passionate vehemence: "Oh, Isabel! when you burst upon me, so like a radiant star, the other night, and I realized that you were still in the flesh, instead of lying in that lonely grave in far-off Italy—when I saw you so grandly beautiful—saw how wonderfully you had developed in every way, all the old love came back to me, and I realized my foolish mistake of that by-gone time as I had never realized it before."

"It strikes me, Mr. Goddard, that it is rather late—after twen y years—to make such an acknowledgment to me," Isabel Stewart retorted, with quiet irony.

"I know it—I feel it now," he responded, in accents of despair. "I know that I forfeited both your love and respect when I began to yield to the charms and flatteries of Anna Correlli. She was handsome, as you know; she began to be fond of me from the moment of our introduction; and when, in an unguarded moment, I revealed the—the fact that you were not my wife, she resolved that she would supplant you——"

"Yes, 'the woman—she gavest me and I did eat,'" interposed his companion, with a scathing ring of scorn in the words. "That is always the cry of cowards like you, when they find themselves worsted by their own folly," she went on, indignantly. "Woman must always bear the scorpion lash of blame from her betrayer while the world also awards her only shame and ostracism from society, if she yields to the persuasive voice of her charmer, admiring and believing in him and allowing him to go unsmirched by the venomous breath of scandal. It is only his victim—his innocent victim oftentimes, as in my case—who suffers; he is greeted everywhere with open arms and flattering smiles, even though he repeats his offenses again and again."

"Isabel! spare me!"

"No, I will not spare you," she continued, sternly. "You know, Gerald Goddard, that I was a pure and innocent girl when you tempted me to leave my father's house and flee with you to Italy. You were older than I, by eight years; you had seen much of the world, and you knew your power. You cunningly planned that secret marriage, which you intended from the first should be only a farce, but which, I have learned since, was in every respect a legal ceremony——"

"Ha! I thought so!" cried her companion, with a sudden shock. "When did you hear?—who told you?"

"I met your friend, Will Forsyth, only two years ago—just before my return to this country—and when I took him to task for the shameful part which he had played to assist you in carrying out your ignominious plot, telling him that you had owned to his being disguised as an aged minister to perform the sacrilegious ceremony, he confessed to me that, at the last moment, his heart had failed him, whereupon he went to an old clergyman, a friend of his father, revealed everything and persuaded him to perform the marriage in a legal manner; and thus, Gerald Goddard, I became your lawful wife instead of your victim, as you supposed."

"Yes, I know it. Forsyth afterward sent me the certificate and explained everything to me," the man admitted, with a guilty flush. "I received the paper about a year after the report of your death."

"Ah! that could not have been very gratifying to—your other—victim," remarked Mrs. Stewart.

"Isabel! you are merciless!" cried the man. "But since you have learned so much, I may as well tell you everything. Of course Anna was furious when she discovered that she was no wife, for I had sworn to her that there was no legal tie between you and me——"

"Ah! then she also learned the truth!" interposed his companion. "I almost wonder you did not try to keep the knowledge from her."

"I could not—she was present when the document arrived, and the shock to me was so great I betrayed it, and she insisted upon knowing what had caused it, when she raved like an insane person, for a time."

"But I suppose you pacified her by being married over again, since you have lived with her for nearly twenty years," remarked Mrs. Stewart.

"No, I did not," returned her visitor, hotly. "To tell the truth, I had begun to tire of her even then—she was so furiously jealous, passionate, and unreasonable upon the slightest pretext that at times she made life wretched for me. So I told myself that so long as I held that certificate as proof that she had no legal hold upon me, I should have it in my power to manage her and cow her into submission when she became ungovernable by other means. I represented to her that, to all intents and purposes, we were man and wife, and if we should have the ceremony repeated after having lived together so long, it would create a scandal, for some one would be sure to find it out, sooner or later. For a time this appeared to pacify her; but one day, during my absence from home, she stole the certificate, although I thought I had concealed it where no one would think of looking for it. It has been in her possession ever since. I have tried many times to recover it; but she was more clever than I, and I never could find it, while she has always told me that she would never relinquish it, except upon one condition——"

"And that was—what?"

"Ever the same old demand—that I would make her legally my wife."

"But she never could have been that so long as I lived."

"True; but she would have been satisfied with a repetition of the ceremony, as we did not know that you were living."

"If you have been so unhappy, why have you lived with her all these years?"

"There have been several reasons. In spite of her variable moods and many faults, Anna is a handsome and accomplished woman. She entertains magnificently, and has made an elegant mistress for our establishment. We have been over the world together several times, and are known in many cities both in this country and abroad, consequently it would have occasioned no end of scandal if there had been a separation. Thus, though she has tried my patience sorely at times, we have perhaps, on the whole, got along as amicably as hundreds of other couples. —Besides—ahem!——"

The man abruptly ceased, as if, unwittingly, he had been about to say something that had better be left unsaid.

"Well—besides what?" queried his listener.

"Doubeless you will think it rather a humiliating confession to make," said Gerald Goddard, "but during the last few years I have lost a great deal of money in unfortunate speculation, so—I have been somewhat dependent upon Anna in a financial way."

"Ah! I understand," remarked Mrs. Stewart. "Are you not engaged with your profession?"

"No; Anna has not been willing, for a long time, that I should paint for money."

"And so your talents are deteriorating for want of use."

The scorn in her tones stung him keenly, and he flushed to his temples.

"You do not appear to have lacked for the luxuries of life," he retorted, glancing about the elegant apartment with a sullen air, but ignoring her thrust.

"No, I have an abundance," she quietly replied.

"Will you explain to me the mystery of your existence, Isabel?" Mr. Goddard inquired, after an awkward silence. "I cannot understand it—I am sometimes tempted to believe that you are not Isabel after all, but some one else who——"

"Pray disabuse yourself of all such doubts," she quickly interposed, "for I assure you that I am none other than that confiding but misguided girl whom you sought to lure to her destruction twenty years ago. If it were necessary, I could give you every detail of our life from the time I left my home until that fatal day when you deserted me for Anna Correlli."

"But Anna claims that she saw you dead in your casket."

A slight shiver shook the beautiful woman from head to foot at this reference to the ghastly subject.

"Yes, I know it——"

"You know it!" exclaimed the man, amazed.

"Exactly; but I will tell you the whole story and then you will no longer have any doubt regarding my identity," Mrs. Stewart remarked. "After you left Rome with Anna Correlli, and I realized that I had been abandoned, and my child left to the tender mercies of a world that would not hesitate to brand her with a terrible stigma, for which her father alone was to blame, I resolved that I would not live. Grief, shame, and despair for the time rendered me insane, else I, who had been religiously reared, with a feeling of horror for the suicide's end, would never have dared to meditate taking the life that belonged to God. I was not so bereft of sense, however, but that my motherhood inspired me to make an effort to provide for my little one, and I wrote an earnest appeal to my old schoolmate and friend, Edith Allandale, who, I knew, would shortly be in Rome, asking her to take the child and rear her as her own——"

"What! Then you did not try to drown the child as well as yourself!" gasped Gerald Goddard:

"No; had I done so, I should never have lived to tell you this story," said the woman, tremulously. "But wait—you shall learn everything, as far as I know, just as it happened. Having written my appeal, which I felt sure would be heeded, I took my baby to the woman who had nursed me, told her that I had been suddenly called away, and asked her to care for her until my return. She readily promised, not once suspecting that a stranger would come for her in my place, and that it was my purpose never to see her again. From the moment of my leaving the woman's house—that last straw of surrendering my baby was more than my heart and brain could bear—everything, with one exception, was a blank to me until I awoke to consciousness, five weeks later, to find myself being tenderly cared for in the home of a young man, who was spending the winter in Rome for his health. His sister—a lovely girl, a few years his senior—was with him, acting both as his nurse and physician, she having taken her degree in a Philadelphia medical college, just out of love for the profession. And she it was who had cared for me during my long illness. She told me that her brother was in the habit of spending a great deal of his time upon the Tiber; that one evening, just at dusk, as he was upon the point of passing under a bridge, a little way out of the city, he was startled to see some one leap from it into the water and immediately sink. He shot his boat to the spot, and when the figure arose to the surface, he was ready to grasp it. It was no easy matter to lift it into his boat, but he succeeded at last, when he rowed with all possible speed back to the city, where, instead of notifying the police and giving me into their hands to be taken either to a hospital or to the morgue, as the case might demand, he procured a carriage and took me directly to his home, where he felt that his sister could do more for me any one else."

"Who was this young man?" Gerald Goddard here interposed.

"Willard Livermore," calmly replied Mrs. Stewart, as she steadily met his glance, although the color in her cheeks deepened visibly.

"Ha! the man who accompanied you to Wyoming night before last?"

"Yes."

"I have heard that he has long wanted to marry you—that he is your lover," said Mr. Goddard.

"He is my friend, stanch and true; a man whom I honor above all men," was the composed reply.

"Then why have you not married him?"

"Because I was already bound."

"But you have told me that you did not know you were legally bound until within the last two years."

Isabel Stewart lifted a grave glance to her companion's face.

"When, as a girl, I left my home to go with you to Italy," she said, solemnly, "I took upon myself vows which only death could cancel—they were as binding upon me as if you had always been true to me; and so, while you lived, I could never become the wife of another. I have lived my life as a pure and faithful wife should live. Although my youth was marred by an irrevocable mistake, which resulted in an act of frenzy for which I was not accountable, no willful wrong has ever cast a blight upon my character since the day that Willard Livermore rescued me from a watery grave in the depths of the yellow Tiber."

And Gerald Goddard, looking into the beautiful and noble face before him, knew that she spoke only the truth.

"All efforts upon the part of Miss Livermore and her brother to resuscitate me," Mrs. Stewart resumed, "were unavailing. Another physician was called to their assistance; but he at once pronounced life to be extinct, and their efforts were reluctantly abandoned. Even then that noble brother and sister would not allow me to be sent to the morgue. They advertised in all the papers, giving a careful description of me, and begging my friends—if there was such in Rome—to come to claim me. Among the many curious gazers who—attracted by the air of mystery which enveloped me—came to look upon me, only one person seemed to betray the slightest evidence of ever having seen me before. That person was Anna Correlli—— Ah! what was that?"

This sudden break and startled query was caused by the rattling of the rings which held the portieres upon the pole across the archway between the two rooms, and by the gentle swaying of the draperies to and fro.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

ISABEL STEWART ASTOUNDS MR. GODDARD.

Mrs. Stewart arose to investigate. She parted the draperies and looked curiously into the room beyond.

But her act only revealed a pretty maltese kitten, which, being thus aroused from its slumbers in its cozy place of concealment, rolled over on its back and began to play with the heavy fringe that bordered the costly hangings.

"Ah, Greylocks! so you are the rogue who has startled us!" said the lady, with an amused smile. "I feared that we had an eavesdropper. You are a very innocent one, however, and we will not take the trouble to banish you."

She went back to her chair reassured, and without a suspicion of the presence of one who hated her with a deadly hatred, and who still stood, pale and trembling, concealed by the voluminous folds of the draperies, but waiting with eager curiosity to overhear what should follow.

Meantime the maid who had admitted Mrs. Goddard, feeling that she must become wearied with her long waiting, had returned to the reception-room to ascertain if she still desired to remain until her mistress should be at liberty; but finding it empty, had concluded that the lady had left the house, and so went about her business, thinking no more of the matter.

"Yes," resumed Mrs. Stewart, after she had resumed her seat, "I knew, from the description which my kind friends afterward gave me, that Anna Correlli had come there to assure herself that her rival was really dead. When—suspecting from her manner that she might know something about me—they questioned her, she told them that, 'from what she had read in the papers, she feared it might be some one whom she knew; but she was mistaken—I was nothing to her—she had never seen me before.' Then she went away with an air of utter indifference, and I was left fortunately to the kindness of that noble-hearted brother and sister. They did everything that the fondest relatives could have done, and, in their divine pity for one so friendless and unfortunate, neglected not the smallest detail which they would have bestowed upon an own sister. Only they, besides the undertaker and the one Protestant pastor in the city, were present during the reading of the service; and when that was over, Willard Livermore, actuated by some unaccountable impulse, insisted upon closing the casket. He bent over me to remove a Roman lily which his sister had placed in my hands, and which he wished to preserve, and, while doing so, observed that my fingers were no longer rigid—that the nails were even faintly tinted. He was startled, and instantly summoned his sister. Hardly had her own fingers pressed my pulse in search of evidence of life, when my eyes unclosed and I moaned:

"'Don't let her come near me! She has stolen all the love out of my life!'

"Then I immediately relapsed again into unconsciousness without even knowing I had spoken. Later when told of the fact, I could dimly recall the sensation of a sudden shock which was instantly followed by a vision of Anna Corelli's face and the sound of her voice, and I firmly believe, today, that it was her presence alone that startled my chilled pulses once more into action and thus awoke to new life the torpid soul which had so nearly passed out into the great unknown.

"Of course," Mrs. Stewart continued, "Mr. and Miss Livermore were both thrown into a state of great excitement at such an unexpected manifestation; but my words told them that there was some sad and mysterious story connected with my life and the rash deed I had committed, and they resolved to still surround me with their care and protection until I should recover—if that were possible—instead of committing me to a hospital, as many would have done.

"They bound both the clergyman and the undertaker to the strictest secrecy; then I was immediately conveyed to Miss Livermore's own room, where that noble girl cared for me as tenderly as a mother would nurse her own child. For weeks I hovered between life and death, then slowly began to mend. When I was able, I related to my kind friends the story of my wrongs, to receive only gentle sympathy and encouragement, instead of coldness and censure, such as the world usually metes out to girls who err as I had erred. As I grew stronger, and realized that I was to live, my mother-heart began to long for its child. Miss Livermore agreed with me that it would be better for me to have her, and went herself to make inquiries regarding her. But the nurse had moved and none of her neighbors could give any information about her, except that for a time she had charge of an infant, but after its parents had come to claim it, she had moved away, and no one could tell whither she had gone.

"From this I knew that my old friend, Edith Allandale, had responded nobly to my appeal—that she had taken my child and adopted it as her own. At first I was inclined to be disappointed, and contemplated writing to Edith, telling her what had happened and ask her to surrender the little one to me; but after thinking the matter over more at length, I reasoned that it would be best to let everything rest just as it was. I knew that my darling would be tenderly reared in her new home; she would grow up to a happy womanhood without ever knowing of the blight that rested upon her birth, or that her father had been a villain, her mother a wronged and ruined woman—almost a suicide. So I decided that I would never reveal myself to my old friend, or undeceive her regarding my supposed fate, to disturb her peace or her enjoyment of the child.

"But, following the advice of my new friends, I finally wrote to my father and mother, confessing everything to them, imploring their forgiveness for the grief and shame I had brought upon them, and asking their counsel and wishes regarding my future. Imagine my joys and gratitude when, three weeks later, they walked in upon me and took me at once to their hearts, ignoring all the past, as far as any censure or condemnation were concerned, and began to plan to make my future as peaceful and happy as circumstances would allow.

"They had come abroad with the intention of remaining, they told me; they would never ask me to return to my former home, where the fact that I had eloped with an artist was known, but would settle in London, where my father had some business interests, and where, surrounded by the multitude, our former friends would never be likely to meet us. We lived there, a quiet, peaceful, prosperous life, I devoting myself assiduously to study to make up for what I had sacrificed by leaving school so early, and to keep my mind from dwelling upon my unhappy past.

"So the time slipped away until, five years ago, this tranquil life was suddenly interrupted by my father's death. Six months later my mother followed him, and I was again left alone, without a relative in the world, the sole heiress to a half-million pounds——"

"A half-million pounds?" interposed Gerald Goddard.

"Yes; but of what value is money without some one to share it with you?" questioned Isabel Stewart.

Her companion passed his hand across his brow, a dazed expression upon his face, while he was saying to himself, that, in his folly, he had missed an ideal existence with this brilliantly beautiful and accomplished woman, who, in addition, was now the possessor of two and a half million dollars.

"Occasionally I heard from my child," Mrs. Stewart resumed, after a moment of silence, while tears started into her beautiful eyes. "My father crossed the ocean from time to time, for the sole purpose of learning something of her, in order to satisfy my hungry heart. He never revealed the fact of my existence to any one, however, although he managed to learn that my darling was happy growing up to be a pure and lovely girl, as well as a great comfort to her adopted parents, and with nothing to mar her future prospects. Of course such tidings were always gleams of great comfort to my sad and quiet life, and I tried to be satisfied with them—tried to be grateful for them. But, oh! since the death of my parents, I have yearned for her with an inexpressible heart-hunger——"

A sob of pain burst from the beautiful woman's lips and interrupted her narrative at this point.

But she recovered herself almost immediately, and resumed:

"A year or two after I was left alone I happened to meet your former friend, Will Forsyth, and from him learned that I had always been your legal wife, and that he had sent you proofs of the fact, about a year after your desertion of me.

"This astonishing intelligence animated me with a new purpose, and I resolved that I would seek the world over for you, and demand that proof from you.

"I returned immediately to this country and established myself in New York, where, Mr. Forsyth told me, he thought you were residing. Soon after my arrival I learned, to my dismay, that Mr. Allandale had recently died, leaving his family in a destitute condition. This knowledge changed my plans somewhat; I gave up my quest for you, for the time, and began to search for my old friend who, for eighteen years, had been a mother to my child. I had no intention of interrupting the relations between them—my only thought was to provide for their future in a way to preclude the possibility of their ever knowing the meaning of the word poverty. But my utmost efforts proved unavailing—I could learn nothing of them; but I finally did get trace of you, and two months ago came on to Boston, determined to face you and compel you to surrender to me the certificate of our marriage."

"Ha! did you expect that I would yield to you?" questioned Gerald Goddard, a note of defiance in his voice.

"Certainly—I knew I could compel you to do so."

"Indeed? You were sanguine! By what arguments did you expect to achieve your desire? How could you even prove that I had such a paper?"

"I do not know that I could have proven that you possessed the certificate," quietly responded Mrs. Stewart; "but I could at least prove that such a paper once existed, for Mr. Forsyth assured me that, if I needed assistance to establish the fact of my marriage, he would be ready to give it at any time. I did not think I should need to call upon him, however; I reasoned that, rather than submit to an arrest and scandal, for—bigamy, you would quietly surrender the certificate to me."

Gerald Goddard shivered at the sound of those three ugly words, while the listener, behind the draperies, clinched her hands and locked her teeth to keep herself from shrieking aloud in her agony, and thus revealing her presence.

"I am afraid you will find that you have reckoned without your host, madam," the man at length retorted.

"Ah! how so?" quietly inquired his companion.

"No power on earth would ever have compelled me to relinquish it, Mr. Forsyth's assurance to the contrary notwithstanding."

The man paused, to see what effect this assertion would have upon his listener; but she made no response—she simply sat quietly regarding him, while a curious little smile hovered about her beautiful mouth.

"You look skeptical," Mr. Goddard continued, gazing at her searchingly; "but let me tell you that you will find it no easy matter to prove the statements you have made—no person of common sense would credit your story."

"Indeed! But have you not already admitted that you received the certificate of which Mr. Forsyth told me?"

"Yes; but we have been here alone, with no witness to swear to what has passed between us. However, as I have already told you, Anna stole the paper from me years ago, and I have never seen it since."

"Yes, I know you told me so!"

"Do you not believe me?"

"I think my past relations with you have not served to establish a feeling of excessive confidence in you," was the quietly ironical response.

The man flushed hotly, while anger for the moment rendered him speechless.

"Possibly you might be able to induce your companion to surrender the document," the lady added, after a minute of awkward silence.

"You have very little idea of Anna's spirit, if you imagine that she would ever yield one jot to you," Mr. Goddard at length retorted, his face crimson with rage.

Isabel Stewart arose from her chair and stood calm and cold before him.

"She will never be asked to yield to me, and I am spared the necessity of suing to either of you, for—that all-important certificate of marriage is already in my possession."

As we know, Gerald Goddard had feared this; he had even suggested the possibility to Anna, on the night of the ball at Wyoming, when she told him of the disappearance of the paper.

Nevertheless, the announcement of the fact at this time came upon him like a thunderbolt, for which he was utterly unprepared.

"Zounds!" he cried, starting to his feet, "can you mean it? Then you stole it the night of the ball!"

"You are greatly mistaken, Mr. Goddard; it was in my possession before the night of the ball," quietly returned his companion.

21st row.—Same as 19th row.

22nd row.—Same as 18th row.

24th row.—Same as 16th row.

25th row.—Same as 15th row. Continue in this way. After reaching the center of the square the pattern is simply repeated as shown in the illustration. In making a counterpane all of the squares can be worked alike, or every other square can be all spaces or all solid double crochet. Or a row of squares can be joined by strips, half the width, of solid crochet of an entirely different stitch. However, in either case, in finishing the spread, it is best to make a border of close work of some kind, as it will wear much better.

Also, if one prefers, treble crochet can be used throughout instead of the double, as this being a little longer stitch the work can be done somewhat quicker.

Knitting Bags

As every one is knitting nowadays, and much of the work is on big articles—sweaters etc. which bulk up pretty well as they near completion, big roomy bags are a real necessity.

Bright flowered cretonne is perhaps the most popular material, although goods of all sorts from khaki to silk can be used.

One of the newest bags called the Uncle Sam Knitting Bag is of khaki colored linen. The front and back pieces being cut in the shape of a shield which is outlined with narrow red, white and blue ribbon. A straight piece 20 inches wide and a yard and one half long is fulled and sewed around the sides and bottom of the shield.

Another bag, such as is here illustrated, can be very easily made and is handy and practical. As shown it is developed of cretonne lined with plain satteen. The bottom is a seven-inch circle of pasteboard covered.

Cut material a yard and a quarter by 16 inches, seam up and join to circle. Cover four or five-inch embroidery hoop with ribbon and to this attach a band one and one half inches wide by eight long, sewing the lower end of the strip across the seam of the band, near the bottom as shown.

This bag is roomy can be easily closed by gathering up the top and slipping through the ring, and conveniently carried by slipping on the arm.

Crocheted Four-in-Hand

(REQUESTED)

One spool motor silk, 1 No. 8, steel crochet hook.

1st row.—Make ch. 22 sts., turn, 21 s. c. on ch.

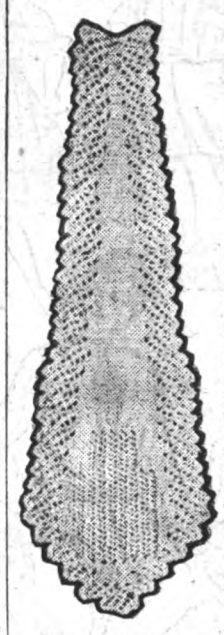
2nd row.—Ch. 1, 9 s. c; be sure to take up both loops of each st., draw loop through 10th st. of ch., take off both sts., make 1 puff by making long single through st. in previous row. Ch. 1, 1 s. c. in next st; draw loop through 12th st. of ch. make 1 puff, ch. 1, 9 s. c., ch. 1, turn.

3rd row.—9 s. c., 1 puff in 10th st., ch. 1, 1 s. c. in center s. c. 1 puff in 12th st., ch. 1, 9 s. c., ch. 1, turn.

4th row.—9 s. c., draw loop through puff in preceding row, ch. 1, 1 s. c., 1 puff, ch. 1, 9 s. c., ch. 1, turn.

Repeat until tie measures 14 or 15 inches. Decrease 1 st., each side by skipping 2nd st. every other row, (always be sure to take up first and last sts.)

Make 13 or 14 inches for band 9 s. c. wide.



Increase 1 st. each side every 2nd row by making 2 s. c. into first and last sts. on edge of first row from neck-band. Make 6 s. c., 1 puff, ch. 1, 1 s. c., 1 puff, ch. 1, 6 s. c., increase until you have 19 sts.

Then crochet 12 inches more. To finish last row leave long thread of silk, thread sewing needle and pass same through every st., thus making a cord-like finish similar to other end.

Hand Knit Petticoat for Five-Year-Old Child

Cast 10 stitches of split zephyr on a medium-sized steel knitting needle and knit across plain.

1st row.—K. 4, o. n., o. n., o., k. 2.
2nd row.—K. 7, o. n., o. n., o., k. 2.
3rd row.—K. 8, o. n., o. n., o., k. 2.
4th row.—Bind off 4 sts. to make the little scallop, k. 11, o. n., o. n., o., k. 2 and bind off 4 to make little scallop opposite.

ONE SECTION OF CHILD'S PETTICOAT.

5th row.—Continue, from this row, to knit back and forth, widening each row by the over before the last 2 sts., binding off, each side 3 sts., to make the scallops, as above.

When there are 25 scallops, k. 7, o. n., 4 times, k. 4, o. n., o. n., o., k. 2. Continue this way, back and forth, binding off 4 sts., each side, as before, for scallops. till 7 rows are knit. Then o. n., 5 times in the middle back and forth for 8 rows. Then o. n. 7 times, back and forth, in the middle. As before o. n., o. n., o. k. 2, and bind off 4, when knitting the o. n. rows in the middle. When as long as wanted, narrow off by knitting 2 less stitches each side, every other row and finish the bottom with a scallop.

Five of these sections make the front of the petticoat, by sewing the scallops, point to point, with needle and thread.

The back of the petticoat can be knit plain. Divide the sts., evenly on two needles and k. 1, p. one row for a finger's length. Then k. all the sts. on one needle, which makes and joins the placket. Finish the bottom with a lace edging or turn up and hem.

A Change Purse

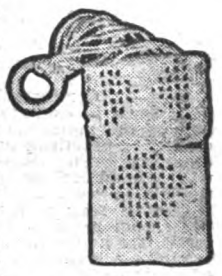
This convenient little purse is very pretty made up of ecru or greyish pearl cotton and of either of these shades will give a season's wear without becoming soiled or shabby in appearance.

It is made lengthwise and as shown measures 3 1-2 by 2 inches. The size may however be varied very easily and the open-work pattern remain the same, by simply adding to width or length of the work.

To make a purse this size make a chain 8 inches long, add 3 sts., turn, make 1 d. c. in fourth st. from hook, and 1 d. c. in every other st. of ch., ch. 3, turn.

2nd row.—1 d. c., ch. 2, sk. 2, 1 d. c., thus making 1 space, repeat, making 8 more sps., 1 d. c. in each st. for next 4 1-2 inches, 1 sp., 1 d. c. in each st. to end of row, ch. 3, turn.

3rd row.—1 d. c. on each d. c. to meet in 3 doubles of sp. in last row, then ch. 2, sk. 2 d. c. 1 d. c., 1 sp. over sp., ch. 2, sk. 2, 1 d. c., thus making 3 sps. over 1 sp., 1 d. c. in each st. to next sp., 3 d. c. over first sp., 7 sps., 5 d. c., ch. 3, turn.



4th row.—5 d. c., 3 d. c. over sp., 5 sps., 1 d. c. on each d. c., to next group of sps., then 5 sps. made over 3 sps. in same way as explained in last row, ch. 3, turn.

5th row.—Doubles, 7 sps. over 5 sps., doubles, 3 sps. over 5 sps., doubles to finish row, ch. 3. turn.

6th row.—Doubles, 1 sp. over 3 sps., doubles, 9 sps. over 7 sps., doubles to end row, ch. 3.

7th row.—Doubles, 11 sps., doubles to end of row, ch. 3, turn.

8th row.—Doubles, 1 sp. opposite last sp., doubles, 9 sps. over 11 sps., doubles, ch. 3, turn.

A CHANGE PURSE.

9th row.—Doubles, 7 sps. over 9 sps., doubles, 3 sps. over 1 sp., doubles to end row, ch. 3, turn.

10th row.—Doubles, 5 sps. over 3 sps. doubles, 5 sps. over 7 sps. doubles, ch. 3, turn.

11th row.—Doubles, 3 sps. over 5 sps., 7 sps. over 5 sps., doubles, ch. 3, turn.

12th row.—1 double, 9 sps. over 7 sps. doubles, 3 sps. over 1 sp. over 3 sps., doubles to end row, ch. 3, turn.

13th row.—All doubles.

Finish around edge of flap with ch. 5, 1 s. c., ch. 5, and repeat. Break thread. Join in opposite end of work in top of first row, ch. 6 inches, run chain through first of spaces and back through second row of flap, then join with s. c. in end of second row. Repeat, making chains of same length from end of each row running through flap, as explained, see illustration. Crochet over small ivory or brass ring and join these chains to it.

Fan and Picot Edging

The illustration shows a very dainty and attractive edging in crochet. It is not at all difficult and will make attractive trimming for summer frocks and undergarments. Use number 100 crochet cotton or number eighty linen thread. This edging made up in heavy crochet cotton will make a handsome and effective edging for scrim curtains or made in medium heavy crochet cotton in the popular sand, ecru or tan shades is appropriate for trimming linen suits etc.

To make the edging ch. 8, join in ring, ch. 3, 17 (d. c.) in the ring, ch. 3, 3 d. c. in first 3 sts.

FAN AND PICOT EDGING.

of d. c. in the ring taking off but two loops at each d. c., at the last d. c. take off all loops on the hook and this will form a point, ch. 5, and repeat until there are six points and five spaces, ch. 1 and turn; 3 (s. c.) in the last chain of 5, ch. 5 to form a picot, 3 s. c., ch. 5, form picot; repeat until there are 3 groups of singles and 2 picots in each loop when the fan will be finished. For the second fan ch. 8, catch in second picot from end of last row in first fan, ch. 3 and proceed as for first fan. By using carpet warp this pattern will make up beautifully for trimming ends of heavy crash runners or porch pillows, as of this material the edging will be about four inches wide.

A NARROW EDGING OF CORONATION BRAID AND CROCHET.

2nd row top.—Ch. 5, sl. 2, 1 d. c. in next, * ch. 2, sl. 2, 1 d. c. in next; repeat from * along.

1st row.—1 s. c. over bar, * ch. 12, 1 s. c. over knot, ch. 12, 1 s. c. over bar, ch. 10, sl. knot, 1 s. c. over bar; repeat from * along.

2nd row.—* 12 s. c. over ch. 12, 12 s. c. over next ch. 12, ch. 4, 1 s. c. over center of ch. 10, ch. 4, repeat from * to end of row; fasten off. Use braid and crochet cotton of any desired size. The edging may be used for many purposes but is especially attractive for trimming the edge of crash doilies cretonne or scrim curtains, etc.

Tatting Book Notice

In response to the demand and for the benefit of our readers who are interested in tatting, we have issued a 16-page booklet of special designs by COMFORT workers.

This Tatting Book illustrates very plainly just how the work is to be done, by showing the various positions of the worker's hands, which are accompanied by explicit directions for the different movements used in making the stitch.

It also contains a complete range of patterns from the simplest edgings and insertions to handsome designs worked with one and two threads, including patterns for doilies, centerpieces, scarfs, lingerie, waists, yokes, collars, infants' and boudoir caps, bags, etc.

We will send a copy of this book free for one new yearly subscription (not your own) at 25c., or for your own subscription or renewal and ten cents extra 35c in all. Address COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

Home Dressmaking Hints

Forecasts for Mid-Summer Fashions

By Geneva Gladding

LITTLE summer maidens are as much interested in the styles as "grown-ups" and are to be congratulated that their clothes may be made simple and practical. Dresses with front closing are ever popular and the low neck and short sleeves are comfortable in warm weather. Over blouse and jumper dresses may be worn with guimpes of crepe or lawn, and made of serge, gingham, linen, voile, pique and other wash fabrics.

Pattern Descriptions

ALL PATTERNS 10c. EACH
Unless Other Price Is Stated

2102—A Comfortable Dress for Mother's Girl. This style is easy to develop, and suitable for any of the materials now in vogue. The front closing is practical, and makes the garment easy to adjust. The sleeve may be in wrist length, with a band cuff, or finished in short length, with the cuff in "turnback" style.

Cut in four sizes; four, six, eight and 10 years. It requires three yards of 44-inch material, for a six-year size.

2139—A Practical and Comfortable First Set of short clothes. Lawn, cambric, batiste, dimity or crepe, silk or challie, cashmere or gabardine could be used for the dress, while cambric, crepe or lawn are desirable for dress and slip. Any desired trimming may be employed.

Cut in five sizes; one, two, three, four and five years. The dress will require two and one quarter yards of 36-inch material. The slip one and one half yard. The drawers one and one quarter yard for a four-year size.

1784—A Neat Blouse Dress for Mother's Girl. The entire dress may be of one material. The skirt is buttoned to the blouse at the belt. The sleeve may be in wrist or elbow length.

Cut in four sizes; six, eight, 10 and 12 years. It requires three and one quarter yards of 44-inch material for a 10-year size. Plaid gingham, in brown and blue tones, would be nice for this skirt, with white linen for the blouse, and collar and cuffs of the plaid.

It is cut in two sizes; medium and large. No. 1 will require one yard. No. 2 will require seven eighths yard. No. 3 will require seven eighths yard of 27-inch material for the medium size.

2106—A Smart "Pocket" Dress for the growing girl. In brown chambray with trimming of check or plaid material to correspond, or in linen, with embroidery on collar and other trimming pieces; this style will be very attractive. The pockets may be omitted.

Cut in four sizes; eight, 10, 12 and 14 years. It requires three and five eighths yards of 44-inch material for a 10-year size.

1795—A Practical and Easily Developed Outfit. This combination includes a simple one-piece dress, a comfortable underskirt or petticoat, and one-piece drawers. The dress is good for all wash fabrics. The underskirt is composed of a long-waisted body to which a straight skirt is gathered. The drawers are simple, with side seams only, thus insuring ease and comfort in wearing. Pattern includes all three garments.

Cut in five sizes; two, three, four, five and six years. It requires seven eighths yard for the drawers, one and one half yard for the underskirt, and two and one eighth yards for the dress, of 36-inch material, for a four-year size.

2142—A Simple Summer Gown. The skirt may be made without the ruffle heading. The style is nice for shantung, crepe, novelty silk, challie, batiste, voile, bordered and embroidered materials.

Cut in three sizes; 16, 18 and 20 years. It requires for an 18-year size six and three eighths yards of 36-inch material. The skirt measures about two and one quarter yards at the foot.

2128—A Stylish, Attractive Model. As here portrayed the skirt section is fitted with wide plaits and joined to a long waist, in moyer age style. The collar may be finished in straight or notched outline; the sleeve in wrist or elbow length.

Cut in three sizes; 16, 18 and 20 years. It requires five and one half yards of 44-inch material for an 18-year size.

2122—Ladies' One-piece dress. This popular design is easy to develop and suitable for any of the pretty summer fabrics. The sleeve is quaint in wrist length with the ruffled edge and new and smart in its bell shape.

Cut in six sizes; 34, 36, 38, 40, 42 and 44 inches bust measure. It requires eight yards of 36-inch material for a 36-inch size.

2140—A Popular Model. These dresses in "one-piece" effects are very attractive and comfortable. The sleeve may be finished without the cuff, in bell style. Pattern is good for all wash fabrics, silk, voile, embroidered and bordered goods.

Cut in six sizes; 34, 36, 38, 40, 42 and 44 inches bust measure. Size 36 requires seven yards of 36-inch material.

The skirt 2126 is cut in seven sizes; 22, 24, 26, 28, 30, 32 and 34 inches waist measure. It requires three yards of 44-inch material for a 24-inch size. Two separate patterns, ten cents for each pattern.

Cut in four sizes; two, four, six and eight years. It requires three yards of 36-inch material for a six-year size.

2134—Boys' Blouse and Trousers. This model is ideal for warm weather, with the low neck and short sleeves, and the trousers with straight lower edge. The blouse and trousers may be of the same material, or the blouse may be of linen or other wash fabric and the trousers of serge or cloth.

Cut in four sizes; four, six, eight and 10 years. Size eight will require three yards of 36-inch material.

9163—Infant's Set, consisting of a cap, sack, night gown and a dress. For the dress or flouncing, it will require one and three quarter yard of 36-inch material with one and one quarter yard of plain material for yoke and sleeves. Of nainsook or lawn 36 inches wide it will require two and one quarter yards. The gown will require two and one half yards of 24 or 27-inch material. The cap, one half yard of 18-inch material. The sack requires seven eighths yard of 27-inch material.

2119—A Becoming Popular Style for the growing girl. This dainty model may be made of lawn, batiste, challie, novelty silk, gingham or chambray. The guimpe is separated. The heading on the skirt may be omitted.

Cut in four sizes; six, eight, 10 and 12 years. Size 10 requires two and one eighth yards for the guimpe, and three and one half yards for the dress of 27-inch material.

2087—A Smart Coat for the little miss. This model is good for linen, pique, serge, gabardine, cheviot and broadcloth. The fronts are lapped at the closing.

Cut in four sizes; two, four, six and eight years. It requires two and seven eighths yards of 44-inch material for a four-year size.

Cut in four sizes; eight, 10, 12 and 14 years. Size 10 will require four and one quarter yards of 44-inch material.

Cut in seven sizes; 34, 36, 38, 40, 42, 44 and 46 inches bust measure. It requires six and one half yards of 36-inch material for a 36-inch size.

1841—Boys' Blouse, with yoke in square or pointed outline, and with two styles of collar. Madras, cambric, linen, linene, silk, soisette, and pique are good for this model.

Cut in five sizes; six, eight, 10, 12 and 14 years. It requires three and one eighth yards of 36-inch material for a 12-year size.

2101—A Most Attractive Style. Georgette crepe, linen, madras, voile, batiste, lawn, taffeta, shantung and wash silk, are fine for this style. The sleeve may be in wrist length, or short.

Cut in seven sizes; 34, 36, 38, 40, 42, 44 and 46 inches bust measure. It requires three yards of 36-inch material for a 36-inch size.

2100—Ladies' Combination garment of corset cover and drawers. Lawn, batiste, dimity, crossbar, muslin, crepe and silk, are all lovely for this style. The garments may be finished separately.

Cut in seven sizes; 34, 36, 38, 40, 42, 44 and 46 inches bust measure. It requires three and seven eighths yards of 36-inch material for a 36-inch size.

Are You Wearing A Liberty Ring?

Premium No. 7733

We Will Send You One For A Club Of Three!

EVERY American man, woman and child should wear one of the new Liberty rings. They are the emblem of freedom—of liberty—to preserve which our country is now engaged in the most terrible war the world has ever known. Liberty rings are made of sterling silver and real money—a United States dime or 10-cent piece. A special machine stamps or "raises" the liberty head so that it stands out sharply from the rest of the coin, thus giving a heavily embossed effect that is very handsome. The words "United States of America" and "Liberty" are plainly seen as is also the date of the coin. These patriotic Liberty rings are so popular that manufacturers are having the greatest difficulty in supplying the demand. We have just received a small supply—but don't know when we can get any more—so be sure to send for yours right now. They come in sizes from 4 to 8 inclusive. Be sure to give size wanted when ordering.

CLUB OFFER: For three one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 25 cents each we will send you a Liberty ring free by parcel post prepaid. Be sure to mention size wanted. Premium No. 7733. Address COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

Conducted by Cousin Marion

In order that each cousin may be answered in this column, no cousin must ask more than three questions in one Month.

OH, my dears, in spite of how much I love to advise you and scold you and try to help you in your perplexities, I would rather be doing something else this dogdaisy, humid August day. Doesn't August always seem to you like the month that should be given up to buggy riding and auto riding and boating in the moonlight, and lolling beside the ocean waves and reading or dozing in a lazy hammock? Doesn't all that sound deliciously cooling and restful this hot vacation month? I hope the most of you are getting some of these pleasures. None of that comfort for me this year. I can't rest any more than is necessary when I know I can help make the things the Red Cross needs for the comforts of the sick and wounded soldiers. I love to think of the comfort my efforts will bring. So, dearies, I must get to work and answer these questions at once and then get back to my patriotic work once more.

The first letter I open today is from L. G., Webb City, Ark., and it is one that perplexes me and makes me real mad—with the parents this time. She is engaged to a young man she has known from childhood and whom she has every intention of marrying as soon as he is of age. So far as I can see the only objection her parents have to the young man is the very silly excuse that his parents are Democrats while they are Republicans. Why will parents be so foolish? I always feel for parents when they are sad at losing their daughter, but it is something that is bound to happen and is what they should desire to happen. In this case, if, as I believe, the sole objection to the young man is his politics, I wouldn't blame the young people if they took matters into their own hands when arriving "of age" and marrying in spite of the objection. They wouldn't have much backbone if they didn't.

Sad Girl, Piedmont, Fla.—I hardly think your father will kill you, as he says he will, if you insist upon going with this young man you tell me is a drunkard and generally mean besides, yet you love him anyway, but it would really be happier for you, if he did, than for you to marry such a man and live a life of lingering misery. I think, judging from your letter, that if you devoted yourself wholly to the study of grammar and spelling, you would become so interested in your books that you would love them instead of the worthless drunkard. It is, at least, worth trying. Try it and see for yourself.

Betty, McMillan, Mich.—It is quite proper for a boy of seventeen to love a girl of fifteen, but it is a whole lot sillier than it is proper. You say you have loved "for years." You haven't. You only think you have; and you think so because your thinker hasn't been used enough to get it in good working order. In the same class are the seventeen-year-old boys who talk of love. My, My! !

Poppy Garden Girl, Madera, Cal.—No attractive girl on earth can exist where men are without their making love to her. She may try to "chum" with them, but chumming isn't enough for them and they love. Usually serious and sincere, too, and they can't help themselves. Nature is stronger than they are. There are attractive girls who have more head than heart and they are not seriously affected, generally, but by and by, the right one comes along and the wedding bells go ringing. Don't worry about natural conditions. Let the men make love to you and you jolly them along in friendly, not flirty, fashion till your turn comes. P. S. You write a very good letter, indeed, in a "hand-write" that might be improved and still remain individual.

Red Rose, Coldwater, Miss.—As you are engaged to the young man and he is attentive to another girl and is frank enough to tell you he doesn't know whether to choose you or her, it seems to me you might help him to make up his mind by breaking the engagement so short off that it would make him dizzy with the jar. What are you thinking about, anyhow?

Heart-broken, Wapakoneta, Ohio.—By all means hold fast to the divorced man who has lied to you about a number of things and, as you think, will lie more to his wife than his sweetheart. Marry him in due time because he is the kind a girl, of such poor judgment as you have, needs to teach her some sense. As you want him for a friend always, lie or no lie, don't hurt his feelings by sending him away. Marry him and raise a family of the same stripe.

Puzzled, Vidalia, Ga.—You may think you are as attractive as the other girl is, but apparently the young man who told you you would always be first with him, doesn't think as you do, or he would not have so utterly thrown you over for the other one. And why ask me what to do? Your own self-respect should tell you that!

Telephone Belle, Kaufman, Texas.—If your mother loves him as well as you do, you will be safe in marrying him, if he wants you. Men may have loved their mothers-in-law, my dear, but there is no record, that I know of, of one marrying his mother-in-law. I don't say no man ever did, but I never heard of it.

Brown Eyes, Union, Okla.—Between two stools one falls to the ground, says the old adage, and between your "Okla. boy" and your "Colo.boy" you'll be sitting on the cold, cold ground, next. If you can't make up your mind and haven't any heart in it, anyway, suppose you drop them both and make a new start.

Cousin, Essex, Vt.—Really, my dear, there isn't anything finer in all the history of men and women, than a girl of sixteen finding some man rather too old just then for sweethearting with a child, and both of them being lovely, congenial friends, say, for as much as ten years, and then, marrying beautifully and being friends till the end. There are such marriages and if you at sixteen know such a man cherish him as fine gold till the time you two shall be one.

Only Me, Placerville, Cal.—Your mother may be right in saying the thirty-six-year-old man she wants you to marry has more sense than the twenty-four-year-old one, you want to marry, but he hasn't very much sense, I should say, if he is willing to marry a girl who wants to marry another man. Don't marry to please anybody except yourself and the man you marry.

Blue Eyes, Clay, Ky.—You did absolutely right in not letting the young man kiss you "good night," if it has turned out that he has left you for that reason. His intentions and his love could not have been very deep, if he stopped calling on that account. At the same time, it is no reason for a coolness. If a man loves you, you can't blame him if he wants to kiss you, but he should honor you all the more if you refuse him until you are engaged. You have nothing to ask forgiveness for. If he wants to call, by all means let him. Don't chase after him.

A Girl, Winnsboro, S. C.—When your fiance kissed you under the impression that it was your friend you should have returned the kiss, explaining that it wasn't meant for you, and doing it in such a way that he would prefer your brand of kisses ever after. As your fiance, he is entitled to a few kisses and I can't understand why you don't want him to, but remember, some wise old philosopher said, "Nothing in excess." You might feel better if you were to talk it over frankly with him and then if you let him kiss you and he still shows symptoms of kissing your girl friend (and I'd get a new girl friend immediately) and you want to taste the very quintessence of revenge on both—let her have him! An engaged woman should not accept a present, except of the most, trifling value, from any young man other than her fiance, or brother, even at Christmas. I am astonished that a girl of your "old-fashioned" ideas of propriety did not resent that "brotherly" friend's proposal to give you a pair of pink silk "Teddies." You should have treated it as a gross insult.

B. H. M., Corinth, Miss.—If you look upon marriage with either of your suitors as a leap in the dark you are not yet sufficiently in love with either one to be married yet. When you are really in love you feel you are doing the right thing in whatever you do I would not advise marrying the one simply because your mother desires it, any more than I would advise you to marry the other one because your mother hates him.

Curls and Dimples, Dublin, Texas.—The idea of two girls of fifteen asking me how to catch a beau. I don't know and if I did I would not tell you. You are too young to be thinking of a beau. Attend school the next four years and put your minds on fitting yourselves for your life work.

W. S. H., Balmy Beach, S. C.—You have possibly been the victim of a sharper. How many times have I cautioned you girls as to the impropriety of permitting a young man to wear your ring! It will teach you not to be so trustful of strange young men. If you had not lost the ring you might have been humiliated by the way he displayed it and talked. You did right, of course, in not letting him kiss you without being engaged.

Brown Eyes, Waynesburg, Ky.—Consider yourself fortunate in losing the young man who was to marry you but loves someone else better—and still loves you. My sympathy is for the woman who gets him for a husband.

Reader, Basile, La.—Is there any reason why that young man must write to you when you live in the same town? Why can't he call at your home?

Brown Eyes, Corvallis, Oregon and also R. A. C. J., Roanoke, Va.—I don't think it would be a good plan to suggest starting a correspondence with a young man. Such a request should emanate from the man, and should be acted on by the girl with caution.

Brown Eyes, Middle Georgia.—If your fiance really loves you, the war ought not to prevent your marriage. Perhaps he thinks you are rather young. He can serve his country even though married if he is called. I do not advise against kissing where the parties are engaged to each other.

Rose, Wesson, Miss.—I won't give any assistance in an attempt to keep two young people apart. That is asking too much of me. You are too young to be engaged in such an idea. Perhaps your absence at school will help you to solve your problems.

"B" Louisville, Ky.—It shouldn't be very hard to break off the engagement. It will be easier than marrying a man so much older, and who falls in love with every pretty face. If you marry him your troubles are likely to be greater than that of breaking it off now.

There, don't you think I have done pretty well, considering the heat and the desire to be out playing and the thought of my Red Cross work ahead of me? By,-by till next month, dears, house always. After washing your face, rinse it well in cold water that has just a little salt added to it. Don't put on any powder; how can your skin breathe with all its pores clogged with powder. My cheeks are always red enough and anyone with pale cheeks can have the envied rosy cheeks easily if they take the bracing air of the out of doors. A slap on each cheek will often bring the blood to the surface of the skin, but look first to your health. Don't let it get undermined.

COUSIN MARION.

I have two children, a girl five years and a boy three and a half years old. I have been married nearly seven years.

Love and good luck to all,
Cordially your sister, MRS. HARRY BENJAMIN.

OHIO.

DEAR SISTERS:

Here comes a new writer from the Buckeye state.

Lonely One, I think you almost deserve to be lonely, but it must be awful to feel as you do. I do not think you are doing your duty for if you are able to have a child I think you should, or if not, I think you should adopt one. It is not all smiles and sunshine to raise a family but I think it is the best and happiest way. I have a little boy three years old and a little girl one year and they are the sunshine of our home. You say you think you would be insane. Have any of the sisters ever gone insane while waiting for the necessary time to elapse, or have you ever heard of any cases like that? I never have heard of any and I don't think you would, Lonely One. It puzzles me when I read some of the sisters' letters and they say just how many children they have decided to have, but then, we have some very smart people in this world today. Some people think a large family is a disgrace, but I don't. In some cases I think it is the mother's own fault if she gets all worn out and tired. She should take better care of herself.

Country Jake, you have expressed my feelings toward Georgie. She must think us farmer folks filthy, but just invite some city folks out to your country home for a meal and see if they hesitate a minute.

I think it a good plan on Saturdays when you are baking white cakes to use the yolks for mayonnaise and then Saturday or Sunday cook potatoes for salad and fix your salad; that will save you from building a hot fire, especially in hot weather, and then if you have baked things and fruit, you have a good meal and with but little work.

I have taken COMFORT only since 1915 but would not have missed it had I known of it earlier.

Happy Farmer's Wife.

I have a beautiful poem which I wish to pass on to others. I do not know who wrote it.

MATTIE M. BOWMAN, Baker, Idaho.

Why

Why do we oft withhold the loving tribute
From those who strive to help us day by day,
With tender, loving, patient service,
And praise the absent who are far away?

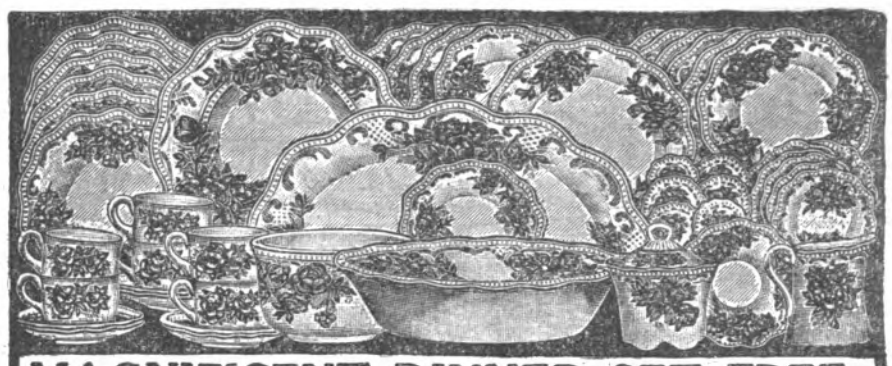
Why do we save our rarest, sweetest blossoms,
To place upon the graves of loved ones gone?
Knowing that all around us lives grow weary
Of planting roses but to gather thorns.

Why do we think while swift hours past are rushing,
"I have no time to tell my love today,"
When we know hourly some fond heart is longing
For just the words our own would like to say?

Why do we smother tender, sweet expressions,
That almost reach our lips, love's offerings;
When we know, within our sight is living,
A soul that longs for just these blessed things.

Oh, let us praise and clasp the hands outreaching,
And press the hearts that would beat 'gainst our own;
Life is so short—its sweetest blossoms fading
Soon they may leave us, then we weep alone.

OKLAHOMA.



DEAR SISTERS:

I fear my "mite" will be of small interest to anyone; however, I wish to say to U. A. M., who wrote several months ago, in regard to her little boy's crying spells, do not whip or punish him in any way for it but keep a constant watch over him to see when he is going into one of these spells. Pick him up and blow hard in his face or dash cold water in his face and do everything possible to prevent him holding his breath and I think in time he will outgrow or overcome it. I have a little girl who was affected the same way. I did everything I could think of to prevent the spells and finally I kept a strict watch over her all the time for I was afraid she would die in one of the spells. She would fall to the floor, seemingly almost gone and when I would revive her she would moan and cry for hours and say her head hurt. I consulted a doctor and he said it was contraction of the breathing muscles and when they failed to expand it affected the heart and almost caused circulation to cease, therefore the cause of the headache. But no matter who tells you he does it because of temper, do not whip him for it.

Will say to Mrs. Pete that she has a difficult problem to solve. However, if she can give up her desire for "going" and stay at home she may be happy. I have in mind a very dear friend whose husband cared nothing for going to any place of amusement so she gave up everything and stayed at home only when she could persuade him to go with her. It was generally supposed he loved her though he seldom expressed it in any way. In the course of fifteen or sixteen years, when she had lost a good deal of her youth and girlhood charm in caring for their family, along came one of the "fair angels" a good deal younger than the wife, and she soon found that she had a very small part of her husband's affections, so you may know how much happiness there was in her future life. But, Mrs. Pete, do not understand me to say that anything like that might happen to you. I was merely illustrating one incident.

I believe in birth control and I don't see how it is going to send souls to hell, as one sister said it would. I have three children, but I think it would be a sin to bring more children into the world than we can care for.

With best wishes to the sisters, OUIDA.

DEAR FRIENDS OF COMFORT:

I am another who is writing to the Sisters' Corner for the first time. I have read it since I was a little girl.

Now, about birth control. There are two sides to that as there is to any question. Let those who are "happy wives and mothers" go on the even tenor of their way. But there are those, that have been wronged and stunted perhaps in their lives and powers, to speak. Now I believe every one in this world has a perfect right to be born in the best way mentally, physically and spiritually with all God-given powers for great good. It is a well recognized fact that our great "what we are" is at the time of conceiving. If the "average" is fairly good, how much better could the "above the average" be?

My mother conceived with me, three months after she had given birth to her first baby. Hardly time to get back her strength and courage; besides, every mother knows that a first baby is lots of worry and care to the new mother. Then at that time there was sickness and death to grieve her.

Does anyone blame me if I feel just a little cheated? And wouldn't it have been better for all concerned if I had come into the world a year later?

I do not believe that birth control will lessen or make so much difference that way. But when we have a better quality we must have a happier people. The doctors needn't worry—most good women would go very near to death in order to have babies of their own to love, and the other kind—well, they will do about as they have always done—take what they think is the easiest way.

May we hear from others about this.

With good wishes to all, from
One who would be a Happy Mother.

BIG RAPIDS, MICH.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

Just a message to L. T.

Convince that man of yours that you do not approve of the Absolute Monarchy form of government and that he will have to introduce a reform or there will be a revolution. If he really cares for you as he should he will change; if not, the sooner you are rid of him the better. It takes tact, patience and judgment and no person can advise exact methods unless on the ground and acquainted with both parties and circumstances.

Remedies

NEURITIS.—A home treatment. Apply hot water and mustard poultices to parts. Also one ounce laudanum, one ounce oil of origanum, and one and one half ounces each of oil of hemlock and oil of sassafras. Mix and rub on affected part. Also place a flannel saturated in camphor to painful parts and cover with a dry cloth.

SUNSTROKE.—Reduce temperature as quickly as possible. Remove person to cool place and loosen and remove as much clothing as convenient. Apply cold to head and body by rubbing cold water or ice over face neck, chest and arm-pits. Wring sheets out in ice water and wrap patient in them, keeping the sheets wet. If this is done the body should be rubbed. When conscious give cold water to drink but no stimulants.

The Kind of Calves to Raise

FARMERS are being given a deal of advice these days and some of it is coming from well-meaning people who never have farmed, but are sure that they know just how it should be done. The advice to save every dairy heifer calf offered in wholesale manner may well be criticized. It certainly seems at first thought that every heifer calf should be allowed to develop, have a calf, and become a milker, but on more mature consideration such advice will be seen to be foolish.

Thousands of heifer calves are the offspring of "robber cows" and sired by scrub bulls. The sooner such beasts, including sires and dams, are slaughtered, the better will it be for all concerned. Possibly some may argue that it might pay better, in the present shortage of food supplies, to feed all calves beyond the vealing stage so that they might supply a greater quantity of meat, but that, too, is open to question.

The crying need of the hour is for the mating of pure bred sires of producing ancestry with cows that have proved profitable producers, and with heifers from such cows. Were such sensible breeding to become general, the calves might, in a majority of instances, be worth raising, but that is not the case now.

Together with this improved system of breeding imperatively should go proper care and feeding of the progeny. We venture to say that at least one third of all of the heifer calves now raised are imperfectly developed, and for that reason do not yield a maximum profit as cows.

Hundreds of thousands of dairy heifer calves after being fed some whole milk and then skimmilk are turned on pasture to fight flies, half starve, and merely survive until better feeding can be given them in winter. Lungworms commonly infest such calves. The poor beasts become pot-bellied, dry and tight in the hide, show "anxiety of countenance" and are stunted for life by such "penny wise, pound foolish" management.

More than increased numbers of dairy calves on the farms of the country is needed better development of those raised now, and that means adequate feeding from birth until one year old, during which time the less the calf is exposed on pasture, the better will it be for the future cow.

Every robber cow and every cow that merely pays for her keep should as soon as possible be replaced by a profitable high grade cow and such improved cows can only be obtained by perfectly developing the well-born calf. No practical improvement can possibly be achieved by raising a multitude of ill-bred calves to add to the present horde of unprofitable cows.

A campaign for fewer and better calves to develop fewer and better cows would be a much wiser economical movement than one for the raising of an additional host of worthless calves that might practically "eat us out of house and home."

Care of the Foal

All things considered, we believe that it would be better not to allow the foal to run with the dam while she is at work in the field or on the road. Exercise is good for the foal but too much of it is injurious and that is likely to be taken if the foal follows the mare. Then, too, the foal should not drink milk from the mare when she is tired, hot and sweaty. Milk under those conditions deranges the digestive organs and this is the reason for foals losing hair and assuming a "moth bitten" appearance. Suffering from indigestion and over-exercising in the hot sun the foal fails to thrive and we need scarcely state that loss of "milk flesh" and stunting during the early months of life mean stunting that cannot later be remedied perfectly by generous feeding. Apart from the welfare of the foal it must be conceded that the mare is annoyed and impeded in her work by the presence of the youngster or is so solicitous for its welfare that she works less efficiently. It would be better to leave the foal in a roomy, clean, airy box stall, having a yard or paddock attached for exercise, when the mare goes to work. There the foal should, if possible, have the companionship of other foals and should be supplied with pure, cool water and access to a box containing crushed oats and wheat bran, that it may early learn to eat and so come to the weaning time in thriving condition and able to live without the milk of its dam. At first the foal will have to nurse once or twice during the forenoon, the mare being brought in for the purpose, but soon it will suffice to have the foal drink at noon after the mare has cooled off a bit while eating a pound or two of hay. If the mare is perspiring freely and quite tired when she comes in at noon, it is advisable to strip away at least part of her milk and allow the foal to nurse later when fresh milk will be secreted. The object should be to keep the foal growing and gaining in weight every day and to prevent all causes of stunting. Only then will a foal profitably develop. Allowing it to run with its dam certainly retards growth.

Apple Blight

We all have noticed the dry brown leaves on the tips of twigs and branches of apple and pear trees. These branches have the appearance of being scalded by fire, hence the name "fire-blight." Sometimes the injury is so great as to completely kill the tree, at others the trees are hurt so badly that it takes years for them to recover.

CAUSE OF "FIRE BLIGHT."—Fire blight is caused by a germ which gets into the blossom and feeds upon the honey in it. Under these conditions, accompanied by cloudy, damp and rainy weather, these germs multiply very rapidly and work their way down through the sap of the tender young twigs and leaves. This cuts off the food supply from the twigs and the leaves curl up and die, and turn brown.

WHAT TO DO FOR FIRE BLIGHT.—Fire Blight cannot be cured by spraying, like blight in potatoes, because the germs are inside the twigs, not on the surface of the leaves as the spores are in potato blight. Diseases on the outside of plants can be controlled by spraying but those on the inside must be treated in some other fashion. The best known control for fire blight is the removal and burning of the diseased branches. All blighted twigs should be cut off several inches below the dried leaves and promptly burned. The tools used in pruning should be disinfected by dipping them in a solution of one part of corrosive sublimate dissolved in 1000 parts of water, after each cut. This is a deadly poison and must be used with great care and kept away absolutely from children and animals. Trees badly affected should be completely destroyed.

HOW THE DISEASE IS CARRIED OVER.—Fire blight is carried over from year to year in diseased spots on the trees known as "cankers." These are simply old sores to be found around the base of diseased twigs. These cankers should be dug out with a sharp knife and the wound treated with the corrosive sublimate solution used in disinfecting the tools.

HOW BLIGHT IS SPREAD.—Blight is spread from branch to branch and tree to tree largely by insects, of which lice are the most important. Any spray, then, that is used with success to control these insects becomes an indirect means of controlling the spread of fire blight. The tobacco concoctions frequently mentioned in these columns are among the best means of controlling lice on fruit trees. The lime sulphur sprays generally used in orchards are also effective.

Grow Wheat

Now is the time to plan to sow wheat this fall. The world's supply of wheat is short. This year's crop is still further reduced. Bread is the one essential for winning battles. The world needs wheat. America is in the best position to produce a big crop next year.

WHERE WHEAT CAN BE GROWN.—Winter wheat can be grown successfully throughout the two Northern tiers of states. The upper Mississippi Valley and the great plains of the West are particularly adapted to wheat growing. The crop is comparatively easy to grow and harvest and requires little labor to produce; in fact wheat is the easiest food stuff we have to produce. This is the chief reason why it is grown continuously year after year on the same land until the soil is worn out.

WHEAT SHOULD BE GROWN IN A ROTATION.—Many places where wheat was once the main crop have abandoned its culture altogether. This was unnecessary and in the present crisis exceedingly unwise. Wheat should be grown in rotation with other crops. One good four-year rotation for wheat is as follows:

First Year.—Second crop clover, plowed under and sown to wheat.

Second Year.—Manured, fall plowed and planted to corn in spring.

Third Year.—Oats or barley seed with clover, or clover and Timothy mixed.

Fourth Year.—Hay or pasture.

Other equally good rotations for wheat can be easily devised. The above is adapted to the general farm or the dairy farm where dairy cows or beef cattle are kept and hogs raised for the market. Such a farm raises small grains, hay and cultivated crops, like corn, produces large quantities of barnyard manure and for these reasons is particularly adapted to wheat growing, provided wheat is given a place in the rotation.

PLAN NOW TO RAISE SOME WHEAT.—Six bushels of wheat provide bread for one person for a year. Thirty bushels will feed the average family of five. Why not raise bread for your own family? One acre of good wheat will do it. Five acres will feed four other families. Why not raise five acres and have some to sell at these high prices? It is safe to predict that wheat will not fall to one dollar a bushel for several years after the war stops. An acre of wheat yielding thirty bushels—this is a big yield, about twice the average for the United States but easily possible in a rotation since yields of forty and even fifty bushels are common on good land—will bring in between $40 and $50 at threshing time and requires less labor to produce than an acre of almost any other crop.

NOT ALL SOILS GROW WHEAT.—Wheat does not do well on all soils. If too rich, the grain may lodge, if too poor the yield will be small. Fertile loam and well drained clay are soils best adapted to wheat. Sand and marsh are poor wheat soils. On new land wheat does exceptionally well.

TIME TO SOW WHEAT.—Winter wheat may be sown the last week in August and all during September in the localities mentioned in this article, depending of course on the locality. The main thing is to sow it early enough so that it covers the ground and holds the snow to protect the roots and prevent winter killing. If sown too early it may get too far along before winter sets in.

HOW TO SOW.—Use from one and one half to two bushels of seed to the acre. Sow with drill seeder or broadcast on well prepared land. There is no danger of having the soil too fine and mellow. If loose it is a good plan to run the roller over the land to compact the soil. The hard red winter varieties are preferred on the market. Wheat can be sown immediately after the harvest rush is over and is then out of the way until harvest time again when it is the first crop to require attention. Why not grow wheat this fall?

Buckwheat and Bread

In pioneer times buckwheat was a popular crop. Old-fashioned self-raised buckwheat cakes are still popular in some quarters. During the war we will doubtless be forced to adopt again many pioneer practises. The eating of buckwheat cakes should become one of the first and most popular. One meal a day of pancakes during winter will make just that much less draft on the bread basket and reduce the price of flour correspondingly.

WHERE BUCKWHEAT IS GROWN.—Buckwheat can be grown with success throughout the Northern tier of states. It can be sown late, the latter part of June and the first of July, on land where other crops have failed. It is easy to grow, on sandy soils, on clay, on wet soils, on wornout fields, on newly cleared land,—anywhere that other crops will grow. It is our most persistent and most hardy bread crop. Of course it does well on good soil, but first-class land is not essential to buckwheat. It is a good crop to sow as a nurse crop for grasses, clover and Alfalfa. Besides this it has broad leaves and hence is a good weed killer by shading the ground.

HARVESTING BUCKWHEAT.—Buckwheat is cut and laid in small bundles which are tied together near the top and set up by spreading out the butts, each bundle separately. It cures in the gravel in this way and when dry may be hauled directly to the threshing machine. The ordinary grain thresher will handle buckwheat if the concaves are lowered so that there will be more space and that the seeds be not hulled or crushed. With the present high price of wheat and rye flour, buckwheat is also certain to command a good price and to be more widely used as long as the war lasts.

New and Valuable Bulletins

Two new and valuable bulletins have just been issued by the United States Department of Agriculture. One deals with canning and other methods of food preservation and the other is devoted exclusively to drying and contains many valuable recipes for the cooking of dried fruits and vegetables. The first is Farmers' Bulletin No. 839 and is entitled "Home Canning by the One Period Cold Pack Method;" the second is Farmers' Bulletin No. 841 and is entitled "Drying Fruits and Vegetables in the Home." Both these bulletins should be in every home that has vegetables and fruits to save.

HOW TO GET THESE BULLETINS.—These bulletins are to be had free for the asking. If you want either or both of them write a letter or postal card to the U. S. Department of Agriculture, Washington, D. C., and ask that these bulletins be sent to your address. Be sure to give full title of bulletin exactly as above, with the number of the same. Don't forget to give your address and be sure to sign your name. Thousands of requests for bulletins are received by the Department of Agriculture from persons who fail to sign their names or to give their proper addresses. Don't make the same mistake when writing for the above bulletins.

Farm Labor and the World War

It is now universally admitted that there is a world shortage of food. The war will be ended quite as much by "billets of bread" as by "bullets of lead." When conscription goes into effect the supply of farm laborers already fifteen per cent below normal will be still further reduced. This will do for this country what it has already done for Europe,—still further decrease our power to produce food. Hence in supplying the trenches we may cut off automatically the food supply for the men in the trenches. Some plan must therefore be found for securing larger production per each man left at work on the land.

A PLAN THAT WORKS WELL.—All over this country such plans are being worked out. One such is here outlined for the benefit of our readers with the hope that it may help them to solve the farm labor problems in their own communities. The principles underlying this plan are:

I.—Farm family labor is most efficient; hence let all members of the family do as much of the farm work as possible. Hire only such labor as is necessary to completely work the land.

II.—Of hired help, experienced farm labor is the most efficient; hence, always give preference to men known to be experienced.

III.—Employ miscellaneous or inexperienced labor only for irregular work and seasoned jobs where the work is all of one kind.

HOW THESE PRINCIPLES ARE APPLIED.—In each trade center someone is found who is willing to act as labor leader for the community. He makes a list of all men and boys, retired farmers, school boys and others who have worked on farms and keeps this list always handy. Any farmer needing help in that community is thus able to get it by applying to the local leader. If it's odd jobs, like thinning sugar beet, or cutting tobacco, or work with the threshing crew where the process is easily learned, the school boys and the inexperienced laborers are used. If it is regular farm work of considerable variety requiring experience, the retired farmers come in handy. If it is regular farm work the year round or for the season, married men with families are preferred, in which case a share in the profits in addition to the regular wage becomes an added incentive to do one's best. These local communities are keeping in touch with each other through the county agent and exchanging their surplus laborers to help each other out. In the same way the counties exchange with each other so that the best workers are always given preference in hiring men to work the land.

WHEN THE DRAFT COMES.—The draft will not come until after most of the crops are harvested, but it is hoped that when it does come the best farm hands will be left at work where they can produce most. If any food producers must be taken let it be those who have failed as farm laborers. The kind of organization outlined above will furnish the basis for finding out those most efficient. Another point which must be kept in mind is that farm hands should not be withdrawn from the farms to take the place of those taken by draft from the factories, without their places on the farm is filled by more efficient farm laborers.

Wolf Teeth and Dentistry

The removal of a "wolf tooth" is immaterial. Such teeth neither cause weakness of the eyes nor periodic ophthalmia (moon blindness), common erroneous belief to the contrary. In rare instances, they interfere with the bit of the overhead check rein and then should be extracted. They are merely little insignificant short-rooted teeth, situated one on each side of the upper jaw close against the first premolar tooth. Comparatively few horses have such teeth whereas eye disease is extremely common. Wolf teeth are vestiges, through atavism, of the anterior premolar teeth of the prehistoric horse. The modern horse has six grinding teeth above and below in each jaw. The prehistoric horse had seven. The hog is our only domestic animal that has such a dental battery today. Far more important than removal of wolf teeth is attention to the incoming incisor teeth of the colt. Often the milk teeth which should be shed, their roots having been absorbed, become jammed between the permanent incisors and remain there causing considerable pain and, possibly, ill-thrift. They also distort the position of the incisor teeth and give the mouth an abnormal appearance. They should be extracted promptly when seen to be lodging and causing discomfort. This, too, is true of the "shells" or "crowns" of the first three premolar teeth on the upper and under jaws. The three true molars come in behind the premolars. Only the latter have shells and these should be removed as they frequently cause ill-thrift in young horses and cattle. This is most necessary when the colt is rising three or four years and when the bull, steer or heifer is from one year and nine months to two years and six months old. It also is well to lance the gums over the incoming incisor teeth of the young colt if they are seen to be red and swollen. Such work commonly is necessary when a colt has "lampas," that being merely a swollen condition of the hard palate just behind the upper incisor teeth in sympathy with swelling of the gums associated with the irritation of teething.

The Questions and Answers constitute one of the most valuable features of this department and we urge our farmer subscribers to read all of them carefully each month, as you will find that they contain much useful information and advice on practical problems that are troubling you as well as those who have asked the questions. Cut them out and paste them into a scrapbook for future reference. This will save you the trouble of writing us and will avoid delay in getting your answer when you need advice on these same matters. We are glad to receive inquiries from our subscribers and to advise them on all matters pertaining to farming.

Questions and Answers

HOME-GROWN SEED.—Kindly tell me whether I can grow my own tomato seed and, if so, how to save it. (2) Can beet seed be raised here successfully? (3) Does rhubarb ever seed?

MRS. R. G. K., Red Oak, Ga.

A.—Yes, tomato seed may be saved from ripe tomatoes. Simply remove the seed, wash off the pulp and dry seed in the sun. Store in a dry place. (2) Beet seed can be raised in this country though most of it is produced in Europe. (3) Yes, rhubarb "goes to seed." New varieties are produced by planting the seed though rhubarb is usually propagated by dividing the root.

SEED BEANS, WEEVIL.—Would Lima beans grown near ordinary pole beans produce seed that would come true to the variety? Would Lima beans and butter bean (which are a mere variety of Lima beans) grown near each other come true, or would they mix? Would different varieties of ordinary pole beans come true if grown near each other? (2) How can weevils be prevented from destroying bean seed?

I. S., Knoxville, Tenn.

A.—Beans usually fertilize in the blossom before the blossom is open; hence there is little likelihood of crossing. Different varieties usually blossom at different times in which case there is no chance of crossing. There is therefore small probability that Lima beans would cross with other varieties if planted near them. (2) Weevils in beans can be destroyed by the use of carbon bisulphide. Place beans in a box. On top of the beans place carbon bisulphate in open dishes like plates or bowls. Cover the box tight. When the carbon bisulphide is evaporated, which will be in about twenty-four hours, the weevils will be destroyed.

CAUTION.—Keep fire away. No smoking, no lamp, no lantern, because carbon bisulphide is very inflammable and the fumes are explosive—worse than gasoline. Air out thoroughly as you would after using gasoline.

Grew 108 Bu. of Wheat from 1 Bu. Sown —Says J. H. Nyberg

A Remarkable Wheat—a Heavy Yielder a Seed Saver

W. A. Jarrett wrote us he raised 3430 bu. of wheat on 70 acres, an average of 49 bu. per acre. The crop was worth more than the land it grew on. We have many letters from farmers in Ala., Ark., Ill., Ind., Ia., Kan., Ky., Md., Mo., Nebr., N. Y., N. C., Ohio, Okla., Pa., Tenn., Tex., Va., W. Va., etc., reporting as remarkable results. It will cost you less to sow this large yielding variety of wheat than to use common wheat from your own granary. It's a fact! You can sell the wheat you intended to sow and with part of the money received buy this heavy yielder and sow the same acreage. If you grow winter wheat, send for our proposition and printed letters from hundreds of farmers—many from your own state. Now is the time to increase the wheat yield. Let us tell you how to save money in sowing the crop and produce more bushels per acre.

Fighting the High Cost of Grain

THE high cost of corn and wheat seems to be scaring people all over the country into parting with their poultry, which is regrettable; for if corn and wheat are high, eggs and meat are higher still, and every family which stops keeping chickens is simply pushing the price still higher, for, as you all know, supply and demand are the leading factors which control market prices. So if people who have been keeping only a few chickens just to supply their own table with eggs, dispose of their birds and buy market eggs, they decrease the supply and increase the price at the same time. Remember that our beauteous land and our mighty ocean are made up of grains of sand and drops of water.

Food conservation is now, and will be for the next two years at least, an imperative necessity for the welfare of humanity, so everyone should consider the production of food in any form a duty which they owe to mankind, and like the grains of sand and drops of water, every egg or vegetable you produce, either for home consumption or for market, helps to swell the supply—and keep down prices.

Of course, grain and wheat are high, and it is a serious matter to people of moderate means who live in villages or on the outskirts of towns where they have only small yards or small acreage, and cannot grow their own supply. But if, instead of selling off recklessly, they will use discretion, cull out all the old, fat, lazy and unproductive hens, and keep the bright, busy pullets, the returns in the shape of eggs will far exceed the expense of feed.

I tried one or two experiments last winter with two pens of pullets,—ten birds in each, and had very satisfactory egg yields, though the birds did not have grain or wheat all winter, and very little corn. Their rations consisted of oats scattered in deep litter at seven in the morning; at eleven o'clock, sprouted oats and beets; buckwheat and Kaffir corn mixed in equal parts—a pint for each pen. At three o'clock, a warm mash made of potato peelings or small potatoes which have been mashed and mixed with commercial beef scraps, oil meal and ground oats. About two tablespoonfuls of scraps and half a cup of oil meal and a pint of oats to every quart of mash peelings; two quarts of the mixture to each pen. For supper, they had buckwheat, barley and oats mixed—one quart for each pen. The potatoes, buckwheat, and oil meal are all fattening, so of course generate heat, which is necessary in winter rations, and balance the want of these qualities in the oats almost as well as corn would have done.

When there is a large family to supply the table scraps containing meat, potatoes and bread, beef scraps and oil meal can be omitted, but to get the best results from table scraps, they should be put through a meat chopper and be thoroughly mixed; otherwise one hen is liable to get all the fat, another all the vegetable, which means that neither will get a balanced meal. And what is more, the hen who wins a large piece of fat is very likely to have an attack of diarrhea and become dangerously ill.

Another small and useful economy is to dry all the egg shells left from the table cooking. Crack them up and add them to the mash, for they will take the place of grit and oyster shell. Of course such a method of feeding is only practicable for the small flock. Farmers should cull just as rigidly and get rid of all the unproductive birds, but as they usually grow much of the necessary food and have sufficient room to keep good-sized flocks, it is better to devote their time and energy to making birds produce as many eggs as possible during the winter months, in spite of the price of grain.

Feed and cleanliness are the two great factors. When I say feed, I don't mean quantities of one kind of grain. The hens must have a variety to furnish the different elements necessary to keep them in good condition and provide a sufficient surplus to form eggs, or they can't lay them. You can feed a hen lots of food, but if it lacks the ingredients which are necessary for the different parts of the egg, it is just wasted, for the hen won't produce eggs, even though she may be so fat that she develops liver trouble or apoplexy.

What constitutes a well-balanced ration varies considerably in different parts of the country. In cold climates it takes a good deal of rich food to sustain bodily heat, therefore what would be a well-balanced ration in Dakota would be positively detrimental for birds in the South. For this reason, I collected information from experiment stations in different parts of the country about their methods of feeding laying hens, hoping that our readers will be sensible enough to accept the vicarious experience of the experienced poultrymen who made a study of the subject in the different climates.

New York Ration

This ration has given the best results when used with large and small flocks at the Cornell Experiment Station, and is widely used in the Eastern states.

SCRATCH FEED.—Fed morning and afternoon in straw litter: Wheat, 60 pounds; corn, 60 pounds; oats, 30 pounds; buckwheat, 30 pounds.

DRY MASH.—Fed in hopper which is kept open during the afternoon only: Corn meal, 60 pounds, wheat middlings, 60 pounds; wheat bran, 30 pounds; Alfalfa meal, 10 pounds; oil meal, 10 pounds; beef scrap, 50 pounds; salt, one pound.

GREEN FEED.—Beets, cabbage, sprouted oats, green clover or other succulent food given at noon in a quantity that the hens will immediately eat up clean so that none is left to spoil. Oyster shell, grit and water are available at all times.

The New Jersey Ration

This ration is designed for use with laying hens throughout the year, with slight modifications according to the season.

SCRATCH FEED.—Every morning about nine o'clock the following mixture is fed in deep litter inside the house at the rate of about five pounds of scratching ration to each hundred birds: Wheat, 100 pounds; oats, 100 pounds.

At four or five o'clock in the afternoon the following mixture is fed at the rate of 10 pounds to each hundred birds: Cracked corn, 200 pounds; wheat, 100 pounds; oats, 100 pounds; buckwheat, 100 pounds.

DRY MASH.—Kept before the birds at all times during moulting season in self-feeding hoppers. In early fall oil meal is substituted for gluten meal. In spring Alfalfa is omitted and beef scrap is reduced: Wheat bran, 200 pounds; wheat middlings, 200 pounds; ground oats, 100 pounds; corn meal, 100 pounds; gluten feed, 100 pounds; Alfalfa, cut short, 100 pounds; high grade meat scrap 200 pounds.

GREEN FEED.—Beets at the rate of four or five medium-sized ones to each hundred hens, or sprouted oats at the rate of 100 to 150 square inches for 100 hens.

Sour or skim-milk is given when available. Grit, oyster shell and pure water are always provided.

The Kansas Ration

SCRATCH FEED.—Fed in small quantities early in the morning as soon as the birds leave the perches; and also two or three hours before the birds go to roost, a quantity that will give them all they desire: Wheat, 300 pounds; corn, 200 pounds; oats, 100 pounds.

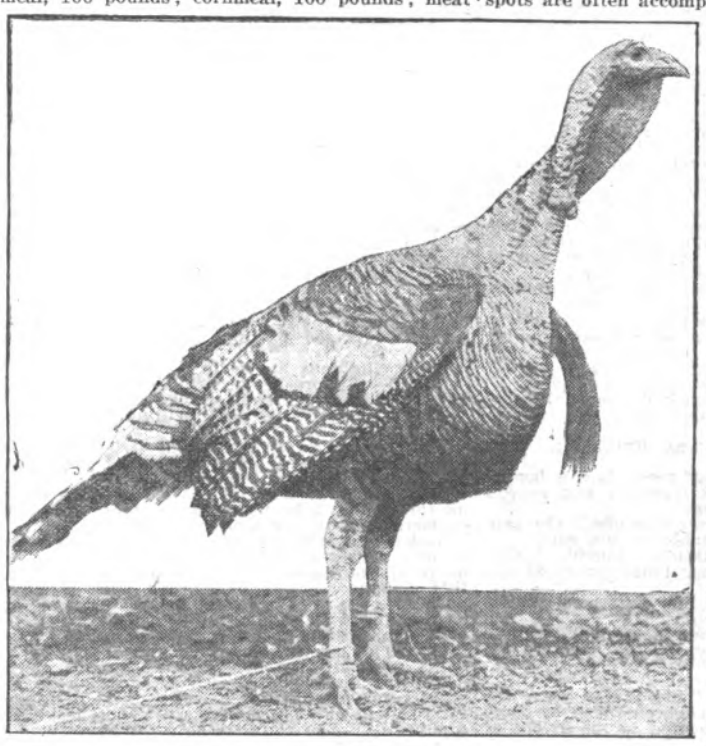
DRY MASH.—Fed in hoppers at the rate of one pound of mash for every two pounds of scratch feed: Corn meal, 60 pounds; meat scrap, 50 pounds; wheat bran, 30 pounds; linseed oil meal, 10 pounds; wheat middlings or shorts, 60 pounds; cut Alfalfa, 10 pounds; salt, one pound.

GREEN FEED.—At noon the hens are fed as much green feed, consisting of sprouted oats, roots and so forth, as they will clean up in 20 minutes. Fresh water, oyster shell, grit and charcoal are always before the birds.

The Indiana Ration

SCRATCH FEED.—Scattered in litter morning and evening, about one third of the daily allowance in the morning and two thirds in the evening: Corn, 100 pounds; wheat, 100 pounds; oats, 50 pounds.

DRY MASH.—Fed in an open hopper accessible at all times except for heavy breeds, in which case hoppers are kept closed until noon: Shorts, 100 pounds; bran, 100 pounds; meat scraps, 60 pounds.



GREEN FEED.—Alfalfa silage, beets and cabbage, as much as the hens will eat immediately. Milk is fed regularly when available. Grit, shell and charcoal are kept constantly available in open hoppers. Fresh water is always at hand.

The Maine Ration

This ration is used successfully in Northern New England and in other portions of the Northern states where cold winters are the rule. It is designed for laying pullets during the winter period.

SCRATCH FEED.—Cracked corn is fed in the litter in the early morning. At ten to eleven o'clock in the morning equal parts of wheat and oats are fed at the rate of two quarts to each fifty birds.

DRY MASH.—Kept before the birds at all times in open hoppers so that they may eat all they like of it. After the fifth month or just past midwinter linseed meal is only given every second month: Wheat bran, 200 pounds; gluten meal, 100 pounds; cornmeal, 100 pounds; meat scrap, 100 pounds; low grade flour, 100 pounds; linseed meal, 50 pounds.

A PRIZE WINNER.

GREEN FEED.—Sprouted oats, cabbages, mangels, or a mixture of these, as much as the hens will eat up clean once a day. Grit and water always at hand.

The Connecticut Ration

This ration has been used in the International Laying Contest with certain modifications by the poultrymen in charge, according to the condition of the birds. During the first two years it was fed in an automatic feeder with good results, but later hand feeding was practised.

SCRATCH FEED.—In mild weather the feed is given only at four o'clock in the afternoon, but during cold weather a light feed is also given in the morning to induce exercise: Cracked corn, 60 pounds; barley, 20 pounds; wheat, 60 pounds; Kafir, 10 pounds; coarse beef scrap, 10 pounds; heavy white oats, 40 pounds; buckwheat, 10 pounds.

DRY MASH.—Kept before birds in hoppers so they may eat as much as they like: Coarse wheat bran, 200 pounds; ground oats, 100 pounds; beef scrap, 30 pounds; corn meal, 100 pounds; standard middlings, 75 pounds; gluten meal, 100 pounds; fish scrap, 30 pounds; low grade flour, 25 pounds. Green feed, grit and water are always available.

The Ontario Ration

This ration is well suited to Canada and to Northern states where there are severe winters.

SCRATCH FEED.—Morning: Whole wheat in litter. At noon a second feed of wheat with green food. At night give all the whole corn the birds will eat just before they go to roost.

DRY MASH.—Bran, 100 pounds; low grade flour; 100 pounds; barley chop or meal, 100 pounds.

WET MASH.—In the middle of the afternoon give a light feed of wet mash, including boiled vegetables, waste bread or kitchen scraps thickened with ground grains used in dry mash, including 10 per cent beef scrap.

GREEN FEED.—Whole mangels or clover hay, boiled vegetables with green cut bone as a separate feed. Grit, oyster shell and charcoal should be provided.

The Missouri Ration

The following rations are used successfully on the Missouri Poultry Experiment Farm with birds in laying contest.

SCRATCH FEED.—Fed at the rate of one pint to ten hens in the morning; one and a half pints for ten hens at night in straw litter: Coarse cracked corn, 200 pounds; wheat, 100 pounds.

DRY MASH.—Ground oats alone is kept before birds at all times in open hopper. When this is not available the following is used: Bran, 200 pounds; corn meal, 100 pounds; shorts, 100 pounds.

WET MASH.—Between one and three o'clock each afternoon laying hens are fed a mash consisting of equal parts of corn meal, wheat, bran and shorts, moistened with sour milk or buttermilk.

GREEN FEED.—Sprouted oats, cabbage, beets, fresh cut Alfalfa, in a quantity that the hens will eat up clean without delay. Oyster shell, grit and charcoal are always provided in separate hoppers. Fresh water is always supplied.

Every month brings letters about sick turkeys, and in almost every case the writer is sure that the trouble cannot be blackhead, because the birds' heads are not discolored or sore. Of course the name blackhead" naturally leads people to think that discoloration of the head is the principal symptom of the disease. As it is impossible to spare space in the correspondence column to explain the disease fully, it seems wise to give a sketch of it here, so that our readers may be better able to recognize the symptoms and understand the answers.

As far back as 1895, Dr. Theobald Smith reported on "an infectious disease among turkeys caused by protozon (infectious entero-hepatitis)," and stated that in Rhode Island the disease was known as "blackhead." He further stated that "while it might be well to retain this as a popular name, we do not believe that all cases of blackhead have the specific disease herein described, nor do all turkeys afflicted with this disease manifest the appearance of blackhead.

Dr. W. A. Moore, in a report on the "Direct Transmission of Infectious Entero-hepatitis in Turkeys," accepted the common name of blackhead as a synonym, a name which, though unsatisfactory for many reasons, has been retained in this article.

Smith first ascertained that the disease, which is especially characterized by great sores in the cæca and liver, was caused by a protozoan, Amœba meleagridis. In explaining the character of the disease it has been compared to amœbic dysentery in the human subject—a disease which also attacks the large intestine and liver.

Amœba meleagridis, a minute protoplasmic animal, is found to vary between six and ten millionths of an inch in diameter. While they are microscopic in size, they are at least three to four times larger than the red blood corpuscles, but they are, nevertheless, small enough to float in the blood capillaries of the portal system from the cecum to the liver, where they seem to be stopped from going further.

This short description of the parasite contains all that is of general interest. It may be summed up as follows: the amœba is a microscopic animal or parasite capable of living within the tissues of the turkey, its host. It can, therefore, eat, grow, and reproduce itself in large numbers, thereby causing irritations, destruction of the tissues, and nearly always the death of the invalid turkeys.

When the amœbæ invade the liver, they cause a decided increase in size, which becomes normal again only when the sores heal. The infected spots are often accompanied by signs of destruction of liver substance (necrosis), indicated chiefly by bile stained, irregular markings. These are probably caused by the pressure exerted by the spots, acting as foreign bodies, and by the cutting off of the circulation and food from other parts. Bacteria and the irritation which they produce also play an important part in these secondary disturbances.

An explanation of many extensively diseased livers and cæca, and comparison with others less diseased, leads to the belief that death in the latter cases is not always produced directly as a result of blackhead disease, but is effected by secondary causes, such as climatic changes, bacteria, and starvation, acting upon an already weakened body.

Chronic cases furnish a large variety of morbid changes, evidently caused by the inability of the tissues of the patient to overcome and reduce the irritating masses. The liver and cecal sores are always present in recent cases, and disappear only in the turkeys which have recovered.

The cæcum may exhibit but a minute sore, but the liver, excepting when nearly healed, always exhibits a large number of sores. When turkeys die after a long continued illness, their heads which are usually red in health, become more or less darkened. In acute cases they die so quickly, however, as to leave no impression as to a change of color of the head.

The majority of young poults die after a day or two of droopiness. Adults may droop longer and pass into chronic stages of the disease. Refusing to eat and standing apart constitute late symptoms. Starvation in chronic cases produces thinness.

When the disease in the cæcum is slight, it is doubtful if the affected animals have diarrhea, which is more or less present in other cases. In many of the older poults the droppings will be liquid, and stained orange yellow; this is the most characteristic symptom of all. Sometimes there are blackened blood clots in the droppings, indicating slight hemorrhages.

Experiments show that more than four fifths of the young poults exposed to infected yards, die before they are six weeks old. The disease has been popularly supposed to be one confined to older birds. It is notably a disease affecting young turkeys, but one from which the older turkeys do not escape. Of the one fifth who do escape or survive its ravages, at least ten to twenty per cent may die throughout the year, at almost any age. Examination of the organs is the only re means of telling the cause of death.

The amœbæ are transmitted from diseased turkeys to others through the droppings, which contaminate the food with which they come in contact. Evidence obtained here indicates that the amœbæ may also be carried by ordinary fowl, and may be transmitted by the turkeys in the same manner. So you see once again the importance of exercising strict cleanliness is impressed upon us poultry people, for if droppings are removed regularly there is little danger of infection. Plow up the old yards and ground where poultry usually congregates. Disinfect the coops and houses, and don't let the turkeys roost in the same house with the hens. An open shed is the best place for them, even in zero weather.

J. Y. C.—The trouble is unquestionably poison in some form, as the birds are fat and in good condition until a few hours before death. The feathers being loose and the comb turning black, are also symptoms of poison. As only grown hens and guinea fowls that drink at the pond in the pasture are affected, it suggests the idea that the pond is contaminated in some way; possibly when it gets low or after heavy rains which bring the water line above the usual height. If possible, have it drained, and clean it. The only thing I can recommend for any future cases is to give two tablespoonfuls of Castor oil as soon as you notice any symptoms. If worms had caused the trouble the birds would have been thin and the comb pale.

M. L. A.—Young turkeys should have nothing but sour clabbered milk after the first four days; after which, just a pinch of cracked wheat and hulled oats may be added to their sour milk rations. Read about blackhead in this month's article.

L. F.—As the turkey's face has been in the same swollen, red condition for so many months without her health and appetite being affected, I think it must be some odd condition of the skin, unless it looks like a deep fleshy growth, in which case I should be afraid of its being a tumor, and should kill the bird and burn the carcase.

E. N. A.—We have no such books or pamphlets.

M. M.—The chicken had some abnormal condition, or was hurt soon after being hatched. Probably the lungs were injured by other chicks crowding on it, or hens stepping on it. As it was the only one you lost out of one hundred and nineteen, it could not have been disease of any sort, as most chick troubles are contagious.

E. W.—Read answer to M. L. A. Geese and goslings are really grazing creatures, and the young ones do best when given free range on short young grass, and very little grain. But if it is not practicable to give your birds free range, chop up young clover, Alfalfa, and such weeds as plantain and dock, etc. Mix with wheat bran and ground oats—equal parts of each. To each quart add half a cup of gravel or fine sand. Feed lightly five times a day for the first three weeks; then three times a day.

J. M. H.—It is a case of whitecomb, which is a contagious disease. Remove the sick birds from the flock, and keep them in a small coop by themselves. Clean and disinfect the house. When only the head is affected, a cure may be accomplished, but if the disease has spread to the body, treatment is useless, and the bird should be killed and the carcase burned. When the head only is attacked, an application of iodine may check it, or a mixture of soft soap and carbolic acid—twenty parts of soap to one of carbolic, applied every day.

Address COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

Subscribers are invited to write to this department asking for any information desired relative to the treatment of animal troubles. Questions will be answered in these columns free by an eminent veterinarian. Describe the trouble fully, sign full name and give your address; direct all correspondence to the Veterinary Department, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

No atttention will be given any inquiry which lacks the sender's full name and address. but we will print only initials if so requested.

SELF-SUCKING COW.—I notice in a recent issue of COMFORT someone wants a remedy for a self-sucking cow. I suggest that he put a bridle bit in her mouth and keep it there all the time. It is the most successful and convenient method I ever saw and I am glad to recommend it to any one. F. J. P.

A.—We are obliged to our reader for this suggestion which we had heard of before, but forgotten. We have no doubt our readers will be glad to give it a trial if need occurs.

INDIGESTION.—I have a mule five years old. She eats heartily, but looks badly. When I take her out of the stable her ears will be sweating cold and also sweating across her loins. In working her in the wagon her bowels get loose. Plowing does not seem to affect them. I feed her on corn and hay. Will you tell the cause and give me a remedy? R. E. C.

A.—Indigestion is the probable cause of these symptoms. Allow the mule a roomy box stall when in the stable but never allow the animal to stand for a single day without work or outdoor exercise. Clip the mule each spring. Stop feeding corn when there is no work to be done.

LAMENESS.—I have a six-year-old buggy horse that has been lame for two years. She walks as though on hackles. Some suggest it may be rheumatism. P. F. L.

A.—It is impossible for one at a distance to determine the location or cause of a mysterious lameness. A personal examination would be necessary. The symptoms seem to indicate chronic corns or navicular disease, but the local graduate veterinarian should be asked to diagnose the trouble and prescribe appropriate treatment.

STIFFNESS.—I have a fine young heifer about three years old. She has her first calf. Three weeks ago she began to get stiff in her right shoulder and now she is stiff in both shoulders and left hind hip. Her feet are swollen. She eats all right, but lies down all the time, when in the pen. When I turn her out she will eat for a little time and then lie down. A. H.

A.—The fact that the feet are swollen would suggest that the entire cause of stiffness is there. Allow the heifer a roomy box stall in the stable and poultice the feet with warm flaxseed meal. Add coal tar disinfectant if you find sores between the toes or on the hoof heads. Cleanse the feet perfectly before applying poultices.

CHICKEN-EATING HOGS.—Could you advise me what to do for hogs that are eating chickens. The hogs are of good breed and I want to keep them. A. H.

A.—Cover the eyes of the hog with the bent piece of leather from the heel of an old shoe attaching it to the ears by means of hog snout rings so that it will act as a mask. The hog will be able to see to eat and graze, but not be able to catch chickens. Feed the chickens elsewhere when the hogs are being fed.

RINGBONE.—I have a mare five years old that has a knot on her left hind leg between her ankle and hoof. It has been there about eighteen months and does not seem to hurt her. It feels like a wen. What ails her and what can I do for her? J. T. B.

A.—If you mean that a boney growth is present it is a ringbone and should be left alone as it is not causing lameness. If it is a callous not attached to the bone, clip off the hair and apply tincture of iodine every other day if you must give treatment.

WOUND.—I have been a reader of COMFORT for several years. I have a fine four-year-old horse that was shot with a rifle, just behind the bladder, about thirteen months ago. A veterinarian took the ball out and it nearly healed. A very small place runs all of the time and more so when he stands in the stable. (2) I also have a horse with bog spavin. If I let him stand a little while he will limp for a few steps and then go all right. MRS. H. S.

A.—The wound still contains a bullet, some other foreign body or diseased tissue or bone which will have to be removed, before healing can take place. (2) Have the hock joint and spavin fired and blistered by a competent veterinarian; then tie the horse up short in a stall for a six weeks' rest.

GASOLINE FOR SHEEP.—I noticed in April number of COMFORT where E. S. asked for a remedy for his sheep. My brother lost several before he found a cure. Give them two tablespoonfuls of gasoline. He cured a lamb also. I know this to be a sure cure. MISS H. I. F.

A.—We have prescribed gasoline many times in these columns for lambs and sheep but it would not do to give it undiluted as advised by our correspondent. The average dose is one tablespoonful (four teaspoonfuls) of gasoline for a good-sized lamb. Adult sheep may take a larger dose. Give the gasoline shaken up in a mixture of two tablespoonfuls of raw linseed oil and half a cupful of new milk slowly and carefully from a long-necked bottle. The dose usually is repeated two or three times at intervals of 24 to 48 hours.

ABSCESSES.—Can you tell me what disease my calves have and if curable what treatment I should employ. Five of my young calves, which were running with their mothers, but were kept in a wet barn at night became ill. Three had lumps on their jaws. One of them died and on being opened had pus in the swellings on its jaws and the lungs were filled with abscesses. Two others have lumps on their jaws but seem to be getting along all right. The last two to take the disease had no lumps on jaws, but on opening, after death, the lungs of one were full of abscesses and the other had a diseased kidney. MRS. C. D.

A.—You should arrange to have the lungs examined at the state agricultural experiment station at Ft. Collins. It would seem that the calves are too young to have tubercular abscesses in the lungs, although you do not state their age, and it is therefore more likely that there is pyemia or pus absorption of the system. Calf diphtheria (necrobacillosis) might present similar symptoms but we cannot decide the matter without making an investigation. Report the matter to the state veterinarin.

APPLYING A BLISTER.—After applying a mustard plaster to an animal should it be left to wear off, or should it be washed off? (2) After blistering a horse with biniodide of mercury does it do harm for the horse to get that part wet? A. S.

A.—The mustard paste should be applied on heavy paper to exclude air and should be washed off in twenty minutes; then apply vaseline or sweet oil. (2) A horse should be kept tied up short for forty-eight hours after applying a mercurial blister, then apply lard daily. Wetting will not then injure the part.

SWELLING.—My two-year-old colt has a knot swollen over each eye about the size of a common-sized hen's egg. They have been there about three weeks. A week after they came she turned her head at one side when she ate grain. There is no discharge from the nose but her throat seems to be sore. C. H.

A.—Paint the lumps with tincture of iodine every other day. If pus is present it will have to be liberated. Abscesses often form at such places in the irregular or "bastard" form of strangles (colt distemper.)

COLIC.—I have a mare seven years old. She eats good and is fat, but has some kind of spells every once in a while. She had three last spring. She lies down and stretches out, then gets up, looking back at her side, standing and stretching as though in paln. Her bowels move all right. She acts as though it were a light attack of colic but does not swell any. C. C. G.

A.—The mare has slight attacks of colic and will have to be more carefully fed and managed. Give the drinking water before feeding. Add cut hay, straw or chaff to the oats to prevent bolting. Do not feed any hay at noon or feed her when hot and tired. Have her teeth attended to by a veterinarian. Give her a pint of raw linseed oil and two tablespoonfuls of turpentine slowly and carefully from a bottle, by way of the mouth each time she has an attack. Never let her stand for a single day without work or exercise.

Thorndyke's Quest

By Elbert Wasgatt Wells

Copyright, 1917, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

VANCE WARNER had gone through college heart-free. The many courtships for which a "co-ed" institution is often famous, meant nothing to him. He was too dignified to take part in the escapades, without which a college love-match is not up to standard.

"I'm sorry for you old man," said Joe Graham, a classmate of Warner's, in one of their parting conversations.

"Why so?" Vance asked with a little shiver of apprehension.

"Because you are leaving college and her fair co-eds with a heart untouched. You have no anchor for your affections save that mystical something all theologs are supposed to have."

"Isn't that sufficient?"

There was a touch of impatience in Graham's reply: "You are to become a minister, I believe, not a priest."

"I expect to be married to my work."

"That listens good, but it won't hold water," said Joe, chopping his grammar and figures into bits and making them into a rhetorical chowchow. "The tenets of the religion you profess, teach that the family is the unit of society. If you would preach a whole gospel, you must enjoin the family, its obligation and sacredness upon your people. Then, you will see the inconsistency of your preaching and practise. When you do see this, you will find yourself suddenly developing an overwhelming susceptibility for feminine charms, but, having gone through college, as you have done, fearful of giving a young lady a second glance, you will fall victim to a pair of dreamy eyes and reap as much wedded woe as your great Wesleyan prototype."

Warner's first years at the seminary was devoid of any but theological interest. The time some of his colleagues put in on writing tender missives, he devoted to exegesis. The dining-room girls were about the only ones of the tender sex with whom he became acquainted, but that he, or other theolog, should have "soft" designs on aught in the hall, save the fare, was unpardonable.

Miss Emmazette Thorndyke, the matron of the dining-room at Hensley Hall, had never had a love-affair of her own and was too short on sentiment to cherish one, had the poor foundling strayed into her preserves. This qualification held her job. Like the straitest Pharisee, she lived up to the letter of the faculty's iron-clad rule that no student should carry on a flirtation, or a love-making, with any of the dining-room girls. The execution of this law was Thorndyke's vindictive delight.

Now, a theolog must not be a flirt. Studying divinity and flirting is like serving two masters—he will cleave to the one and despise the other.

On the other hand, a young preacher has as much right to a love-affair as has a young layman. His heart is as prone to hunger as is that of his secular brother. So thought little Miss Ruth Mackenzie, who fulfilled Graham's parting prophecy, though the fulfillment was in milder tones than Graham had painted.

She entered the dining-hall near the beginning of Vance Warner's second year and came, gradually, to interfere with his interpretation of the major prophets. Following her advent into his life, he found Greek roots irksome digging. On every page of his Hebrew, he found a pair of laughing eyes, and they were always brown.

One day, Professor Batchelder was giving his class a test in Bible history and, referring to the Moabitess, asked:

"Of what nationality was Ruth—Mr. Warner?"

"Scotch," was the instant reply, but, a hearty laugh ensuing, he blushed furiously and asked: "Which Ruth do you mean?"

"I didn't know there was but one," the professor replied with a twinkle in his eyes.

"That's what Warner thinks," blurted Wolfe, the class wag, and another laugh arose at the luckless theolog's expense.

As they came out of the classroom, Vance sidled up to Wolfe and said:

"I want to punctuate the old prophet's 'saddle me the ass' into 'saddle me, the ass.' Thanks, old fellow, but I'll do better."

And he did.

Well, before the end of his junior year, the citadel of his affections had been taken by force and the little Scot reciprocated to the extent of thinking him "bonnie."

They found means of communication—love always does. President Hurley and his faculty might curtail all the social privileges, but cupid laughed in the crook of his elbow, not having a sleeve big enough to hide a giggle; for he taught these lovers the use of the wireless telegraph, before marconigrams were patented. Clandestine meetings took place, and moonlight strolls. The escapades Vance used to think beneath his dignity became part of their very existence, and the little danger attending these spiced them to a good wholesome flavor.

The beginning of his senior year found Vance and Ruth engaged. Just after the next commencement, they would be married and go away to his new work, which a superintendent friend had promised him in the West.

This mutual understanding and the fact that it was pretty generally understood among the other students, begot a little recklessness, and the pitcher, on one of its trips to the well, came near getting broken.

As he left supper one evening, toward the end of his senior year, Vance spoke over his shoulder to Ruth:

"A minute or two at ten o'clock?"

She gave him an answering smile, but turned to her work with some confusion, as she caught a gleam from the corner of Thorndyke's eye. Her confusion was aggravated when the matron followed her to the kitchen and asked what "young Warner" said was wrong with the clock. Let us hope her answer is not recorded.

Before ten, he stood himself by a pillar in the dimly lighted hall. Presently, there came, tip-tipping along, a feminine figure, and, gently whispering: "My dearest," Vance caught her in his arms.

His disillusionment was literally "fierce." He could not tell whether he had laid hands on a buzz-saw, a full-tuned dynamo, or one possessed with devils. Then arose a quick succession of screams, which tore the air into shreds and almost split his tympanums. Vance beat a retreat and stood not on the order of his going; for he made the stairs four steps at a jump and turned a half-summersault over a trunk which chanced to be in the upper hall-way.

The theologs—every mother's son of them—came pellmell to rescue fair lady from foul fiend. The president's house stood beside Hensley Hall, and Doctor Hurley rushed in, clad in lounging robe and slippers. His first question was:

"What is this unearthly trouble about?"

"It's unearthly, all right," somebody snickered.

Somebody else answered the doctor: "Thorndyke's got hugged!"

Said another, more remote from the center of the stage of action—in the wings, as it were—where the light was dimmer:

"It must have been her first experience."

Whether to brand this as a canard or to rebuke the prevailing spirit of levity, is not clear, but declaring it "an insult to a self-respecting female," she slammed the door between herself and her would-be rescuers.

The most dignified folks unlimber on occasion, and sixty-nine theologs decided this the time and this the place to indulge a good laugh. Every fellow tried to add something to lubricate the rollicking good humor. So, everybody's wit, native and acquired, exerted itself to make a "home run."

"Delivered to the wrong address?"

"Who was the addressee?"

"Not Thorndyke."

"That's the reason she screamed."

"'Twas a scream of delight."

"She mustn't take her delights so noisily."

What other nonsense might have been brewing, Doctor Hurley obviated by saying:

"Young men, this is shameful; get to your rooms. We will look into this affair tomorrow."

From the head of the stairs came a voice, squeaky in its disguise:

"Better go, too, Doctor—you'll catch your death o' cold!"

In matters of discipline, the doctor had a method all his own, or rather a lack of method nobody else would claim. Indeed, cases requiring discipline were so few he forgot from one to the next what was the procedure best calculated to conserve the dignity of the seminary.

At the close of the next morning's chapel-service, Doctor Hurley said:

"We shall dispense with the first-hour recitations. It is our purpose to investigate the unfortunate affair which occurred last night, at Hensley Hall. All may be excused, who know nothing about it. It will save time if any one who does know, will tell us what he knows. The quickest way of all would be for the culprit to confess."

Just how the doctor knew the offender was a student, is not clear, but nobody left the chapel—doubtless, all knew something, and wanted to know more.

Hurley gave a slight, mirthless laugh—about as long as two syllables—and said:

"Do I understand this was a kind of community affair?"

Vance Warner rose in his place and replied:

"Doctor Hurley, it seems that I know more about this unfortunate affair than any one else, for it was my offense."

Dead silence followed this burst of information. The students, generally, had an understanding as to the culprit, but they felt that honor must be maintained, even among theologs. So, while not expecting him to deny if charged with it, they did not think he would be so frank about it and were no little surprised. To the faculty, the confession and its antecendent "transgression" were incomprehensible; for, among themselves, they were coming to regard Vance Warner as the probable winner of the Berlin fellowship, but now—and they stared at him in blank amazement.

At last, Hurley found his voice—probably among the rafters, for it had a lofty pitch—and exclaimed:

"You, Vance Warner?"

"Yes," Vance replied; "but I am sure I regret it as much as any one."

Seated in an inconspicuous corner of the chapel was Thorndyke. The possible meaning of the foregoing remark struck her ear unfavorably and she sniffed in a defiant undertone.

"Your regrets come on the wrong side of the affair, young man," was Hurley's chilling response; "besides, you yourself know it is poor repentance that arises from being caught."

"If I had known it was Miss Thorndyke," and Warner's tone had the ring of sincerity, "I should not have done it for anything in the world."

This was greeted by the students with a hearty laugh, but it was entirely too personal to suit the outraged matron's notions and she hissed:

"The villainous hypocrite!"

"Oh!"—the president's exclamation indicated his belief that he had struck a warm trail—"Miss Thorndyke was the unwilling proxy of another?"

"She seemed to be in the hall of her own free will," Vance replied, and a good-sized, man-made giggle swept through the chapel.

"No nonsense, now, Mr. Warner—please tell us the young lady whose being late proved so embarrassing to our worthy matron."

Vance was still standing, having arisen when he first addressed the president. So it was that many of the students could see his face, and, at this demand, it was overspread with a slight flush of pain, but it was only for an instant; for, brightening with sudden resolution, he said:

"Doctor Hurley, I beg your pardon, but I have told you all my conscience demands I tell."

"If you will not——" Hurley seemed to be measuring his words as well as screwing up his respect for presidential authority and dignity—"if you will not, I say, every girl shall leave the dining-hall. You claim to be a Christian man—you can furnish some proof of it by sparing the innocent."

With equal deliberation and emphasis, Vance responded:

"I think it ill becomes a teacher of the Christ-life to punish the innocent to reach one whom you are pleased to call guilty."

The president winced under this thrust, but asked:

"Will you tell her name?"

Warner stood a moment, as if pondering. Then, turning so that he was more nearly facing the students than the faculty, he smiled and said:

"Miss Thorndyke can tell you—she had the young lady's coat over her head."

The effect was instantaneous. The ludicrousness of it was fatal to chapel decorum. Those theologs—some of them ordained ministers,—became a roomful of boys who had to laugh or "bust." It was a laugh of no mean proportions—loud, long and sincere. Professor Batchelder was tickled like the other boys, and the humor of the situation gradually gained on the faculty till, finally, after readjusting his countenance a time or two, a chuckle broke in Hurley's throat and ended in an explosion. This explosion, like an earthquake in mid-ocean, produced another tidal wave, and it was several minutes before Doctor Hurley found his voice.

When quiet was finally restored, and the doctor had wrestled a while with his face, he said: "Mr. Warner, it seems you and Miss Thorndyke have both been imposed on—my advice is the Scriptural injunction, 'go and sin no more.'"

Straw Clock Six Feet High

A clock made in Germany contains absolutely nothing but straw. Not even a piece of stiffening cardboard or a drop of glue has been used. It is six feet high and two feet square we are told. There are eight pendulums which allow speed regulations. By pressing a button which comes out automatically on one side the clock work is wound up and runs for five hours. By pushing another button the hands can be set. The dial, pendulum, figures, hands, even the chain, weight gears and the skeleton are of straw. The chain is fourteen inches long and endless. In the construction of this clock thousands of stalks of straw have been used, mostly three and fourfold, to give strength.

Comfort's Information Bureau

Under this heading all questions by COMFORT subscribers on subjects not related to the special departments elsewhere in the paper will be answered, as far as may be. COMFORT readers are advised to read carefully the advertisements in this paper, as they will often find in them what they seek through their questions addressed to this Bureau. They will thus save time, labor and postage.

NOTICE.—As the privileges of this Bureau and of all other departments of COMFORT are for subscribers only, no attention will be given any inquiry which does not bear the writer's correct name and address. Initials only, or a fictitious name, if requested, will appear in the published answer, but the inquiry must invariably be signed by the writer's true name.

Ambition, Louisburg, Minn.—Ambassadors and Consuls are appointed to their positions, though the consular service is now under civil service rules and men are appointed according to fitness after examinations. Ambassadors are selected by reason of merit, whether political or otherwise, and sometimes the selection is worthy and sometimes not. We would not say they are appointed as the result of a "stand in," as you put it, but they do use "influence," so to speak. Yes, a lawyer by working hard might in time get such a place, but a great deal of his work would not be at the law, though legal, no doubt. Don't try to be an Ambassador, but if you will qualify, by acquiring a foreign language or two, and otherwise educating yourself, you have as good a chance as the next one to become a Consul, which is no mean job, unless you happen to be sent to some part of the world where you will either melt or freeze.

M. L. F., Flat River, Mo.—Unless Flat River is a wireless station, your opportunities to become an operator must be found elsewhere. Just where is for you to find out if you are anxious enough to become one to make the effort. If you will write to L. R. Krumm, Chief Radio Inspector, Bureau of Navigation, Washington, D. C., you can get the government side of it, and if you will write to Mrs. Herbert Sumner Owens, Hunter College, Park Ave. and 68th St., New York City, you will get the school side of it. Though it has been said that women do not make the best wireless operators, Miss Helen Campbell, a New York girl, twenty-two years of age, passed the government test in May, eight words above the requirement, which is twenty words a minute. There are seven other young women training at the Marconi School. Elm and Duane Sts., New York City. This school was started by the National League for Women's Service.

N. M. M., Boonton, N. J.—To prevent the sticking which occurs in cooking vessels of aluminum they should be cleaned dry and not put in water at all. You can get steel-cloth cleaners which keep the aluminum in proper condition.

Mrs. M. S., White Post, Ky.—Cousinship is commonly reckoned by generations. If A and B were first cousins, the children of B would be considered second cousins of A. The grandchildren would be third cousins. The relationship of A's children and grandchildren to B's children and grandchildren would be that of cousins once and twice removed.

Herbs and Roots.—Many of our readers want to know how to recognize medicinal herbs for which there is a ready sale, and where to find a market for them. Almost any druggist can help you in this, and you can obtain the prices paid from a wholesale supply drug house. Inquire of your druggist or storekeeper where to write to the nearest big dealer near you. Write to L. G. Grund, Logan Station, Philadelphia, Pa., and to "Botonical," New Haven, Conn., for full information, as these two concerns advertise to buy medicinal herbs.

Jim McP., Breckenbridge, Texas.—Write to the McKesson & Robbins Co., 91 Fulton Street, and to Parke Davis & Co., 183 Hudson Street, and ask what they are paying for rattlesnake oil. These are both New York city firms.

J. J. S., Fortine, Mont.—The Indian Method of tanning was first to thoroughly scrape off all fat, the skin being spread over a large, smooth log and carefully and patiently gone over with a blunt-edged knife that would cut no holes in the hide. After the scraping, the brains of the animal, or of some other recently killed animal, were thoroughly worked into the skin. If the hair side had become soiled or greasy, it was washed in a weak lye made from wood ashes. When the skin was finally stretched for drying, if the Indians had any gunpowder, some of this was often sprinkled upon the hide.

Mrs. C. C. S., Abington, Mass.—The best method for anyone wishing to earn money at home is to watch for some local want in their home town, and to fill such want if they can. Home-made breads, cakes, and preserves always find ready market, and can be placed with dealers on commission, or sold at the house. It is surprising how quickly a profitable trade can be built up for a "Home Kitchen"—we have seen it accomplished many times. Anyone having skill in that direction can make luncheon sets and tea cloths. Little trimmed hats for small children often find ready sale when tastefully and skillfully made. Use your brains and fingers.

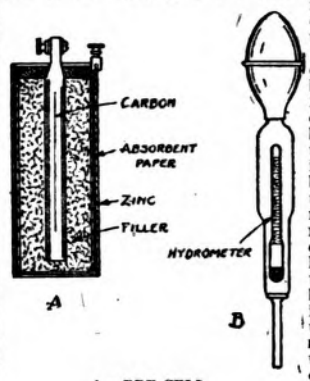
Interested, Greenville, Va.—You will require at least a high school education, or its equivalent, for admission to a dental college. Send for a sample copy of the Dental Digest, 220 West 42nd street, New York City. (2) Publications of the type you desire would be: Illinois Teacher, Bloomington, Ill., The Teachers' Journal, Marion, Ill., The School News, 156 Fifth Avenue, New York City, and The School Review, University of Chicago Press, Chicago, Ill.

A. M., Farmington, Wash.—We do not know of any market for pressed flowers. If any COMFORT readers know where this fragile merchandise could be turned into cash we would be glad to hear from them. Submit samples of your straw flowers, if they are well-made, to the Artificial Flower Decorating Company, 1545 Broadway, New York City.

Mrs. D., Chicago, Ill.—We are unable to tell the value of your 17th century medal. If you have tried coin dealers in vain, we suggest that you write the same description you gave us of this medal to the American Numismatic Society, 156th street, West of Broadway, New York City, and also to the American Numismatic Association, De Kalb, Ill.

Mrs. J. A. W., Wellsville, Ohio.—Experts differ as to the number of genuine Stradivarius violins in existence today, but all agree that they are very few in number. There are about thirty well-known and authenticated instruments. Violins being made in those far-off days by slow and careful hand labor, and many having been lost and worn out in the past two hundred years, it is easy to see that a genuine Stradivarius is a great rarity. But the imitations are turned out in large numbers, and many of them seem to be owned by inquirers to this department. The following is a description of a Stradivarius of 1690: Length of body, fourteen inches; width across top, six and six-sixteenths inches, across bottom eight and one quarter inches; height of sides, at top, one and three-sixteenth inches, at bottom, one and seven-thirty-seconds inches. Back in one piece, supplemented at lower part for width. Belly of two pieces of soft pine. The violin is coated with fine orange-red-brown varnish, untouched since making. A great part of the tone superiority of the Italian instruments is thought to have been secured by the varnish used at that time.

Dennie Burgans, Brantley, Ala.—This is another inquiry for a "needle to find gold and hidden treasure." There is no such article for sale except from those who are "finding gold" by selling a worthless fraud to credulous buyers.

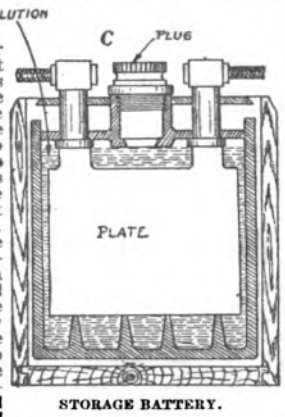


COMFORT'S Friend, Maud, Texas.—Here is another COMFORT reader who has a violin with an interior inscription that makes her think it is a genuine Stradivarius. As we have stated before it would have been impossible for old Antonius Stradivarius to make all the violins that are cheerfully attributed to him by dealers who have something to sell. These inquiries reach this department every month. Without doubt the inscription in COMFORT'S Friend's violin is a faked one. But if it is a good violin and you have had it twenty years, as you say, we should not worry about its actual ancestry.

Automobile and Gas Engine Helps

Questions relating to gasoline engines and automobiles, by our subscribers, addressed to COMFORT Auto Dept., Augusta, Maine, will be answered by our expert, free, in the columns of this department. Full name and address is required, but initials only will be printed.

The Battery



NATURALLY when considering the electrical system the motorist allows his mind to wander to the source from which the electric current is furnished. In automobile work the electric current is obtained from either one of two general sources, namely; battery and magneto. In this installment only the battery will enter into the discussion. Batteries may be split up under two headings, dry and wet. Almost everyone is acquainted with the dry cell battery due to the fact that it is commonly used to furnish current for the propulsion of toys and operation of door bells and therefore requires little introduction. It can be briefly described as consisting of a cylindrical zinc shell around the inside of which is wrapped a piece of absorbent paper saturated with a paste made of zinc chloride, zinc oxide ammonium chloride, plaster of Paris and water. The zinc shell forms the negative terminal of the battery and the carbon element passing through the center, the positive. The usual voltage of the dry cell ranges between 1.5 and 2 volts. The life of this kind of battery depends upon the way it is used, the life being greater if used only intermittently. The main objection to dry cell ignition however is that the life of the battery is short if used continuously and it is not good economy to attempt to recharge it.

A—DRY CELL.
B—HYDROMETER.

Under the heading "Wet Battery" comes the so termed storage battery. The term "storage" appears to be somewhat misapplied as the storage battery does not in reality store electric current in the same way that we speak of a pail holding water, but on the other hand the electric current is produced by chemical action.

Let us now briefly outline the make up of the average storage battery. The device is based upon the theory that if two plates of lead compound be immersed in a solution of sulphuric acid and a current passed through the cell there is a tendency to produce an oxide of lead on one plate and a spongy or metallic lead on the other. Present practise is to use plates in the form of grids filled with certain lead compounds, this preparation being kept secret by the manufacturers. The plates are known as positive and negative so termed due to the direction of flow through them. Current always leaves the battery by the positive end and returns by the negative. Positive terminals are usually called plus and negative minus. For the positive plates lead peroxide which is of reddish brownish color is used while for the negative plates, a soft spongy lead. Connect a number of similar plates such as positive or negative and a unit called a group is formed. Arrange two groups, one negative and the other positive so that the negative and positive plates alternate, and there is formed a unit termed an element. A positive plate however is not permitted to touch a negative plate and for this purpose separators usually made of wood are used. The next step in order is to place one of these elements into a hard rubber jar filled with a solution of sulphuric acid, commonly termed electrolyte and the complete cell is formed. Slowly charge the cell with direct current and we have a completed battery. A battery, however, may be composed of as many cells as desired, this of course being determined by the amount of work required of the battery.

STORAGE BATTERY.

It is a recognized fact that the reason for much premature battery failure is due directly to ignorance and negligence on the part of its owner. Man would not think of trying to exist without eating and drinking or in other words he requires nourishment to restore wastage of the body, yet he often expects the battery to continue its excellent service without giving it any attention whatsoever. The owner need not worry about the actual construction or the materials that enter into the battery, this being carefully taken care of by the manufacturer. The owner's only concern is the attention. The following are a few of the things he must do if the battery is to give satisfactory service:

Add distilled water, never a solution of sulphuric acid, until the solution is level with the inside cover.

Never allow the solution to get below top of plates, air is detrimental to the plates.

Make sure plugs are securely screwed into top of cells after peering into battery or adding water.

Make frequent inspections and make a practise of adding water once every week in warm weather and once every two weeks in cold weather. Use only distilled or rain-water caught in a porcelain vessel. Use no water known to contain even small quantities of salts of any kind.

The best way to ascertain the condition of the battery is to test the specific gravity (density) of the solution in each cell with a hydrometer. See sketch B which shows a common and convenient form of hydrometer syringe used to test the specific gravity of electrolyte. To take a reading remove the plugs in top of battery and insert the end of the rubber tube in the cell. Squeeze and then slowly release the rubber bulb, thereby drawing up solution from the cell. The reading on the graduated stem of the hydrometer at the point where it emerges from the liquid is the specific gravity of the electrolyte. After testing return the electrolyte from the cell from which it was taken by squeezing the rubber bulb. Always take the test before adding water because a reliable specific gravity test cannot be taken afterwards as the solution has not mixed by charging.

The gravity reading is expressed in points for example the difference between 1.250 and 1.275 is 25 points. When all cells are in good order the gravity should not vary more than 25 points. The electrolyte in a battery should not be allowed to drop lower than 1.250 but should a test disclose the electrolyte to show a gravity of 1.150 indications are that the battery is completely discharged or run down and must be charged from an outside source. Whenever the gravity is found to be below 1.250 but above 1.150 use the lamps and electric starter sparingly or in other words conserve the current for charging. In this way all other things being normal the specific gravity will slowly rise.

Simple Way to Foil a Thief

There is an old saying that it takes a thief to catch a thief therefore why not a thief to prevent a theft? According to reports the leader of a tribe of automobile bandits was captured in St. Louis and contrary to the usual custom seemed inclined to be talkative. During the conversation with the police he offered some good suggestions for the prevention of theft one of which was how to prevent the taking of an automobile by anyone except the rightful owner or operator. The trick is to cross two or more of the spark plug wires thus preventing the cylinders from firing in order. For example on a four cylinder motor place the wire for the No. 1 spark plug on the No. 2 spark plug and vice versa. The principle involved is that the motor will not operate and it will require long search on the part of the thief to determine what the trouble is. The owner can of course make the necessary change in approximately a minute.

"Emergency" Cement

Nothing detracts more from the pleasure of motoring than tire trouble. However as long as the pneumatic tire continues to be the favorite it is impossible to gain absolute freedom from this trouble, and it is therefore good policy to carry extra equipment or the necessary tools and material for making roadside repairs. There are times in the life of every motorist however when he ventures from home with no spare tires and little equipment for making repairs. When there is no cement at hand to stick a patch on the inner tube it is said that a good substitute is to dissolve small pieces of rubber in gasoline. If there are no pieces of rubber in the tool kit, cut off a few small strips from one of the outer casings.

Know Your Own Car

In a previous issue certain precautions were specified which should be taken against the theft of the car. It is surprising how very few owners really know their own cars. For example, if the car is stolen it is quite natural that the owner should first seek the services of the police. It is then that he realizes for the first time how little he knows concerning his own car. He usually knows the name of the car, the state license number, the horse-power of the engine and the color of the paint, but beyond these few facts he knows comparatively nothing. It is obvious that the police search would not go far with such meager details with which to work. The following is a blank form handed to the unfortunate when registering his complaint in one of the large Illinois cities. If you lost your car and were handed such a sheet how many questions could you answer? Better scribble these facts down in your note book. The slogan of the country at the present time is "Preparedness."

Questions Answered

ENGINE KNOCKS.—After being run about 1,000 miles the rear cylinder of my new Ford car has begun to knock or rather make a clicking sound. Otherwise the car runs smoothly and seems to have plenty of power. Can you suggest the cause and remedy? L. A. R., Wheelersburg, Ohio.

A.—Remove the cylinder block and examine the No. 4 piston. It may be that the piston is a trifle undersize causing a slap in the cylinder. If such is found to be the case try to find a piston that is slightly oversized. Look at the wrist pin for the No. 4 piston. It may be of a loose fit.

KEROSENE AS FUEL.—Is there any means or appliance by which I can use kerosene as fuel in my car? It is a four-cylinder machine, bore three and seven eighths, stroke five inches, r. p. m. 900, value-in-the-head type engine. O. R. H., Chandler, Ind.

A.—Kerosene is not a suitable fuel for automobile engines. Much difficulty is at present encountered in the vaporization of the low grade of gasoline it being almost impossible to generate sufficient heat to bring about this end. It is obvious therefore that steps would have to be taken in order to insure the necessary heat to vaporize kerosene. Because of its present lower cost every motorist is of course interested in the substitution of kerosene for gasoline as a fuel for the automobile. The chief difficulty in the way of bringing about this end is that it is practically impossible to start a cold motor on kerosene, unless some complicated preheating arrangement be used. From time to time several types of combination (kerosene-gasoline carburetors have made their appearance only to disappear in very little time with absolutely no profit to their makers. In view of the fact that many automobile engineers have given much attention to using kerosene as a fuel for automobile engines and to date have been unsuccessful our advice is that you abandon the idea of using kerosene and purchase only the best grade of gasoline available.

The Family Doctor

So many inquiries are received from COMFORT subscribers concerning the health of the family that this column will be devoted to answering them. The remedies and advice here given are intended only for simple cases; serious cases should be addressed to physicians, not to us.

Address The Family Doctor, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

NOTICE.—As the privileges of this and all other departments of COMFORT are for subscribers only, no attention will be given any inquiry which does not bear the writer's correct name and address. Initials only, or a fictitious name, if requested, will appear in the published answer, but the inquiry must invariably be signed by the writer's true name.

Mrs. J. P. S., Goldfield, Nev.—The muscular and nervous condition of your entire left side, affecting the control of your left arm and resulting at times in numbness of the body and face and other muscular and circulatory disturbances are too serious for an ordinary physician to treat with any degree of success, and you should go to a hospital where several physicians of the highest skill could examine you and prescribe such treatment as might be necessary. A cure is hardly possible, but great relief might be afforded.

Mrs. O. S., Dallas City, Ill.—Your symptoms would indicate chronic hay fever, but as hay fever is seasonal, or local, it must be something else which examination by a physician would discover and his treatment would relieve, if it did not cure. The mucous membrane of the nasal passages are inflamed from the catarrh and the air coming in contact with the sensitive surface causes the constant sneezing. The ordinary remedies failing, you should see a physician at once for the constant sneezing will produce results much more serious than your present annoyance.

Mrs. L. F. S., Hooser, Kans.—You have what is known as chronic nasal catarrh of the mucous passages of the nose, may be also some involvement of the soft bones of the nose—known as the turbinate bones. A good remedy for this condition is Dobell's Solution, which can be obtained at any druggist's. Bone involvement will require a slight operation.

Mrs. P. W., Randolph, Nebr.—Liver spots so-called, may be due to a local parasitic trouble of the skin, or to a constitutional taint. Hardly ever due to liver disease directly. Liver spots sometimes occur about the time of the "change of life" and then are of no special significance—simply a fatty thickening of the skin of yellowish tinge, and usually located on the eyelids.

"Reilly," Bridgeport, Conn.—There is no remedy or lotion, which will remove small-pox scars. You should consult some good skin specialist. There is no remedy under the name given.

Mrs. J. H., Loveland, Colo.—The condition is possibly of rheumatic origin—or arthritis of mild form. One of the best local remedies is oil of wintergreen rubbed on the joints at night, using a few drops only. Massage is also good.

Mrs. E. H., Belvidere, N. C.—Your case is quite complicated; but seems to be a case of auto-intoxication of long standing. Possibly also your kidneys are at fault. The swelling of your limbs, short breath, and inability to work without effort, all point to some kidney or stomach trouble, due possibly, as before stated, to a chronic poisoning of the system from intestinal fermentation and decomposition of undigested foods. You should consult a good stomach specialist at once.

L. H., Buffalo Ridge, Va.—We think you are perfectly safe in using the water as you have been doing for the past year. As a safeguard, you might send a bottle of the water to some good chemist and have it tested chemically. Your state health officer might suggest the best way of getting the examination made, as well as the best way of shipping sample and obtaining the same for shipping.

Mrs. R. M., Joplin, Mo.—You may have what is known as night-blindness due to disease of the retina. Or you may have an ear lesion. Consult some good eye or ear specialist in your city. Your mother's case is probably what you guess it to be. Change of climate is the best treatment for her.

Mrs. J. M. H., McHenry, N. Dak.—Your leg condition will probably improve after you stop nursing your baby. Bandaging your legs with flannel bandages before you get up in the morning, and removing them when you retire, would be beneficial. Until you consult your family physician, cover a large flat piece of cork with absorbent cotton and gauze and make pressure over the naval. Retain it in position by an adhesive plaster, known as Z. O. plaster.

G. F., Weimar, Texas.—Know of nothing to plump up the cheeks. Paraffin has been used by injection, but this is injurious, if not dangerous. Massage by a competent masseur would remove your wrinkles. This treatment might also fill out the cheeks.

Mrs. L. M., Miles City, Montana.—Can't recommend the remedy mentioned in your letter.

Mrs. E. S., Lebanon, Kans.—Operation is the only cure for your son. You should consult a good surgeon at once.

Mrs. F. C., St. Louis, Mo.—There is no remedy for "barreness." May be an operation, or some form of electricity would help you. Consult your family doctor.

Mrs. A. L. D., Mt. Selma, Texas.—Veracolate tablets have been very useful, if not curative in conditions such as you have described. You should consult some competent stomach specialist and have him make a careful examination. If possible have an X-ray picture made of your intestinal tract. This is one of many methods of finding out the true condition. May be another radical operation for the complete removal of your gall bladder will be advisable. You undoubtedly have an intestinal intoxication also. Some of the various preparations of so-called Russian oil taken in tablespoonful doses, three times a day, might be beneficial. The mineral oil emulsion is the best form. You should also find out the food that is best adapted to your condition and limit your diet to such food. Entire wheat bread, as well as bran bread, might be tried.

Mrs. J. F. D., Waynesville, Ga.—Your liver is evidently the seat of your trouble and you should take some liver medicine prescribed by some competent physician. The pain in your legs and shoulder are secondary and will right themselves with proper treatment along the lines indicated. You should also look after your diet, and leave sweets and pastry alone.

C. C. W., Deport, Texas.—Stick by your doctor, and continue the sweet pills he prescribes. Stop worrying over your condition, which is not necessarily fatal, but annoying. Worry will make you worse—one of the causes of diabetes is constant worry. Would not advise marriage on general principles, at least for the present. Change of climate will do you no good, but pleasant associations will. Continue the diet suggested by your doctor, and add a good Ceylon tea to your diet. This is sometimes very helpful if not curative.

Mrs. J. J., Youngstown, Alberta, Can.—You, of course, know that your trouble arose from a large thyroid. This has been removed as you say. Nervousness is one of the concommitants of this disease, plus excessive heart action and vascular changes. At your age, with proper rest, quiet and cheerful surroundings, and no hard work, you should improve if not wholly recover. Would not advise your having more children for the present.

Blue Eyes, Scranton, Pa.—Your child is rachitic—does not have lime enough in his system to make bone. See some good physician and have him prescribe the proper diet and some bone building medicine or food. Keep child off his feet as much as possible and consult an orthopedic surgeon for the bow legs. He may suggest a proper support or brace which would arrest this tendency to crooked legs. As to yourself, proper food with some malt drink should help you—food of the starchy type. As you get older, you will undoubtedly improve in weight.

A. B. C., Goldhill, Mo.—Depilatories, or hair removers, are all useless if not dangerous. See some competent skin specialist, and have him remove the hairs, by the only sure method, electricity—the electric needle.

Mrs. F. J., Montgomery, Minn.—You should consult some competent doctor as to your daughter's painful menses. A careful diet will do much to modify the pimple trouble. Give her a plain, simple diet free from sugar, pastry, and tea or coffee. Let her have cereals, fruits of all kinds, plenty of outdoor exercise and see that her skin is cleansed often, using little or no soap in the water, especially soaps of the highly scented variety. The walk to school will do her no harm, weather being favorable. Have her eyes examined at once for possible eye-strain. This in many cases results in a cure of the most remote nervous and diatetic troubles. Have her use skimmed or buttermilk. Milk sometimes will not agree with the stomach, when skim-milk will be grateful and curative as well as nutritious.

"Well, you will have plenty of chances to use it without beginning this minute. Wait till later on in the afternoon," she advised, with unconscious prophecy.

"But you a born lady, Miss Belton."

Nerine settled the kettle more securely on the fire. Here was her chance to make Mrs. Simpson make a clean breast of things, but she let it slip for the present. Wait till she was fortified by a cup of tea.

"I see you've been walking about since I was here," was all she said, looking at the fine, clean white cloth on the table.

Mrs. Simpson nodded.

"I was in my bedroom getting that when you came. I had a sort of feeling you might be here to tea. I left all my boxes open, too; and before you go perhaps you'd lock them up for me, if you won't let me walk so far."

"All right," rather absently, as she poured the boiling water into the teapot, and sat down to wait for the tea to draw.

Snap had returned, and she gave him a biscuit and some milk, which he ate, hastily growling the while.

"He's been like that all day, as if he heard something," remarked the woman, apprehensively. "It made me feel nervous, as if Simpson were about. Snap does hate him!"

Nerine laughed and looked out of the window.

"There isn't a soul within miles. You let yourself brood too much on Simpson," she cheerfully returned, and began to pour out the tea.

"By the way, I had a letter from Lady Belton today; Miss Belton is nearly well, and the doctor says I can take the children home in ten days or less. I want you to promise me something when I'm going."

Mrs. Simpson put down her beautiful china cup so suddenly that the saucer cracked.

"You going! Whatever am I going to do without you? You've been so very kind, though it isn't that. I think it's the way you've spoken to me, as though I were as good as yourself, and not one who'd get drunk and steal." Miserable tears stood in her eyes as she spoke. "You don't know what you've saved me from with your kindness and your not being afraid of me. Why, I'd kiss the ground you'd walked on." The dismay with which she began changed as she spoke, through bitterness to an untold love and gratitude which somehow brought a lump to Nerine's throat. She did not deserve it; come what may, she could no longer go under false pretenses with Mrs. Simpson.

"Perhaps by the time I go you will not be so sorry to lose me," she said, bravely. "When you know what my name is, even."

"I do know; it's Belton," Mrs. Simpson returned, quite placidly. "I don't see what that has to do with it; and before I forget it, won't you promise me to take that ring today? I can't feel happy in my mind when I think I'm alone here, and it might be stolen from me. I want somebody I care for to have it, because of who gave it to me."

"I'll promise to take it if you'll promise to tell me something first." Nerine spoke slowly, wondering just what was best to say. "And if you still want to give it to me, when I'm going home."

Mrs. Simpson had never been a shrewd woman, even before loneliness and excessive drinking had reduced her to what she was. Nerine felt almost ashamed of the utter trust in her eyes and voice as she answered:

"I'll tell you anything in this world you want to know, even if it's about Jim! I know you'd never use anything I said to get either him or me into trouble."

"It has nothing to do with Jim. And I give you my word of honor that whatever you tell me I'll never use against you," Nerine cried earnestly.

She rose swiftly and went into the bedroom. Coming back, she threw down a bundle at Mrs. Simpson's feet.

"The first thing I want to know," she said, quietly, "is where you got my silk skirt."

"Your silk skirt!" Mrs. Simpson turned a sickly purple. "It never was you! That's not how I know you! Oh, it can't be!" she ejaculated, wildly.

"You nearly killed me," the girl said gently. "Oh, why did you do it? You'll promise, won't you, never to—to do a thing like that again?"

But Mrs. Simpson only stared at her. At last she spoke in a groaning whisper.

"You said your name wasn't Belton—what is it?"

"Lispenard—Nerine Lispenard."

"What!" she shrieked, "you a Lispenard! You, Simpson's niece!" She rose from the sofa, transformed once more into a fury. "And I've talked to you about Simpson, told you how I hated him, while you came from him just to spy on me and find out how I was living." She came close to the girl, her hand raised threateningly. "I suppose he sent you here to find out how I lived, and when you go back and tell him, he'll stop my money!"

"Hush! Go and sit down; you have no right to speak to me like that." She held her breath while she stared down those furious eyes. "I am no niece of Simpson's," she said as soon as she dared speak, "and I hate him as much as you do."

Mrs. Simpson sat down, as suddenly as she had risen; she quailed before the tall girl with her steady eyes, though she scarcely believed her.

"You'd tell me the truth, wouldn't you?" she said. "Simpson didn't send you here, did he?"

"Send me!" Nerine laughed outright. "He would be ready to kill me if he knew I was here. That is, if your Mr. Simpson is my Mr. Mayne."

"That's the name he goes by now; you must know it as well as I, being his niece, and living in that grand big house with him."

Nerine stamped her foot.

"I tell you," she said, angrily, "I'm not his niece! I'm his stepdaughter. He married my mother when I was four years old." She pulled the diary from her pocket, "Here is the marriage certificate, if you don't believe me!"

"Married your mother! Simpson!" She clutched the girl by the hand. "Do you tell me it's all a lie that he's told about his nieces that he's paid for living with, and that I went and took the silver from when I found he'd gone away without leaving me any money?"

"He may have fifty nieces for all I know! But he lives with us at Lispenard House, and he is our stepfather; Agatha's, Maurice's and mine."

"Then where does he get his money?"

"He has our income, all of it till we're of age; and he has deceived us—oh, deceived us! just as he has you. I found out today that we are all two years older than he says we are. He has been taking our money, living with us, making our lives miserable, for eighteen months after he had any right to dare to stay in our house."

"That's true—you swear it?"

"True as that I sit here in your house. Do you see this book? It was my mother's; I found it in in Mayne's room while you were in Lispenard House, and I never could open it till today, when you gave me the key."

Mrs. Simpson stared at her.

"I took that key from Simpson—that's his real name—years ago. He never rightly knew what it belonged to, though he was wild when it disappeared."

With the haste born of a horrible suspicion, she almost tore the book from the girl's hands.

"I'm married to him! I've got my marriage lines!" she cried. "Let me see when he married your mother."

She fumbled desperately through the papers, and Nerine, leaning forward, helped her to find the certificate. It was dated at some little place in Canada, nearly twenty-two years ago. The woman gave a choking sound of relief.

"He married me in London, twenty-four years ago, come Christmas," she said. "Then he deserted me, and I came across him by accident, and made him support me. He'd good reason to support me, and him living with a wife that was no wife! No wonder he brought me here and found out Jim, and kept me in terror that he'd give him up to the police if I came to the house where he was living with his nieces. And all this time it's me might have kept him in terror if I'd only known. Nieces indeed! And me his lawful wife, for that's the only thing he's never deceived me about."

Nerine sat stunned. What was this she had brought about her ears? If Mrs. Simpson was Mayne's wife, what had her mother been? It was too horrible; she gasped for her breath.

Mrs. Simpson was staring at the book and the papers.

"What's this you say about finding out you were older than you thought?" she demanded.

Nerine told her, wearily, almost with indifference.

"Well, you can get back the income for these two years, and all the others besides. He never had any right to it—he never was married to your mother. You can go to court and prove it."

"Don't, for heaven's sake, don't! Can't you see it kills me to think how my poor mother——" She broke off sharply. "Let me see your certificate," she said peremptorily.

Mrs. Simpson pulled her jewel box from under the sofa.

"It's in the lowest tray—the one we didn't look in this morning." And with scant attention to the other contents she tumbled them all out on the table and held up her precious paper. It was all plain enough, the girl saw; the marriage of Clarence Simpson and Mary Lister and its date was written down in black and white.

Nerine leaned back in her chair, sick and faint. What should she do? There was all that money in Mayne's possession, and all he had spent to which he had never had any right; and to get it back she must blacken the memory of her mother. Never! oh, never! She would not tell anyone, not even Maurice or Agatha, of what she had found out this day, other than the two years' extra reign which Mayne had enjoyed. Tears were streaming down her face. "Oh, my mother!" she thought. "My poor, pretty, young mother!"

"Oh, lovey! don't cry like that." Mrs. Simpson's heavy, kindly hand fell on her shoulder. "You can turn Simpson out now, and live happy. And it isn't as though he were your father, you know."

"I can turn him out, and make him give back what he has taken from us; but if I were starving I would never tell any one that my mother was not his wife. Can't you see that?" she demanded, fiercely.

For a wonder Mrs. Simpson did see it. She sat quite still, lost in what was deep thought for her.

"I hate him, and you hate him, and we can't do nothing to him, either of us," she said slowly. "If it wasn't for that about your mother, and that trouble of Jim's at Satterlee's, we could make things hot for him in England."

Nerine lifted her head from her hands, the tears wet on her cheeks.

Value in Peanuts

The man who purchases a nickel's worth of peanuts to munch at the ball game, to feed to the squirrels in the park or to gladden the hearts of the children at home scarcely realizes that he has contributed to an industry that last year farmed a million-dollar crop, which, when placed on the market in various forms, reached the stupendous sum of $36,000,000.

Scientists claim that the peanut is the only staple food that will at once nourish man, beast, bird and field. It is the most nutritious of the entire nut family, rich in tissue building properties, and the cheapest.

Many Southern farmers are now using the peanut in their regular system of crop rotation. It has the added value of extracting oxygen from the air and feeding it to the soil.

Mrs. N. E. Q., Redondo Beach, Cal.—Under the laws of Montana, we do not think that you have any vested right in the property of your husband during his lifetime except that you would be entitled to support from him. We think that in case he predeceases you, you would be entitled to dower of one third interest for life in his real estate, unless the same had been released or some other provision was made for you in lieu of dower in his will. We think that the disadvantage you are now under consists in the fact that you are so far away from him and the probable necessity of your going to where he now is in order to enforce your claim for support against him. Of course, if he left or abandoned you for some good and valid reason, you may have forfeited this claim for support.

Mrs. A. J., Peabody, Kans.—Upon your statements, we are of the opinion, that a verbal separation agreement in the case you mentioned would not amount to much of anything. We think that in case of the separation of the couple you mention, the agreement as to the property should be reduced to writing and the share of each of the parties transferred by proper written documents in accordance to the terms of such agreement.

Mrs. J. B. E., Pennsylvania.—Under the laws of your state we are of the opinion that your judgment creditor can enforce the payment of his judgment against any property you may own, not exempt by law from levy under execution.

A. McL., Washington.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that children can be legally disinherited by the will of the parent, provided they be named in the will. We think this is usually done by leaving a small bequest to the child.

B. J. P., Idaho.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that homesteads after the same have been declared are exempt from levy under execution where the selection is made by the husband or, in case of his failure, by the wife or other head of a family, such homestead may be selected to the value of five thousand dollars, and to the value of one thousand dollars by any other person. The declaration properly acknowledged and recorded is prior to all claims against the property which were not existing heirs at the time the declaration of homestead was recorded, and in addition thereto there are the following exemptions from execution: 1. chairs, tables, desks and tools to the value of $200. 2. Necessary household furniture to the value of $300, wearing apparel, paintings, etc., and provisions provided for the individual or family use sufficient for six months, two cows and two hogs with their increase, also special itemized exemptions to a farmer, mechanic or artizan, miner, teamster or other laborer, surgeon, physician, surveyor, dentist, attorney, counsellor, judge and clergyman. Seventy-five per cent of the earnings of the judgment debtor, if necessary for his family residing in the state, for services rendered within the thirty days next preceding levy of execution. If earnings do not exceed fifteen dollars per week all such earnings are exempt, but in no case shall the exemption exceed one hundred dollars at any one time. Also certain exemptions of shares held by a member in a homestead or building loan association, certain exemptions as to life insurance and exemptions to live companies, public buildings, etc.

L. H., West Virginia.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion, that upon the death of the man you mention, leaving no will, his widow would receive dower of a one third interest for life in his real estate, and one third of the personal property absolutely, after payment of debts and expenses, the balance of the estate going in equal shares to his children; we think the share of the son who survived his father, but died before the estate was divided, leaving no will and no widow or descendant, would go to his mother and his brothers and sisters, and would be administered as his estate.

J. F. R., Pennsylvania.—Under the laws of your state we are of the opinion that upon the death of an unmarried man, leaving no will, and leaving no kindred nearer than first cousins, his estate, subject to the payment of debts and expenses would go to such cousins. We think such cousins would have to pay an inheritance tax to the state and the United States upon such share if the amount of the inheritance was more than the exemption.

Mrs. M. W., Tennessee.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that the property of your deceased uncle would be disposed of in conformity with the terms of his will, if he left a valid one. We do not think his foster son could be punished for using his name, even if he was not legally adopted.

Mrs. F. F., Wisconsin.—Under the laws of your state we are of the opinion that the statute of limitations runs against a claim for wages within six years from the time the cause of action accrued, or the last evidence of indebtedness thereof.

C. D. L., Oklahoma.—Under the laws of your state we are of the opinion that the wife of the general guardian of the young girl you mention has no legal right to punish such minor without the guardian's consent. We think that if the guardian subjects his ward to cruel treatment he would be liable to be removed as such guardian.

Mrs. K. A. B., Alberta.—We think the laws of your Province provide for the Torren's system of land registration whereby all titles to land and every interest therein, except household interests for a period of three years or less, issue from the government. We think the owner named in the certificate holds the land subject to such incumbrances, liens, estates or interests as are notified on the folio of the register which constitutes the certificate of title; we think an abstract of title is a certificate or statement as to the title of property made by some individual or title on abstract company. Under the laws of Minnesota we are of the opinion that the property, of a decedent who died leaving no will, and leaving no surviving issue nor spouse nor father, nor mother, would go to brothers and sisters of decedent, the lawful issue of any such as had predeceased the decedent, taking the parent's share.

Mrs. M. B., Oklahoma.—We do not think it necessary or the common practise to file or record a will until after the death of the person who makes it.

Mrs. A. B. S., Manville, Wyo.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that if the man gave the colt you mentioned to your sister, he could not again sell the same and give a good title to another purchaser. We think the paper you described as a bill of sale would be evidence substantiating the gift of this colt to your sister; just how conclusive evidence it would be, we think would depend on other circumstances. We think that you and your sister would be entitled to recover from this man such wages as he agreed to pay you, provided your right to enforce the payment of the same has not been barred by the Statute of Limitations.

Mrs. C. W., Merced, Cal.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of the wife, the entire community property without administration belongs to the surviving husband, except such portion as may have been set apart to her by judicial decree for her support and maintenance. We think if there was no such judicial decree, upon the death of your mother, the community property went to your father and upon his death, leaving no will and leaving a surviving widow and one child, would go in equal shares to each. If more than one child, one third to his surviving widow and the balance to the children in equal shares. We do not think the daughter of your mother by a former marriage would have any rights of inheritance from your father's estate.

kind of ministers and the right kind of religion, a religion that deals with this world as much as it does with the next. The government is using all the tin for war purposes so we have decided to eat the Goat.

Fort Robert E. Lee, HAWKINS, TEXAS.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I've been reading your prepardness speeches and haven't read anything I liked better since Lincoln's Gettysburg address or Spartacus to the Gladiators. When anybody sounds a war cry or a bugle call, I stick up my ears and listen. There's just one thing, Uncle Charlie, that I want to criticize you for—you say we join Preparedness parades but won't enlist to fight. Maybe you don't know Texas. Recruiting offices don't do much business here in time of peace, the boys know they can make more than $17.50 a month and serve their country better in some industrial work—but when there was a prospect of a real war with Mexico or Germany the office was open night and day enlisting men and one broad-chested six-foot farmer boy walked thirty miles to enlist. In a Texas family the father can show fourteen saber cuts from Chickamauga and the twelve sons each a bullet wound from El Caney and the whole famiy ready to go again. I've been among 20,000 soldiers the past twelve months and my opinion is this:

When Uncle Sammy mixes in this European scrap,
You bet he'll get to old Berlin,
And grab the Kaiser by the chin
And make the French and British grin
As he gives the Dutch a slap.
The Kaiser he'll feel awful blue,
He'll drop his sword and then skiddoo,
And then with war we'll be through.
And the cud of peace we all can chew
When Uncle Sam sticks out his chin,
Rolls up his sleeves and mixes in!

The first lesson in patrotism is to buy a flag, raise it at sunrise and lower it at sunset, never let it rain upon your flag, and fly it at half mast when some one who has served his country dies. Take off your hat and hold it over your heart when the flag goes by, and honor and protect your flag even when there is nobody looking. Well, Uncle Charlie, I'll close for this time, I just wanted you to know that here in Texas we still remember George Washington and the days of '76. (Some do Rob, but there are piles that don't.—Uncle.)

Patriotically, ROBERT LEE HARRIS.

This department Bob, is not conducted for traitors or lunatics but for sane, sensible, redblooded Americans, and that's why it always makes a hit with worth-while manly men and womanly women. Yes, Bob, I do know Texas, and the very last thing I clipped from my twelfth daily newspaper last night, was a little speech made by General Pershing who is leading our first division of soldiers to France. General Pershing said we were a nation asleep and continued thus: "The feeling among our people is very lax. They have not begun to realize that we are in this great war. It is all very well to write editorials about it and talk about it on the platform, but it has not yet been impressed on the people out West. I have just come from Texas where they say 'Oh, well we haven't lost anybody. None of our vessels have been destroyed, and we don't really feel that we are at war.' I put the question to all such men 'do you realize that you must take the places of every man who is killed among the Allies? * * * * * Bring the people to the full realization of the seriousness of this war and that the burden of its success is going to rest on these United States.' Texas with a population of some four million people forty-five days after the declaration of war had enlisted less than 3,500 men. Little Switzerland with a population nearly a million less than Texas can within a few hours, put 425,000 bayonets into the field. Germany knew better than to try and go through Switzerland. She knew if she did she would strike a hornet's nest. Belgium was only half prepared and you know what happened to her. Canada with an English speaking population but a little larger than Texas, has put half a million men into the field. It is a good thing for us that there is a lot of water between us and Europe and that the Swiss are a peaceful people, or they might take it into their heads to come and smash the stuffing out of our little professional army of 80,000 men. So you see we have nothing yet to be chesty about. We have done some big things in the past, but that was a long time ago. This generation has yet to prove it can make good and we hope to God it will make good, and we feel sure it will; but up to the present it has not shown much inclination to do what it must do if liberty and righteousness are to rule in this world. The soldier's pay has been increased to thirty dollars a month. That ought to have been done years ago. People who want other people to do their fighting and dying for them should be willing to pay the price. By the way only about three thousand people in Texas have been honest enough to pay income tax. That means there must be at least 20,000 income tax dodgers in the Lone Star State. What an outrage.

Comfort's League of Cousins

The League of Cousins was founded as a means of bringing the scattered members of COMFORT'S immense circle of readers into one big, happy family. Its aim is to promote a feeling of kinship and relationship among all readers. It was primarily started as a society for the juvenile members of COMFORT'S family, only, but those of more mature years clamored for admittance so persistently that it was deemed advisable to impose no age limit; thus all are eligible to admittance into our League provided they conform to its rules and are animated by the child spirit.

Membership is restricted to COMFORT subscribers and costs thirty cents, only five cents more than the regular subscription to COMFORT which is included. The thirty cents makes you a member of the League and gives you an attractive League button with the letters "C. L. O. C.," a handsome certificate of membership with your name engrossed thereon, and the privilege of having your name in the letter list, also a paid-in-advance subscription to COMFORT. You continue a League member as long as you keep up your subscription to COMFORT. There are no annual dues, so after you have once joined all you have to do to keep in good standing is to keep your subscription to COMFORT paid up.

Please observe carefully the following directions which explain exactly

How to become a Member

Send thirty cents to COMFORT'S Subscription Department, Augusta, Maine, with your request to be admitted into COMFORT'S LEAGUE OF COUSINS, and you will at once receive the League button and your membership certificate and number; you will also receive COMFORT for one year if you are a new subscriber; but if you are already a subscriber your subscription will be renewed or extended one full year beyond date of expiration.

Or, if your subscription is already paid in advance, you can take a friend's one-year subscription at 25 cents and send it in with five cents of your own, thirty cents in all, with your request for membership, and we will send you the button and membership certificate, and send COMFORT to your friend for one year. League subscriptions do not count in premium clubs.

NEVER apply for membership without enclosing thirty cents to include a new subscription or a renewal.

The League numbering over forty thousand members, undoubtedly is the greatest society of young people on earth. It costs but thirty cents to join, and that gives you at least a one-year subscription to COMFORT also, without extra cost.

Never in the world's history was so much given for so little. Never could thirty cents be invested to such advantage, and bring such splendid returns. Don't hesitate. Join us at once and induce your friends to do likewise.

All those League members who desire a list of the cousins residing in the several states, can secure the same by sending a stamped addressed envelope and five cents in stamps to Nellie Rutherford, 1299 Park Place, Brooklyn, New York, grand secretary.

Special Notice

Never write a subscription or renewal order or application for membership in the body of a letter. Write your subscription or renewal and membership application on a separate sheet of paper, separate from your letter. We have to put all subscription orders on our subscription file at once; so if it is written on the same sheet as your letter, the whole letter has to go on to the subscription file at once and thus can receive no attention from Uncle Charlie.

Never send subscriptions to Uncle Charlie nor to the Secretary of the League; they bother him and cause confusion and delay.

Address all letters to COMFORT, Augusta, Maine, and they will promptly reach the head of the department for which they are intended.

Ought to Eat with the Horses

"UNCLE JOE" CANNON, former speaker of the national House of Representatives, enjoys telling the following story at his own expense. One summer toward the close of a protracted session of Congress an old farmer from Vermillion county, Illinois, of which Danville, the speaker's home, is the county seat, visited Washington and called on Mr. Cannon at the capitol. They had been boys together and Mr. Cannon invited his visitor to accompany him to dinner that evening. Mr. Cannon had no home of his own in Washington at that time and was boarding at a fashionable and expensive place in a select part of the city. It happened that the first of the season's sweet corn was being served that evening and Mr. Cannon, who is inordinately fond of corn on the cob, consumed ear after ear of it to the amazement and astonishment of his guest who watched the speaker in vain for some indication that his appetite was being satisfied.

"Joe," he asked at length, "how much do they charge you for board at this place?"

"Well, Bill," replied Mr. Cannon, "this is an expensive place. I pay twenty dollars a week."

"I thought as much," said the farmer from Illinois. "Why in Halifax don't you board at a livery stable? It would be so much cheaper for you."

For A Club Of Four

Three Wheel Chairs in July

421 is COMFORT'S Total to Date

The three July wheel chairs go to the following shut-ins. The figures after their names indicate the number of subscriptions sent in by them or by their friends in their behalf.

Mrs. Mary Bryan, Frederick, Okla., 109; Mrs. Adella Albiston, Soda Springs, Idaho, 105; Sallie and George Jordan, R. 2, Tyner, N. C. 104.

Mrs. Mary Bryan has suffered several years from rheumatism which has permanently crippled her so that she can not walk. The entire 109 subscriptions for her chair came all in one bunch on July 6, and were sent by her good friend Mrs. Maude Yohe who writes that she will soon send 91 more subscriptions to complete the club of 200. Mrs. Yohe certainly is a good worker as well as a good friend.

Mrs. Adella Albiston, age 48, is a great sufferer and is badly crippled with rheumatism which has rendered her lower limbs entirely helpless. She is a widow and has four children. She and her two younger children are taken care of by her oldest son and married daughter. She is blind in one eye and partly deaf, but she is expecting to derive much pleasure in getting out of doors in her wheel chair.

Sallie and George Jordan are children of Mrs. Mary Jordan. Both have been crippled from birth. Sallie is 21 and George 10 years of age. They will share the chair together, taking turns in using it. Even in this way it will be a great benefit to them and help their mother in caring for them, though they each ought to have a chair.

Here is an interesting picture of little Mary Florence Hart in her COMFORT wheel chair which she very much enjoys, and below is her mother's letter.

The Roll of Honor this month is short for the reason that, as usual in hot weather, few take the trouble to work for the poor shut-ins in summer. I hope you will do better for these unfortunates next month. Summer is the time they most need and enjoy wheel chairs.

Sincerely yours,
W. H. GANNETT, Publisher of COMFORT.

P. S. For the information of our many new subscribers let me explain that for each and every 200 new one-year subscriptions to COMFORT, at 25 cents each, sent in either singly or in clubs by persons who direct that they are to be credited to COMFORT'S WHEEL-CHAIR CLUB instead of claiming the premiums to which they would be entitled, I give a FIRST-CLASS INVALID WHEEL CHAIR to some needy crippled Shut-in and pay the freight, too. It is a large and expensive premium for me to give for that number of subscribers, but I am always glad to do my part a little faster each month than you do yours. Any shut-in who has friends to help him get subscriptions can obtain a wheel chair free. Write me for information.

Wants Her Friends to See How She Looks in Her COMFORT Wheel Chair

FOGEL, June 23, 1917, OKLA.

DEAR MR. GANNETT:

I am sending you a picture of my little girl, Mary Florence Hart, in her wheel chair, for publication in COMFORT so that her many friends who helped her get it may see what she looks like. I thank you and all who helped. Respectfully yours,

MRS. H. J. HART.

COMFORT Wheel Chair Is Just Fine

BREMEN, ALA.

DEAR MR. GANNETT:

I received my wheel chair and it is just fine. I am well-pleased with it. I thank you very much and all who helped me to get it. I will keep on working to get subscriptions to help the good work of the Wheel Chair Club. I am your friend,

JOHNNIE MAY HEATHERLY.

COMFORT'S Roll of Honor

The Roll of Honor comprises the names of those who have sent five or more subscriptions to credit of the Wheel-Chair Club during the month previous. Following each name is the number of subscriptions sent.

H., for General fund, 5.

WORLD'S GREATEST MILK PRODUCER.—Cremelle Topsy Omsby Tobe, developed by B. T. Boyson of Rome, is the world-record-breaking Holstein cow. The cow has just completed a year's test, supervised by a Cornell expert, with a production of 28,436 pounds of milk and 1,050 pounds of butter. This shatters the world's milk production record by about 4,000 pounds.

"Virtue itself offends when coupled with forbidding manners."—Bishop Middleton.

In order to meet the demand for information made by COMFORT subscribers on the kindred subjects of Etiquette and Personal Appearance, this column will be devoted to them, and all questions will be answered, but no inquirer shall ask more than two questions each month. We would suggest to readers to cut this column out and paste it in a scrap book. Address letters to Etiquette Editor, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

Domith, Mineral Wells, Texas.—It is neither wrong nor improper for engaged couples to kiss. If you had been reading this etiquette department with any degree of care you would have known that long ago. (2) A year's engagement is too long, unless there is an excellent reason. (2) A woman five feet tall should weigh between ninety-eight and one hundred and thirty-two pounds, average one hundred and fifteen.

Two Pals, Obert, Nebr.—If two young ladies of seventeen cannot in four years discover the intentions of a gentleman of twenty-one, the matter is not for an Etiquette Editor to determine, but it should be referred to a detective agency. We suggest that you try The Pinkerton.

Two, Bussey, Iowa.—By rule the lady speaks first when meeting a gentleman, but friends do not wait for rules when they see each other. (2) If you apologized for your declination of his invitation and he should ask you again, it would be quite proper for you to accept. You can show him that you care for him by being more considerate next time.

Myrtle S., Oakland, Mo.—If the widower of twenty-four who wants to marry you and is able to support you, is willing to wait until you are sure you love him, we think you are lucky and should try to love, especially if you are sure he is as "nice" a man as you say. There is no law of etiquette that would prevent your giving a beau a bunch of flowers that you are wearing. But don't write it "waring."

E. C., Nemaha City, Nebr.—You have a hard situation to handle, and you have our sympathy. Do not lose your temper, and try and have some of your male relatives—older men, if possible—have a serious talk the matter over with her. You are young going to the girl—why not take your baby along—and talk the matter over with her. You are young enough to know her viewpoint, and if you could prevent anger entering into the conversation you might shame her from further attempts to attract your husband. For your child's sake, a separation should be the last resource.

Inalene A., California.—There would be nothing better to give the young man in Texas who gives you a present every Christmas, than a book. We think he might give you a fountain pen, and then it would be easier for you to write him. Perhaps he thinks of this in offering it. Too expensive presents should not be exchanged unless you are engaged.

Peggy Jane, Shelley, Idaho.—Nothing but little, inexpensive gifts, and preferably candy, books or flowers, should be accepted from a young man to whom you are not engaged. There is no reason for you to return any accepted gifts upon the breaking of your friendship, unless you think best to do so.

Edna B., Aurelle, Ark.—The length that a girl of fifteen should wear her dresses is largely governed by her height. To her shoe tops is about right; or how her mother wants her to wear them is better yet. A girl of fifteen should "fix her hair" neatly and as the other girls in Aurelle do. Do not try to be a woman too soon.

Frenchy, Petersburg, Ind.—If you are ready, as you should be, when your "boy friend" comes to take you somewhere, there will be no need for him to remove his overcoat or other wraps. If he has to wait he may do as he likes or is asked. If he is waiting you may say when it is time to go. (2) You may ask the young man to call again; if you do not and he wants to very bad, he will ask himself.

White Lilies, Baltimore, Md.—It is perfectly proper for a young lady to shake hands with a gentleman with her gloves on. (2) Pineapple when served in slices should be eaten with a fork.

Anxious Inquirer, Harrisville, Pa.—The bride should stand at the right of the groom. (2) The hat should be worn, and the glove removed from the hand on which the ring is to be placed.

Brown Eyes, Hansen, Idaho.—If you have tried all the remedies you say for your freckles and still have them, we fear we can offer no specific that will remove them. We have known lots of pretty girls with them, even on their noses,—and there is no certain cure. Do not go bareheaded in the sun.

Lorine D., Muenster, Texas.—We are not in favor of any kissing before couples are engaged. (2) It is kind and also "polite" for a girl to meet her caller at the door.

Lilly Wood, Greedy Hog, Texas.—Your friend could hardly answer a letter that he had failed to receive, unless you told just what you had written. If it is important for him to know, write again. (2) A girl of nineteen may "go with boys" but not too long with one that she has no intention of ever marrying. This would be for her good and his also.

P. N. W., Selma, N. C.—Wait until your girl friend knows you better. It is hard to overcome another person's bashfulness.

Blue Eyes, Millsap, Texas.—It might not be proper for a young girl to "hold" a young man's arm when walking at night. But it is perfectly good form for her to take his arm if he offers it, or if the walking is bad.

Bashfulness, Refugio, Texas.—Bashfulness is generally caused by thinking too much about oneself. Try and think of other people when you are with them. Do little things for them; speak to them of subjects that you know they are interested in; and center your thoughts on them and not upon yourself. This is a sure remedy, and the only one.

"I do not believe it!" cried the man, excitedly.

"I will prove it to you if you desire," Mrs. Stewart remarked.

"I defy you to do so."

"Very well; I accept your gage. You will, however, have to excuse me for a few moments," and, with these few words, the stately and graceful woman turned and disappeared within a chamber that opened from the room they were in.

It would be difficult to describe the conflict of emotions that raged in Gerald Goddard's breast during her absence.

Ten minutes passed, and then he was aroused from his wretched reflections by the opening of the chamber door near him, when his late housekeeper at Wyoming walked into the room.

CHAPTER XXIX.

"OUR WAYS PART HERE, NEVER TO CROSS AGAIN."

Gerald Goddard arose from his chair, and stared at the woman in unfeigned astonishment.

"Really, Mrs. Weld! this is an unexpected meeting—I had no thought of seeing you here, or even that you were acquainted with Mrs. Stewart," he remarked, while he searched his recent housekeeper's face with curious eyes.

"I have known Isabel Haven all her life," the woman replied, without appearing in the least disconcerted by the gentleman's scrutiny.

"Can that be possible?" exclaimed her companion.

"Yes."

"Then I presume you are familiar with her history."

"I am; with every item of it, from her cradle to the present hour."

"And were you aware of her presence in Boston when you applied for your position at Wyoming?"

"I was."

"Perchance it was at her instigation that you sought the place," Mr. Goddard remarked.

"Mrs. Stewart certainly knew that I was to have charge of your house," calmly responded Mrs. Weld.

"Then there was a plot between you—you had some deep-laid scheme in seeking the situation."

"I do not deny the charge, sir."

"What! do you boldly affirm it? What was your object?" demanded the man.

"I perceive that you have your suspicions, Mr. Goddard," coolly remarked the woman, without losing an atom of her self-possession in view of his anger.

"I have. Great Heavens! I understand it all now," cried her companion, hoarsely. "It was you who stole that certificate from my wife's room!"

"Yes, sir; I was fortunate enough to find it, two days previous to the ball."

"You confess it!—you dare own it to me, madam! You are worse than a professional thief, and I will have you arrested for your crime!" and Gerald Goddard was almost beside himself with passion at her cool effrontery.

"I hardly think you will, Mr. Goddard," was the quiet response. "I imagine that you would hesitate to bring such a charge against me, since such a course would necessitate explanations that might be to you somewhat distasteful, if not mortifying. You would hardly like to reveal the character of the document, which, however, you have made a mistake in asserting that I stole——"

"But you have admitted the charge."

"I beg your pardon, I have not acknowledged the crime of theft—I simply stated that I was fortunate enough to find the document in question."

"It seems to me that that is a distinction without a difference," he sneered.

"One can hardly be accused of stealing what rightly belongs to one's self," Mrs. Weld composedly said:

"What on earth can you mean? Explain yourself."

"Certainly; that is exactly what I came here to do," she answered, as, with a dexterous movement, she tore the glasses from her eyes, and swept the moles from her face, after which she snatched the cap and wig from her head, and stood before her companion revealed as Isabel Stewart herself.

"Good Heaven!" he gasped, then sank back upon his chair, staring in blank amazement at her.

Mrs. Stewart seized this opportunity to again slip from the room, and when she returned, a few minutes later, her superabundance of cellular tissue (?) had disappeared and she was her own peerless self once more.

She quietly resumed her seat, gravely remarking, as she did so:

"A woman who has been wronged as you have wronged me, Gerald Goddard, will risk a great deal to re-establish her good name. When I first learned of your whereabouts I thought I would go and boldly demand that certificate of you. I tried to meet you in society here, but, strange to say, I failed in this attempt, for, as it happened, neither you nor your—Anna Correlli frequented the places where I was entertained, although I did meet Monsieur Correlli two or three times. Then I saw that advertisement for a housekeeper to go out to Wyoming, to take charge of your house during a midwinter frolic; and, prompted by a feeling of curiosity to learn something of your private life with the woman who had supplanted me, I conceived the idea of applying for the situation and thus trying to obtain that certificate by strategy. How did I know that it was you who advertised?" she interposed, as Mr. Goddard looked up inquiringly. "Because I chanced to overhear some one say that the Goddards were going out of town for the same purpose as that which your notice mentioned. So I disguised myself, as you have seen, went to your office, found I was right, and secured the position."

"Now I know why I was so startled that day, when you dropped your glasses in the dining-room."

"Yes; I saw that you had never forgotten the eyes which you used to call your 'windows of paradise,'" responded his companion, with quiet irony.

Gerald Goddard cowered in his chair.

Suddenly there rushed through his being a great over-powering passion. He longed to take her in his arms, and call her by the endearing names he had known her in the days gone by.

He started up from his chair, vowing again his love for her, and repudiating the woman with whom he had lived for twenty years.

Quietly but firmly, she told him that it was quite impossible for her to ever again care for him; that all the love that she had ever borne him had been killed that day when he had deserted her in Rome.

And the man knew that she spoke only the truth.

TO BE CONTINUED.

The Crown Jewels of England

By C. L. Chapman

SOON after the beginning of the war the English papers announced that the crown jewels would be on exhibition on a certain day and between certain hours. This announcement caused a great deal of speculation, criticism and amusement on the part of the majority of Americans visiting in London during that first crowded period before transportation could be arranged.

We in America can hardly understand the delight, reverence almost, with which an Englishman contemplates the crown jewels—the orb, the staff, ampulla and the crowns. They not only mean royalty, but in them he sees the secret and history of the power of the greatest empire of the world, the nation on which the sun never sets. Schooled as he has been in the history of his native land, he sees the glorious occasions of the realm when these jewels were claimed, the events which their possession has marked, the state occasions the royal crown has graced. So that it is this sentiment and reverence that caused the lord chamberlain to decide to open the gates to renew at this time of war the steady flame of patriotism in every Englishman's breast.

The present crown of England is called St. Edward's crown, and its shape and form date from the earliest annals of English history. Many of the stones have been used over and over again in the various crowns for centuries and centuries, for although the form has never been changed, the weight has been made less. Long, long ago the poor English kings had to stand for nine and ten hours during the coronation with a crown upon their heads weighing almost six pounds.

Perhaps the most famous stone in the imperial crown, historically, is the famous uncut ruby, glowing bright and smooth below the famous Cullinan diamond. For this ruby armies have fought, kings have been murdered, and treaties made which have lasted to this day. Don Pedro, the cruel king of Castile, murdered the king of Granada for it, and with this king's death came an end to the romantic kingdom of Granada. And a few years later, when the adventurous black prince, son of Edward III of England and ruler of Aquitaus, was mixing in the affairs of Spain and aiding Pedro against his brother Henry, Pedro in a burst of affection gave him the thing he prized above all others, the black ruby, which the English prince wore like a blazing eye in the front of his helmet all during the battle of Najara.

Upon his return to England the jewel was finally given to his son, Richard II and later appeared in the helmet of Henry V, at the famous battle Agincourt. Its first appearance in the crown was in 1422, and it was at this time that another precious stone which is in the present crown was taken from the mace, which is a part of the coronation regalia, and added to the headpiece of the king.

This stone is the wonderful sapphire from Edward's the Confessor's ring, and was supposed way back in the tenth century to have healing properties. Edward the Confessor used to stretch out his hand with the sparkling blue sapphire on his finger over the head of the crippled and the sick and the blind and they went away cured.

Then there is an amethyst which William the Conqueror wore in his helmet for good luck, and there is the sapphire which was Charles the II's favorite, and which he wore exactly over his forehead.

The second largest Cullinan, called the Star of Africa, is also in the crown. No one has forgotten the wonderful stone which was discovered a few years ago, which was so big that nothing could be done with it, and that was finally cut into five exquisite stones, each enormous, the largest of which is in the imperial staff, the second largest in the crown, and two others in the queen's crown. This Cullinan diamond replaced the famous Kohinoor, "the Mountain of Light," which was removed to be set in the queen's crown, which is made entirely of diamonds.

The English crown has no fewer than 2,783 diamonds and 1,892 pearls in the crossed arches, and nearly a thousand lesser stones sprinkled through to give color and beauty-stones such as the ruby, the emerald and the sapphire and even less valuable ones, as a few turquoises, topazes, and opals. The jewels are mainly in the broad band which fits over the forehead, and pearls outline the arches which culminate in the cross at the top. This space is filled in with a rich dark red velvet and a band of narrow ermine softens the edge of the gold which rests on the head.

In former centuries the crown used to be the favorite way of raising money, and the royal jewels used to be in pawn most of the time. At the time of the coronation of George IV the crown was in pawn, and was hired out for the occasion at a cost of $35,000. The king wanted to buy it, but Lord Liverpool thought it an unnecessary extravagance. Finally they browbeat the poor pawnbroker down to $850,000, although the crown was then valued at $750,000, and in the celebration George IV had to march through the streets for miles wearing a five and a half pound weight on his head.

In value the crown has increased today with the addition of larger, newer stones, notably the two lesser stars of Africa and today is worth over a $1,000,000.

The whole regalia which constitutes the crown jewels is valued at $20,000,000, and consists of five modern and historic crowns, St. Edward's Staff, which is four and a half feet long and weighs ninety pounds, and is said to contain a piece of the true cross in the orb at the top; the royal scepter adorned with the largest Cullinan diamond, and four other historic scepters, the orbs of the king and queen, the coronation bracelets, the spurs, the ampulla, swords of justice, pointless sword of mercy, the spoon and salt cellar of state.

These were the heirlooms of the kingdom, which were exhibited to remind the people of their past victories, the ancient kings and their royal history, and to spur them on to deeds of patriotism.

Enjoy present pleasures in such a way as not to injure future ones.

Comfort's Comicalities "Jest for Fun"

Told by Prof. Taft

"I know a certain little boy," says former President Taft, "who used to bite his nails. 'Look here,' said his nurse to him one day, 'if you bite your nails like that, do you know what will happen to you?'

"'No,' said the youngster, 'What?'

"'You'll swell up like a balloon and go off pop!'

"The boy believed the nurse," continues Mr. Taft, "and he stopped bitinghis nails at once. About a month after the discontinuance of the habit, he met me at luncheon. He surveyed me with stern disapproval. Then he walked over and said to me accusingly:

"'You bite your nails.'"—Louisville Herald.

In Exalted Company

One of the members of a committee of inspection on its tour of a certain penitentiary found himself in conversation with one of the convicts. The latter was disposed to be confidential and thus unburdened himself:

"It is a terrible thing to be known by a number instead of a name, and to feel that all my life I shall be an object of suspicion among the police."

"But you will not be alone, my friend," said the visitor, consolingly. "The same thing happens to people who own automobiles."

Should Go in When It Rains

"Say," said the man as he entered the clothing store, "I bought this suit here less than two weeks ago, and it is rusty-looking already."

"Well," replied the clothing dealer, "I guaranteed it to wear like iron, didn't I?"

Cocksureness Blamed

Gen. Leonard Wood was talking at the Pittsburg camp about the sin of cocksureness.

"Gen. Sherman," he said, "once got word during a battle that Roscoe, his favorite horse, had been killed by a cannon ball. So he sent for his servant and said.

"'Go skin Roscoe.'

"'Why, General,' said the man, 'is Roscoe dead?'

"The General frowned, martially.

"'Never you mind whether Roscoe is dead or not,' he said. 'You go skin him.'

"It was evening when the sergeant returned with Roscoe's skin on a push-cart.

"'Does it take you four hours to skin a horse?' asked Gen. Sherman, impatiently.

"'No, General; only one hour,' said the servant; 'but it took three hours to catch him.'"—Exchange.

Double Proof

A tramp knocked at a farmer's door and called for something to eat.

"Are you a Christian?" asked the good-hearted country man.

"Can't you tell?" answered the man. "Look at the holes worn in the knees of my pants. What do they prove?"

The farmer's wife promptly brought out the food, and the tramp turned to go.

"Well! Well! asked the farmer. "What made those holes in the back of your pants?"

"Backsliding," replied the tramp as he hurried on.—Christian Herald.

Tasty Grounds

"I often think," observed Chauncey M. Depew, at the club one day, "of the ever-ready answer which our dear departed friend Mark Twain always had at his tongue's end.

"At one time, Twain and myself were walking over the golf course watching a friend's stroke. The friend was considerable of a duffer. Teeing off, he sent clouds of earth flying in all directions. This confused him to a considerable extent, and, turning toward us, he endeavored to draw our attention by asking:

"'Well, gentlemen, what do you think of our links here?'

"'Well,' replied Mark Twain, quickly, as he wiped the dirt from his lips with his handkerchief, I should say they were the best I ever tasted.'"

Restricted Range

Marie, supple and slender, and Aunt Clara, bulky and benign, had returned from a shopping expedition, during which each had been trying to buy a ready-made suit.

At the house Marie was asked what success each had had in her efforts to be fitted.

"I got along very well," said Marie, "but Aunt Clara is getting so fat that about all she can get ready-made is an umbrella."—N. Y. Times.

Synonymous

A polite and elderly and absent-minded man whose wife was both talkative and high-tempered, and who had just installed a hot-air furnace in his home, was accosted by a neighbor woman:

"How is the hot air, Mr. Jones?"

"She is very well, I thank you, ma'am," said Mr. Jones.—Life.

Her Own Affair

A story illustrating the reticence of the Scotch regarding their private affairs was told by Ian Maclaren. A train was at a railway station, when a porter put his head into a carriage and called out: "Any one in this carriage for Doun? Change for Doun! Any one for Doun?" No one moved; and in a few minutes the train was speeding along, not to stop again for nearly an hour. Then an old Scotch woman turned to a lady sitting near her and said, "I'm for Doun, but I'd no tell that man so!"

On a Slow Train

A Kansas man says this is one of the best ones he has heard recently:

"I was on a small western railroad. The train was a little more deliberate than usual on this occasion, and the only passenger besides myself was a woman, evidently a stranger on the line. She was becoming very nervous, fidgeting about, and every time the conductor or brakeman passed she would ask:

"'Aren't we ever going to get to W——?'

"At last the conductor grew tired of it, and replied rather snappily, 'Please have a little patience, madam. Why, I've been on this line three years——'

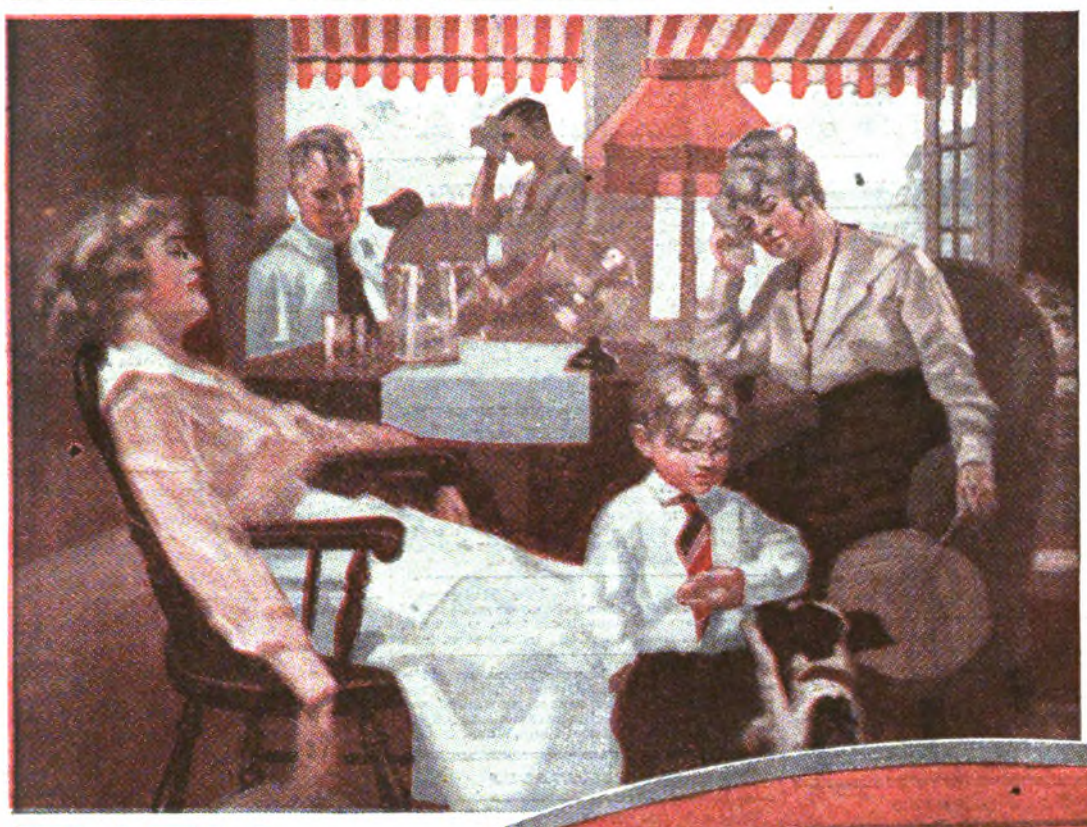
Before he could finish his sentence the woman exclaimed:

"'My gracious! What station did you get on at?'"

Boy Wanted

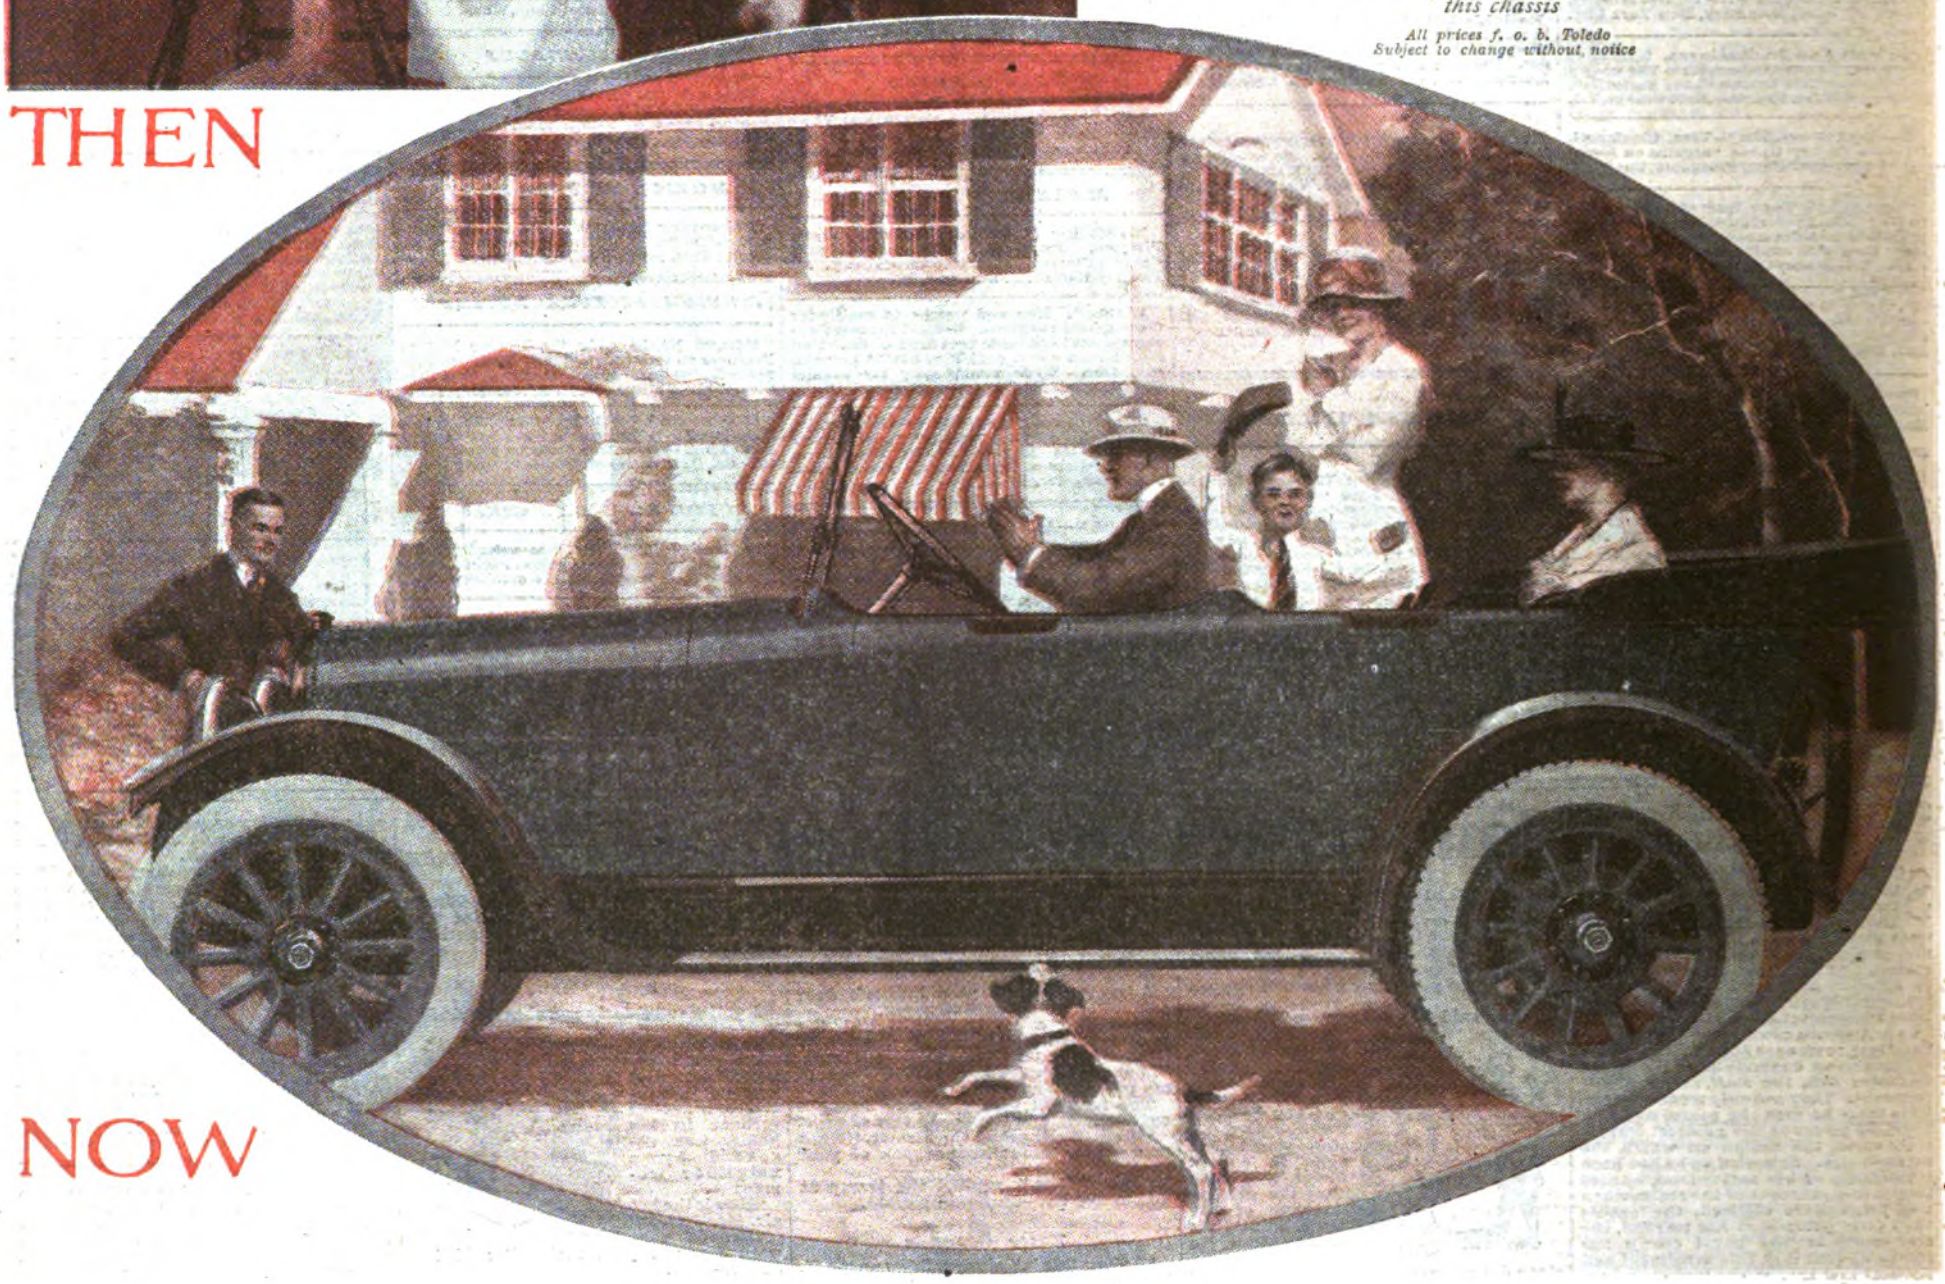
"Mr. Jones," said the boss, "I want you to put an ad. in the papers for an office boy with a hare-lip."

"With a hare-lip, sir?"



"Yes. I want one who can't whistle."

A New Swear Word



"Oh, war!" she suddenly cried.

"Why, war?" he queried.

"Well, I just turned on my ankle, and you know what war is."—Louisville Courier-Journal.

Then—a hot, sultry day was something to be endured, since it could not be cured.

Now—there is a cure

The motor car has turned the "cross" days into days of comfort for the whole family.

And here is a car—the new light weight Willys Six — which will gladden the hearts of the six-cylinder enthusiasts—and of the discriminating who have not yet found just the car they have wanted.

This announces a scientific development in Sixes.

Heretofore the great problem most manufacturers had to contend with was the all important factor of proper and perfect balance.

Either the car was too heavy and consequently underpowered, or else too light, and as a result overpowered.

In both cases this meant poor performance, costly upkeep and a short life.

So it is with considerable gratification that we announce what we believe to be one of the most scientifically balanced, popular priced Sixes on the market.

In a word, this means better performance, lower upkeep and longer life.

The motor is 45 horsepower. It is a wonder for work; quick as a flash on the getaway; speedy; surprisingly economical, and develops excess power for all purposes.

Scientific designing has done more.

For now, by scientific designing, in the light of our great experience in building sixes, we have produced a lighter car without sacrificing sturdiness.

Reduced weight means additional gasoline economy, greater tire mileage and an easier car to handle.

The body design also is new. Long, sweeping, graceful lines distinguish it as one of the year's advanced models. It's a perfect beauty.

Your wife will fall in love with it on sight. Don't let her see it until you have made up your mind to buy. For after one look she'll give you no peace until you do buy.

The Willys Six is the Six for you.

It has greater power; lighter weight; is unusually roomy, very economical and extremely handsome.

You'll be surprised at its wonderful performance, but its price will be even a greater surprise.

THOUGHTS THAT BREATHE AND WORDS THAT BURN

Alien Residents of the United States Should Be Required to Bear their Share of the War Burdens

WHY should the foreigners who have emigrated from their native lands to find better homes in America be exempt from the draft and privileged to stay at home and take the jobs vacated by our citizens that have been drafted to fight in defense of American institutions and American homes? That is the question which the fathers, mothers, sisters, wives and sweethearts of our conscripted soldier boys and the soldier boys themselves are asking, and they are resentful of the glaring injustice of this discrimination in favor of the large foreign element of our population.

Nearly ten million young men have been registered as subject to draft for military service under the so-called selective draft or conscription act adopted by Congress as the means of raising the great national army required for the present war. As this law requires every man between 21 and 31 years of age in the entire country, except those already enlisted in the army, navy or militia, to register, this registration includes a large number of unnaturalized foreign-born residents of the United States estimated at about one million. The country has been divided into small registration districts and each man registered therein has been assigned a number and all the numbers have been drawn by lot in the War Department at Washington. It is proposed to raise an army of at least a million men within a year, not all at once but as fast as they can be equipped and drilled. In response to each call for recruits every district must furnish its quota apportioned according to population, and the men will be called for service in the same order in which their respective numbers were drawn.

But not all who are called will have to go, for there are several causes for exemption, the most obvious of which is disqualifying physical deficiency. Besides certain Federal and State officials those employed in munition factories and in other trades and occupations essential to the successful prosecution of war will be exempt. It is also intended, as a matter of sound public policy, not to take those who have a wife, child or other near relative dependent on them for support, unless compelled to do so because of lack of material. Thus far all is fair and the exemptions are right and proper.

But there is a general and, as it seems to us, justifiable complaint and dissatisfaction because of the exemption of all unnaturalized foreign-born residents. Although included, to the number of about one million, in the registration and draft, when their numbers are called they will be excused from service and in every such case a citizen lower down the list will have to go in place of the alien slacker. That is as it must be under the terms of the present conscription act which works a great hardship, especially in those sections wherein the foreign-born constitute a large portion of the community. In many manufacturing districts the population consists largely of aliens and in some the foreign-born actually predominate.

The greater part of these exempted alien residents came from and still are citizens or subjects of countries that are at war with Germany, and if they had not emigrated they would have been drafted into the armies of their native countries which are our allies in this war. These are shirking a double obligation, for they owe military service to the land of their birth, to which they still claim allegiance, and are bound in honor and in duty, if not in law, to rally to the defense of the land in which they have sought asylum.

To remedy this injustice and force these recreants to serve the cause for which the country of their birth and the country of their home are fighting in the interest of humanity, Senator Chamberlain has introduced a bill requiring that they immediately apply for their first naturalization papers or be deported to their native land. If they apply for first citizenship papers here they will lose their alien exemption from our draft and will stand on the same footing as our citizens in regard to military service for Uncle Sam, and if they are deported for refusal the government of their native country, on their arrival, will surely send them to the front to fight the common enemy.

Fourteen millions of our population are foreign born and they are a menace to the country if they will not accept the obligations attendant on citizenship. Many of them have been naturalized, but far too many have not been and prefer to remain aliens with us but not of us. We want no immigrants who do not intend to become citizens as soon as possible. The Chamberlain bill would give them their choice of filing their intentions of citizenship or getting out of the country. It is a reasonable, fair and proper measure for the welfare of the country at all times, but in the present crisis the necessity for it is imperative and it should be adopted at once.

Congressman Fitzgerald, of Massachusetts in a recent interview said: "If married men with children are taken (under the draft) and thousands of aliens who are single are exempted there will be riots and troubles everywhere. Congress alone can decide whether these aliens shall escape service. Meanwhile the Chamberlain resolution is held up in the Senate and unless public opinion is crystallized with sufficient force to push Congress into early action, the first draft will have been completed with aliens exempted."

Government Will Control Food and Other Necessaries

ONE of the most vitally important war measures was the bill to establish government control of food and other necessaries of life and munitions of war, but not until August 8th, four months after the declaration of war, did Congress cease wrangling over details and consent to sanction it as the law of the land. The people had become righteously impatient and indignant at the unwarranted delay of our lawmakers, for meanwhile the interests that control the food, coal and oil products had improved the opportunity to pile up hundreds of millions of excess profits through extortionate prices.

By this food control legislation the President is now invested with almost unlimited power over the production, conservation, sale and distribution of foods, feeds, fuel, fuel oils, natural gas, fertilizer and its constituent ingredients, even to the seizure and government operation of mines, factories, milling and storage plants, in fact all manner of equipment requisite to the production of necessaries and munitions. The President is authorized to appoint a Food Administrator through whose agency much of this dictatorial power over foods and other necessaries will be executed, and it is no secret that Herbert C. Hoover is Mr. Wilson's choice for this new office of unprecedented power and responsibility.

The Food Control Law, in the interest of food conservation, prohibits the manufacture and importation of distilled liquors for beverage purposes during the war and authorizes the President to suspend or limit the manufacture of malt liquors and wines, and to take over any and all distilled liquors in bond when necessary for military or other public defense purposes. Power is given to regulate the price of coal and coke, and as inducement to the farmers to raise as much wheat as possible the government guarantees a minimum price of not less than two dollars per bushel for next year's wheat crop.

We think that Congress should have guaranteed minimum prices for all the other cereals and for beans and other important non-perishable farm products as well as for wheat. They are equally indispensable and their production should be encouraged by government guaranty of prices that will insure the producers a fair margin of profit regardless of over-production. Otherwise the farmers can not be blamed if they refuse to hazard unprofitably low prices resulting from large production and accordingly plant sparingly The outcome might be such short crops and high prices as would be distressing or even calamitous. This partiality in favor of wheat is contrary to the policy which we have urged, and it seems unfair as well as short-sighted.

Our government is urging the American people to curtail their consumption of wheat flour to the lowest possible limit by substituting corn, oats and other cereals in order to conserve a larger surplus of wheat to feed the armies of our allies and the people of France and England who, as it is claimed, demand white bread and will eat no other kind, though it would be better for them if they would vary their diet with a liberal admixture of other cereals and dried peas and beans, and surely it will not hurt us to do so. Peas and beans are more nourishing than any grain and, because of their large nitrogen content, take the place of meat as a muscle builder As the wheat producing area is limited it seems equally essential to encourage larger production of these substitutes.

U. S. Senate Votes in Favor of Prohibition Amendment

THE temperance people are much encouraged by the apparent sentiment of the present Congress in favor of nation-wide prohibition as manifested on two recent occasions. On the first of August the Senate, by a vote of 65 to 20, adopted the resolution submitting to the States for ratification the proposed constitutional amendment prohibiting the manufacture, sale and transportation of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes within, and the importation thereof into and the exportation from the United States and all places subject to the jurisdiction of the Federal Government. The resolution received more votes than its friends expected, eight more than the two-thirds majority required to give it a passage.

The resolution has gone to the House where it is confidently expected to pass by a still larger majority. After which its fate will depend on the action of the State legislatures. If approved within six years by a majority vote of the legislatures of three-fourths of the States it will become a part of the Constitution of the United States and as such the supreme law throughout all Uncle Sam's vast dominions. It then becomes the duty of Congress to provide the proper means for its enforcement.

Meanwhile, as previously stated, we now have nation-wide prohibition of the manufacture and importation of distilled liquors by the terms of the Food Control Law which also gives the President power to limit or suspend the manufacture of malt liquors and wines during the war. The indications are that President Wilson is inclined not to exercise this discretionary power, but he might change his mind on receiving letters and petitions from those who are in favor of closing the breweries and wineries during the war. As it seems morally certain that the prohibitory amendment will pass the House and go to the State legislatures, it is high time for the friends of temperance to get after the members of the legislatures of their respective States and see that they vote right on this momentous question. The liquor interests undoubtedly will have an influential lobby at work in their behalf and unless the people wake up and exert their influence on the members to promote this great cause it is likely to be lost. Now is the favorable opportunity and the prospect of attaining nation-wide prohibition never before was so good. Don't neglect it. Get in your work at once and keep on working until the victory is won.

Once to Every Man

by Maud Mary Brown

On her knees beside it was a woman who did not glance up at his approach.

"Oh, it was very simple once I thought of it. There is a coping, oh, quite a wide coping"

Diana withdrew her hand but she returned his friendly smile.

He placed a disciplinary hand across his heavy purple lips.

DOCTOR MURRAY COIT sat huddled forward in his great chair, elbows on knees, the long, capable fingers of his sagging hands loosely interlocked.

Removing a pipe from between his strong teeth, Coit's eyes wandered about the room from the cheerful fire on the hearth to the glint of tile and porcelain and nickel of his private bath, partially disclosed through a half-open door.

"Six months ago," he remarked to his pipe, "if a man had told me that today I could command all this without first having robbed a trust fund, I'd have called him an infernal liar."

However, judging from the frown between Coit's steady eyes and the discontented lines about his mouth, his altered circumstances gave him scant satisfaction.

"Curse luxury!" he ripped out. "Curse women! Curse——!"

His anathema was cut short by the sudden shrilling of his telephone and without pausing to speculate as to who might be calling him, a stranger in this neck of the northern New York woods, he yanked the receiver off its hook, his eyes already brightening at the battle cry.

"Well?" he snapped professionally.

"Is this Doctor Coit?" came a voice which, in spite of some emotion, was singularly flute-like.

"They connected me without waiting for your permission," the voice went on instantly. "Can you come at once to Whispering Pines, Doctor Coit? I need you; there isn't another doctor within five miles. Mrs. Strickland is speaking."

"But Mrs. Strickland," Coit began to refuse. "I am not——" but a sound slipped over the wire which caused him to revoke his hasty decision.

"I'll come instantly," he promised, and in another moment he was struggling into his great coat, for the late October night had turned cold.

"I guess there's the devil to pay at Strickland's place," the night clerk of the Pierrepont offered as Coit paused at the desk. "The madam made me connect you without waiting for formalities. I hope you don't——"

"I want to requisition a car," the doctor broke in.

"Well, I've a flivver outside," replied the clerk half-sulkily, and before he had quite finished his sentence, Doctor Coit was disappearing through the door.

"Plumb mad!" reflected the clerk; "or else, like I said, there's the devil to pay at Whispering Pines. If he smashes my toy, he'll have to make it good." And he went back to his illustrated paper.

Doctor Coit knew where Whispering Pines was. Only that afternoon he had passed the mossy stone columns that guarded the entrance to the spacious grounds.

During the forty-eight hours of what he termed his incarceration, the doctor had mingled very little with the guests still lingering at the Pierrepont, but he had overheard a little foyer gossip, a few unguarded hints about Strickland.

He was rich and debased and invalided—so much he had gathered—and Coit felt the provocative prick of adventure as he tooled over the smooth road with the clammy, mist-laden wind from the lake strong in his face.

The house loomed up grim and forbidding as he approached it. A solitary light glowed below, but otherwise the front of the house was in darkness.

He sprang out of the car and, bounding up the steps, he entered without pausing to ring and, guided by intermittent, inarticulate sounds, he dashed up the stairs.

The sudden rush of light as he entered a room blinded his eyes for a moment, but he discerned on the floor a huddled, formless mass, and on her knees beside it was a woman who did not glance up at his approach.

"I heard the car; I am so glad you came." It was the same musical voice that he had heard over the wire, but now it was rather breathless.

"Let me do that," Doctor Coit fell to his knees beside Mrs. Strickland who was ineffectually trying to loose the collar about the swelling neck of the man on the floor.

She made way for the doctor. "I am so glad you came," she repeated, drawing in her breath sharply.

"Why, of course I came," Coit returned cheerfully.

"I could not unfasten his collar." She picked up a tiny pair of scissors from the floor. "I was afraid to use these," she added wearily.

Coit was busy easing the clothing from the gross and writhing body of Strickland; presently the woman, on the floor beside him still, dried with her delicate handkerchief the red-flecked foam from the swollen, slavering lips.

Once or of the long braids of her heavy hair fell over her shoulder, interfering with the work of Coit's hands and he gently replaced it. Once, during a violent convulsion, Strickland's clutching hands tore at the peignoir which she had slipped on over her night robe, and Coit, loosening their hold, had a glimpse of a dazzling shoulder and bosom.

But these things made no impression on his objective mind. He was too busy with the agitated, tortured body of the man whose staring, reddened eyes were set in a too-fat face, whose breath came laboriously and with fearful sounds.

"There must be nitrite of amyl. Look, please. And then I think you would better go. This is no place for you."

After groping in the medicine closet of the adjoining bath, Mrs. Strickland brought Coit a vial.

"I am going to stay," she said with decision. "I may be of use later."

In a few minutes Strickland's convulsions became less violent and the two managed to get his bulky form on his bed.

"How does it happen," Coit began then, "that you are here alone with a man accustomed to attacks like that?"

"Why, it hasn't happened before for a long time," she explained simply. "You see, I gave the servants permission to go to a dance at the pavilion across the lake and after they had left my husband's attendant became disaffected and left."

Coit's muscles tensed and his voice was like the whistle of a blade as he said, "I should like a few words with that man."

"My husband became enraged; I suppose it was that that brought on the attack."

Coit's eyes traveled to a stand whereon stood an empty decanter and he thought that there might have been contributory reasons.

"I could not get to him at once," she went on. "He had locked himself into this suite."

"Then how——?"

"Oh, it was very simple once I thought of it. There is a coping, oh, quite a wide coping," she disparaged under Coit's searching eyes, "between my balcony and that window."

"You did that!"

"Why, it was nothing, Doctor Coit. As a child I could cling to a wall like a fly."

She attempted a smile but weariness filched it and forced her lips to quiver instead. She shivered slightly and, flushing, she drew her peignoir closer about her shoulders.

"You positively must go to your room and rest now," Coit decreed. "See, your husband is quite quiet. I shall stay the rest of the night."

"You are very kind but I think I can manage alone now."

"Run along, please, Mrs. Strickland. And remember that you are not to be left like this again, ever. If you will tell me where to find it, I will get you a glass of sherry before you go. It will brace you no end."

She shook her head. "Thank you, though, for thinking of it. If you should need me, will you ring this bell? I repeat that you are very, very kind. I know that you did not wish to come here—that you did it to help a woman in need and—I thank you."

Impulsively she stretched out her hand and Coit, standing by the open door, held it for an instant in his hearty grasp.

For more than two hours Coit did not leave Strickland's room. He had succeeded in getting him into pajamas and beneath the covers where he lay, breathing heavily. To Coit's trained eye it was not difficult to see that debauchery had brought him to this.

Several times he went to the open window and drew aside the bellying curtain while he peered at the narrow ledge along which Mrs. Strickland had taken her dangerous way.

He remembered lifting the braid of her dark hair, recalled the heaviness of it, and he felt a tingle along his arm like a mild electric shock. He remembered the grasp of her firm hand—remembered her on her knees, drying her husband's repulsive mouth. That recollection was abhorrent.

He went back to the bed and stood looking down at the unconscious man. "You low-lived hedonist!" he cried sharply.

"Tomorrow," he added, turning away, "I mean to make it my business to see if there isn't some one who should be standing by, and if there isn't, so help me Jehovah, I will!"

He went out into the hall which bisected the great house above stairs and almost stumbled over Diana Strickland before he saw her.

She was curled up in a deep chair, asleep, her brown hair wound about her head, coronet fashion, her vivid lips drooped slightly at the corners, like a child's when it has been wantonly hurt.

One white arm hung inert, and where the lace of her robe fell away, Coit saw the disfiguring, purpling marks of brutish fingers.

He remembered Strickland having clutched her in one of his spasmodic furies. The surge of anger at the sight of the marks surprised him.

While they had been busy together the doctor had mentally charted Diana as in her early thirties, pretty, plucky. He revised that chart now. She could not be, he felt certain, more than twenty-five; she was beautiful beyond any woman he had ever seen and her pluck had taken on the aspect of heroism.

He thought of another woman who had scurried from him like a scared rabbit to its warren at the mere hint of physical danger, and his lips curled. It was almost the last thought he vouchsafed that woman.

Coit thought that the woman in the deep chair looked too virginal to be the wife of the beast on the other side of the door and without knowing that her name was Diana, he called her by the name of her Greek prototype.

"Artemis!" he breathed softly. "A goddess, untouched by love."

Either his voice or the steadfastness of his gaze warned Diana of his presence for she stirred and opened her dark-fringed gray eyes.

Their glances met and locked and between them was generated that sweetly mysterious current of sex.

"Didn't I tell you to go to bed? Is this the way you obey orders?"

"I could not, Doctor Coit; it seemed too selfish."

"That is absolute nonsense, you know. What are doctors for?" He held up one of her tremulous hands. "See? You are unstrung, and small wonder. Bed is the place for you."

He smiled down at her, her hand still in his.

"You need not be afraid of my going to pieces on your hands."

"That doesn't worry me at all; you are not that kind."

Diana withdrew her hand but she returned his friendly smile.

"I have set out a bit of lunch in the library. Please come down and drink a glass of wine before you go."

"But I don't propose to go, my friend; at least not until the servants come. However, I shall be glad to see that you have something to brace you up."

It was dawn before Coit was again in his room at the Pierrepont, and throwing himself on his bed, he slept far into the morning.

Murray Coit, in spite of the handicap of poverty, had been the idol of his college in his undergraduate days. His personality no less than his athletic prowess was accountable for that.

It was later when he was in professional school, that he met pretty, bird-like Frances Fuller, and notwithstanding the fretful opposition of a mother harassed from meeting the outrageous bills of an extravagant daughter, they became engaged.

The engagement transformed Coit, already a tireless worker, into a veritable dynamo of energy, and to gain a year he doubled his work. He had visions of opening an office in New York directly after receiving his degree, depending for a clientele upon the friends of his undergraduate days, but reflection showed him that, however loyal they might be, they would not relish risking their lives or those of their families to his inexperienced hands.

And so, although Frances pouted and widened the circle about her to admit a rich and rather decadent youth to play against him, Coit, when autumn came, availed himself of an opportunity to enter one of the big hospitals as interne.

That was not a pleasant year for Murray Coit, His work, to be sure, was absorbingly fascinating, but Frances' attitude was disquieting and her mother was becoming openly impatient to be rid of her.

Even at the end of the year Coit saw no prospect of immediately being able to support a wife like Frances, and the fact caused him many a sleepless night. Besides, he was tired—unutterably tired. He attributed that to the furnace-like heat of the summer through which the city had just passed.

It was near the middle of October when Coit suddenly was called upon to assist the city's most distinguished laparotomist. In the ordinary course of events this never would have occurred, but the house surgeon had been called out of town and Coit was shoved into his place by the fussy little busybody, Chance.

It was a long and serious operation and Coit, cool and level-headed, cannily interpreted Doctor Roberts' mental processes, anticipated his wishes almost before he was conscious of them himself.

The gray-haired surgeon seemed not to notice the younger man, but when they were getting out of their enveloping white garments after it was over, he turned abruptly to Coit.

"Come to my office tomorrow at three," he said.

That was all, but when he was alone, Coit lost no time in getting Frances on the wire.

"I may have good news for you tomorrow, girl," he said.

"Well," came crisply from Frances, "if you ask me, it is about time. What is it?"

"Nothing," Coit shortly returned.

"Well, don't come up tonight. Sidney King is taking me out. If there is any good news tomorrow and you are over sulking, for goodness' sake, let me know."

Having shifted her ill-temper to Coit's shoulders, she rang off and made ready to spend the evening with young King.

Coit was at Doctor Roberts' office promptly at three on the following day.

"Doctor Coit?" a pleasant-faced nurse asked with a ready smile; "Doctor Roberts is expecting you. This way, please."

Doctor Roberts wasted no time. "Coit," he began, "for five years I have been looking for a young man to take in with me and eventually to succeed me. I watched you yesterday. I liked the architecture of your jaw; I liked your strong, slender, sensitive fingers. Later, I liked the way they coordinated with your brain."

He was giving the younger man no opportunity to speak and it gave him a sense of awkward immaturity. Also, his throat was swelling curiously, and that ghastly shroud of weariness was settling upon him.

"I have looked up your record today. When can you make arrangements to come to me?"

"When my present contract expires, Doctor Roberts."

It seemed a stupid and inadequate acceptance of a proposition so fraught with possibilities; but it seemed to be all that he could manage.

The older man gave him a keen glance. "Coit," he boomed, "you are not fit. Go into that room and strip. I will join you in a moment."

A half-hour later they were back in their chairs.

"Now, no worrying, Coit; just follow instructions and there will be no danger. I know your type, man; you work too hard and you play too hard. You haven't given nature a square deal. Your lungs are weakened, nothing more. Rest will restore you; the lack of it * * * *"

He felt an odd sympathy for the stricken-faced man before him.

"The profession—I may say Nature itself—has no place for the weakling. You've got to get strong, Coit. I want you to make tracks upstate to a place I know."

"But," Coit began to expostulate.

"Money?"

"Not that."

It has been the thought of money, however, but instantly he had remembered the precious books and instruments that he had managed to buy that year. He had felt guilty at every purchase, for they had been the price of some pleasure which Frances craved. Now he must sell them.

"Not money," he resumed; "I was expecting to be married, Doctor Roberts."

The older man tapped his desk briskly with his pince nez. "Lovely and perpetual woman," he grumbled. "Well, if she's the right sort, Coit, she will wait; if she isn't, you would do well to thank God to be rid of her at this stage in your career. A doctor's wife, with her pettiness, can tear down all the skill that the Lord and hard labor have given him. I will have a contract ready for your signature tomorrow. You see, I mean to make sure of you before you go. Stop in the other office and ask Miss Ward for folders concerning the Pierrepont. Get out of the city as soon as possible. You are to play for a year. Come back tomorrow at this hour. Good afternoon."

Once in the street, Coit walked aimlessly for many blocks. Later, he went up to Frances.

"For a vender of good news, you don't look over cheerful," was her comment.

When Coit told her she shrank from him, affrightened. "Oh, Murray! You know how I hate the thought of disease. Mother says I am totally unfit for a doctor's wife. Perhaps she is right."

"I understand, Frances; I came up to release you."

"I'm sorry," she whimpered, "but I expect I'd better accept the release."

Like a sleep-walker, Coit went back to the hospital. Not even a letter which he found from a solicitor, requesting him to call the next day, was a sufficient stimulant to his interest.

However, he went to see the lawyer on the following day. He learned through him that his Uncle Timothy, the odd, churlish member of his family, had died in Montana after having had no intercourse with his family for years, and had left him his money.

"We haven't the full particulars at this time," the solicitor told Coit ponderously, "but we feel justified in allowing you to draw on us for twenty-five thousand dollars."

It was too much for Coit, and he went into the street murmuring: "Poor, mythical Uncle Tim!"

His first coherent thought was that it would now be unnecessary to sell his instruments. Later he thought of Frances. With a twisted smile he wondered if money would not be a sufficient disinfectant for the germs she feared. He decided not to communicate with her.

In his room at the Pierrepont, he had been going over, one by one, all of the incidents of the past dizzy month when Diana Strickland's call to arms roused him from his revery.

* * * * * * * * * *

Refreshed from his sleep and a shower bath, Coit dressed, and having lunched, he made his way once more to Whispering Pines.

Strickland's servant had succeeded in making him presentable and his huge bulk was settled in a chair by the fire in his room. In spite of eyes dwarfed by encircling cushions of flesh, pendulous jowls, and a mouth indexing dissipation, Strickland nevertheless managed to look the thoroughbred.

There was an elusive expression, a gleam of the eye, a suggestion of charm, that led Coit back by a long route to the man Strickland must have been before indulgence had sent him headlong to destruction.

"How do you do, Doctor Coit," greeted Strickland, advancing a fat hand. "Mrs. Strickland tells me that you miraculously came to her assistance last night."

"There was no miracle about it, Strickland, and I was very glad to be of service."

Strickland nodded. "We'll let it pass at that, if you like. I am not often unattended but my

This Department is conducted solely for the use of COMFORT sisters, whereby they may give expression to their ideas relative to the home and home surroundings, and to all matters pertaining to themselves and families; as well as opening a way for personal correspondence between each other.

Our object is to extend a helping hand to COMFORT subscribers; to become coworkers with all who seek friendship, encouragement, sympathy or assistance through the interchange of ideas.

Any abuse of this privilege, such as inviting correspondence for the purpose of offering an article for sale, or undertaking to charge a sum of money for ideas, recipes or information mentioned in any letter appearing in this department, if reported, will result in the offender being denied the use of these columns.

Do not ask us to publish letters requesting money contributions or donations of any sort. Much as we sympathize with the suffering and unfortunate, it is impossible to do this as we would be flooded with similar requests.

Do not request souvenir postals unless you have complied with the conditions which entitles you to such a notice. See postal request notice in another column.

We cordially invite mothers and daughters of all ages to write to COMFORT Sisters' Corner. Every letter will be carefully read and considered, and then the most helpful ones chosen for publication, whether the writer be an old or new subscriber.

Please write only on one side of the paper, and recipes on a separate sheet.

Always give your correct and full name and address, very plainly written; otherwise your letter will receive no attention.

Address all letters for this department to MRS. WHEELER WILKINSON, CARE COMFORT, AUGUSTA, MAINE.

TWO letters this month bring us face to face with a national problem and once more, "lest we forget," our attention is called to the need of supplies for our soldier and sailor boys. Even if we cannot knit, the majority of us are blessed with ordinary human intelligence so we can easily learn and we will never regret the time given to the knitting of sweaters, socks, etc., when we realize that perhaps that very sweater or pair of socks will protect our boy, or brother, from the cold. And the very fact that we are at home working, watching and praying for him will make him a better soldier and take away from the loneliness of the days and nights away from home. Utilize every moment, have your knitting, or other form of work, at hand ready to pick up during odd moments and the result will be favorably surprising. The loss of half an hour's sleep in the morning isn't so very much of a sacrifice to make, is it, when they are doing so much for us?

Consult with your nearest Red Cross office for definite information as to their needs and follow their instructions.

Instead of an idle social afternoon when you have callers, set them to work on comfort bags for the soldiers, or making pillows of cretonne, to be used in hospitals. They will enjoy their call quite as much and depart in a happier frame of mind than when they arrived, for it is only by helping others do we make ourselves happy. Let's all do our share.—Ed.

WEST VIRGINIA.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I like COMFORT but I cannot agree with Country Jake about country life. I live in a mining town in W. Va., and my John is a dear, good, patient locomotive engineer. He was raised on a farm until he was seventeen, as he was left an orphan at the age of six years.

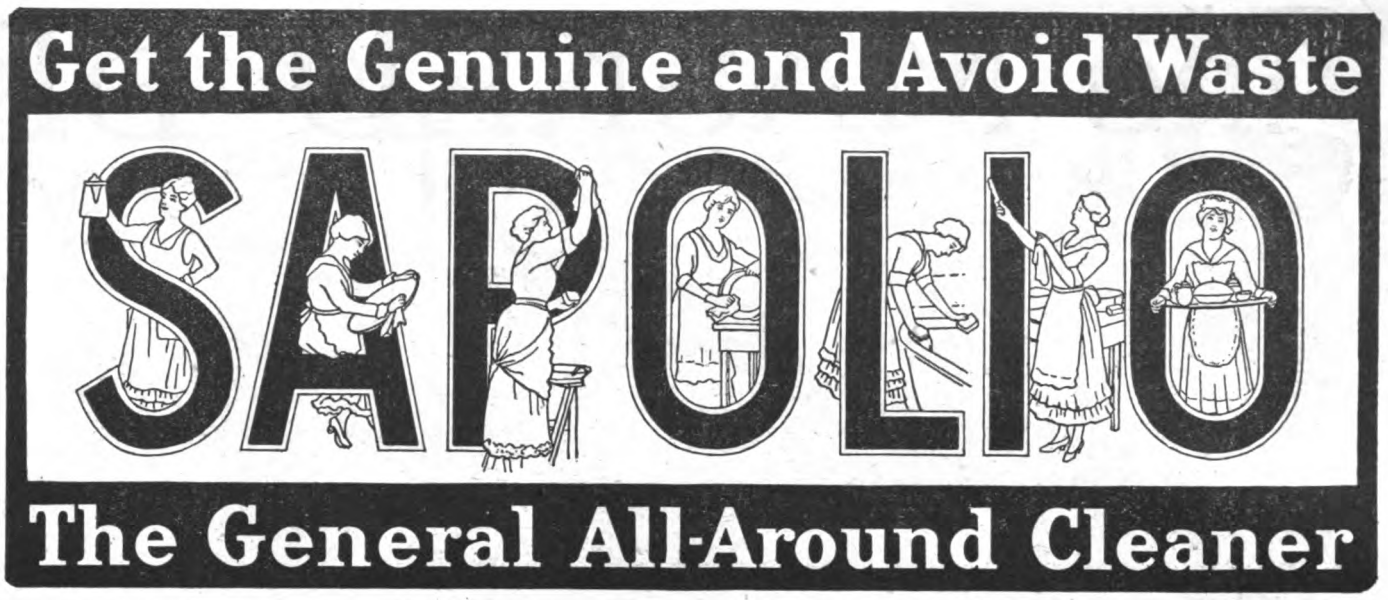
Here is some of your farmer kindness. He was made to work from four o'clock in the morning till eight at night and to this day he has the scars on his feet where he froze them, working without enough clothes to keep warm, in order to bring in the dollar for the farmer. He never saw anything but hard work till he was seventeen years of age. Then some of his city cousins came to see him and he wanted a horse to take them to see other friends, but no, the horse had worked too hard the day before and he couldn't have it. He then decided to leave the farm and come to the city and work at public works. He even had to borrow money enough for working clothes. Think of it, and he was seventeen years old. The country people then saw their mistake and wanted him to come back and stay till he was twenty-one. Then they would give him a horse and saddle. What a bargain!

Here is some more farmer kindness. Last winter a farmer girl of about fifteen years of age, came to my house. She is not very bright. Her farmer brother gave her a pair of his wornout shoes and she had to walk fourteen miles in these. I took her in and gave her a pair of shoes and stockings. Just because she is not bright enough to work and bring in the dollar they have no time for her.

I lived on a farm for three years when small but have visited there many times since and I find the farmers have their faults as well as city folks. I will mention a few out of many.

Did you, Mrs. Country Jake, ever stop to think that one half our boys and girls that go to the bad are overworked farmer children? They leave and come to the city where, without parents to guide them, they go wrong. Do you know too, that a number of our drunkards start at the old hard cider barrel and wine jug at the farm? The farmers' subject is mostly the dollar. They never think of their children's pleasure but only how the child can make a dollar.

Did you ever stop to think that the farmers help to make the city people poor. When our parents and grandparents lived on farms with nothing more than a plow and hoe to work with, they could sell eggs at twenty cents a dozen, butter twenty cents a pound and potatoes at fifty cents a bushel. Look what the farmers charge now when they can do as much in one day as their grandparents could do in a week. The working man has to get along with his days' wages the same as ever.



I do not know about Georgie's city friends but wait, Mrs. Country Jake, till I tell you about mine. I was married when eighteen and a year later was in a Philadelphia hospital for six weeks, a perfect stranger, but if you had visited me there you would have thought I had lived there for years, to see the flowers, books and dainties I received from strangers. You think that city folks never did a kind act like helping a neighbor when they were burned out. You surely do not get off your farm very often. I could write for days and tell you of kind deeds city folks have done. I know a lady of my own home town who was very sick and could not get well without an operation and people she had never seen before, took up a collection and sent her to the hospital.

No, I never heard of a family being quarantined in the country because they live so far apart that it is not necessary. I was visiting farmer friends in Pennsylvania last June and had to shorten my visit on account of so much diphtheria. And in the fall I visited farmer friends in Maryland and far and near there were two and three in a family down at a time with typhoid, but they were not hurt with help for the farmers were afraid.

If George's city friends do not come and wait on her when she is ill there must be something wrong somewhere, for mine help me in every way they can. Of course they do not have the opportunity to give fresh meat for they, like myself, never have a large supply and all because the farmers charge such a price.

It is true that the farmers raise the wheat and all of our food, but I fear Mrs. Country Jake would find that if it were not for the city folks she would not have gas, fuel, lights, hot water system and bath tubs. Neither would she have automobiles and finery. I have some farmer friends I love as well as my city

Comfort Sisters' Recipes

TO our older readers the magic words "parin' bee" will bring a vision of a moonlit autumn evening, a roomy kitchen and a host of laughing young people, busily engaged in paring and quartering apples and then threading them on a string, to be dried for winter use. And the doughnuts, pumpkin pie and coffee, furnished as a reward for work well done, were never equalled in later years by even the most palate tickling of French chefs. Perhaps the merry games indulged in by young and old, helped make the occasion one to be remembered and even our present efficient, but unsentimental, method of drying apples, and other fruits, cannot wholly take away from us the memory of other days.

With a shortage of glass jars facing us, it would seem that the only way to conserve the products of our gardens is by drying the surplus fruits and vegetables, by artificial heat, air blasts, as by an electric fan, or sun drying.

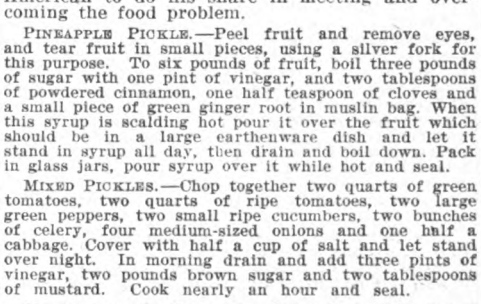
The U. S. Department of Agriculture, Washington, D. C., is putting out a very helpful booklet on home drying of fruits, which may be had for the asking and it is the duty of every loyal American to do his share in meeting and overcoming the food problem.

PINEAPPLE PICKLE.—Peel fruit and remove eyes, and tear fruit in small pieces, using a silver fork for this purpose. To six pounds of fruit, boil three pounds of sugar with one pint of vinegar, and two tablespoons of powdered cinnamon, one half teaspoon of cloves and a small piece of green ginger root in muslin bag. When this syrup is scalding hot pour it over the fruit which should be in a large earthenware dish and let it stand in syrup all day, then drain and boil down. Pack in glass jars, pour syrup over it while hot and seal.

MIXED PICKLES.—Chop together two quarts of green tomatoes, two quarts of ripe tomatoes, two large green peppers, two small ripe cucumbers, two bunches of celery, four medium-sized onions and one half a cabbage. Cover with half a cup of salt and let stand over night. In morning drain and add three pints of vinegar, two pounds brown sugar and two tablespoons of mustard. Cook nearly an hour and seal.

MIXED MUSTARD PICKLES.—One quart small cucumbers, one quart medium cucumbers, split lengthwise, one quart large cucumbers, sliced or cut in small pieces, one quart small onions, one quart small green tomatoes one quart cauliflower, broken in small pieces. Soak the above in salt water over night then drain and add one quart of string beans (that have been boiled in salt water twenty minutes), three cups of sugar and cover all with good vinegar. When it reaches the boiling point, add the following and boil for five minutes—one half cup flour, two ounces dry mustard and one heaping teaspoon tumeric powder, mixed with enough vinegar to make a paste. Seal as you would fruit.

MRS. G. J. SARGENT, Carkston, Wash.



CHILI SAUCE.—Scald and peel six ripe tomatoes and cook with two onions and one green pepper. To this add one half cup sugar, two thirds cup sharp vinegar, one teaspoon each allspice, nutmeg, cinnamon and cloves, and cook fifteen minutes.

TOMATO SAUCE.—Two quarts of ripe tomatoes, three quarters pound of onions, one quart of vinegar, one cup of sugar, and one teaspoon of cinnamon. Cook and strain the tomatoes. Chop the onions fine. Bring vinegar and sugar to boiling point and add onions and cinnamon and cook till onions are tender. Add tomatoes and cook fifteen minutes longer. Seal in jars.

TOMATO CATSUP.—Peel eighteen large, ripe tomatoes, add one large green pepper, one large onion, one cup brown sugar, two cups vinegar, one tablespoon salt. Cook two hours, then strain and seal.

MISS HILMA HANSON, Marshalltown, Iowa.

SPICED BEEF.—Six pounds of an inexpensive cut of beef, put into an earthern baking dish that will cover very tightly. Put in sufficient boiling water to come half way over the meat. Put into a moderately hot oven for half an hour and then reduce heat to a slow oven, and bake three or four hours. The meat must not "boil" in the oven. In a stewpan put one cup of sliced carrots, half a cup of sliced onion, two level teaspoons of salt, two tablespoons of tomato catchup, two whole cloves and half a saltspoon of pepper. Cover with boiling water and cook all together half an hour, and then add to beef one hour before it is taken from the oven. When done, remove beef from liquor, press into a bowl and serve hot or cold. Thicken the liquor with flour stirred up with a little cold water and simmer ten minutes. Serve as a gravy. If not used as a gravy, this liquor makes a delicious soup. Garnish with rings of vegetable or egg.

HODGE-PODGE.—Four quarts chopped green tomatoes, one quart chopped onions one small cup chopped green peppers, one small cup white mustard seeds. Cover the tomatoes with salt, using one small cupful, let stand over night, drain in morning and add other ingredients. Cover with cold vinegar, mix well, put in jars and seal. Do not cook. Let stand three or four weeks to ripen.

CANNED BEETS.—Cook beets till tender. Remove skins and put beets in glass jars and cover with water they were cooked in; fill jar to top. Seal hot and place in cool, dark place.

APPLE RELISH.—Put two pounds of seeded raisins, chopped fine, in preserving kettle and add seven pounds of chopped apples, peeled, juice of two oranges and chopped peel of one, three and one quarter pounds of sugar, one pint of vinegar and one teaspoon each of cloves and cinnamon. Boil steadily half an hour.

DILL PICKLES.—Use medium-sized cucumbers; let them stand in water over night. Next day wash them and pack them in wooden or stone vessels, one layer of pickles and a handful of dill on top, and so on till jar or barrel is filled. Make a brine of salt in water that will float an egg and pour over the cucumbers then top it with more dill and grapevine leaves. Weight them down with a stone or iron. They will be ready to eat in twelve or fourteen days.

FRITZIE KLICK, San Antonio, Texas.

DILL PICKLES.—To one bushel of pickles add four pounds salt, one and one half pints vinegar, three quarters of a pint of spices, consisting of equal parts whole allspice and whole mustard seed and whole cloves. Pack tightly in keg or jar and cover with fresh water, after putting in two and one half pounds dill weed, which has been soaked in vinegar three or four days before using. Use same vinegar in pickles, with heavy weight to keep pickles under liquid.

MRS. ANNA SHULTZ, Wasepi, Mich.

(She says her husband made pickles for the H. J. Heinz Co. for eight years.)

SWEETBREADS.—Not very far back sweetbreads were considered worthless and thrown away, but little by little they have grown in favor until the demand is greater than the supply, and nowadays they are a luxury. Veal sweetbreads are considered the best. They are two glands lying in the breast and along the back of the throat. The heart sweetbread is round and compact; the throat sweetbread long and narrow, and numerous membranes divide it into sections. It is in two parts held together by tubes and membrane. Sweetbreads spoil very quickly and should be covered with ice water until ready to cook. In whatever form they are used they should first be parboiled. Drain off the water, cover with salted boiling water, add one tablespoon of lemon juice or vinegar, and if more seasoning is desired, add three whole cloves and a small piece of onion. Cook twenty minutes, remove and plunge in ice water to harden. Remove large membranes.

BROILED.—Rub with pepper, salt and butter and broil ten to fifteen minutes, taking care not to burn. Serve with tomato sauce.

FRIED.—Roll in fine bread crumbs, beaten egg and crumbs again. Fry in deep fat, or in a little pork fat until brown. Another delicious way is to fry a few slices of bacon, and the sweetbreads in the bacon fat, serving the bacon on top of sweetbreads. Garnish with peas.

SCALLOPED.—Make a rich white sauce, adding the yolks of two eggs. Break the sweetbreads and mix with sauce in a pudding dish and cover with buttered crumbs. Bake in hot oven until brown.

CROQUETTES.—Cut the sweetbreads fine—do not chop. Add one cup of warm boiled rice. Season according to taste. Mix in sufficient hot cream or white sauce to handle. Roll in crumbs, egg and crumbs again, and fry in deep fat. Chicken, calves brains and veal combine well with sweetbreads in croquettes.

WATERMELON PICKLE.—Cut four pounds of watermelon rind in small pieces, place in preserving kettle and cover with boiling water and let simmer gently till tender. This takes from two to three hours. When done have ready a syrup made of two pounds of sugar, one pint of vinegar three quarters tablespoon of cinnamon and allspice and one tablespoon of cloves. Put cinnamon and allspice in muslin bag. Mix watermelon and syrup.

PEAR CONSERVE.—Cut three pounds of pears in small pieces, cover with two and one half pounds sugar and let stand over night. In the morning add one half pound raisins, rind of one orange and juice of two oranges and one lemon. Boil slowly till thick and just before taking from fire add one cup of finely chopped walnut meats.

GREEN SWEET TOMATO PICKLES.—Slice eight pounds green tomatoes, add four pounds sugar which has first been melted to a syrup; cook slowly three hours watching closely to prevent scorching. After three hours add one quart strong vinegar, one tablespoon each of cinnamon, allspice, cloves, all ground fine; boil all together fifteen minutes; let cool a while, pour into glass or stone jars and set away in dark, cool place.

RAW CHOW CHOW.—In the evening slice, mix together and salt down (to taste) in stone or granite vessel, four gallons green tomatoes, two gallons cabbage, one half gallon onions, one quart green peppers. Next morning drain off salt water; grind all through meat-chopper with clean vessel catching all juices; now to ground mass add and mix thoroughly one pint (brown) sugar, one half teacup ground mustard, one quarter teacup black pepper, two tablespoons horseradish (can be left out), one gallon of strong apple or cider vinegar; pack in glass or stone jars; when it krouts or ferments it will sink in vessel, watch closely and cover with vinegar and some sugar (to taste). This will keep indefinitely. To every quart of the juices saved add one and one half teacup vinegar, pour in bottles for future use, as a chow chow ketchup for the table, and for the following recipes:

GREEN PEPPER RELISH.—Grind green peppers through meat chopper, add liberally sprinkled mustard and salt, put in glass jars or big-mouthed bottles, pour the juice from chow chow over to fill retainers, or spiced vinegar made as follows:

SPICED VINEGAR.—Into a one half gallon fruit jar put one teaspoon each: Allspice, cloves, ginger, nutmeg (or tablespoon mace), tablespoon cinnamon; cover with vinegar, let stand a week before ready for use in sweet or sour pickles.

GERMAN MUSTARD.—Four tablespoons sugar, two tablespoons mustard, one tablespoon salt, four tablespoons melted butter one tablespoon, corn-starch; mix mustard, sugar, corn-starch, salt well together then add butter; put all in granite vessel to cook; shake bottle chow chow juice, add slowly while stirring two teacups full, let boil till done; if too thick add more juice to thin to consistency desired.

MAKING PICKLES FOR FAMILY USE.—Gather small watermelons (green), canteloupes, cucumbers, tender green beans, green peppers, cauliflower and small-sized onions, wash and slice to suit convenience; into granite vessel to hold quantity prepared, put water to cover with handful or more of salt and set on fire; scald the mixture until color changes. Into glass or stone jars put a bag of thin cloth with one half teaspoon each of ginger, allspice, cloves, cinnamon, celery seed and black pepper in bottom of retainer with teaspoon ground mustard; put the above scalded mixture of vegetables into jars while hot and cover with sufficient vinegar to pickle; will be ready to eat in thirty-six hours. If too sour add sugar and water to weaken acid.

LILLIE D. ELDREDGE, Chiricahua, Arizona.

CANNED BEANS.—String and cut beans in desired length. Sterilize jars and fill as full as possible, then overflow with cold water and cover with sterilized tops and place jars on trivet in large kettle or boiler filled with cold water. Let boil three hours. Fasten covers securely and let cool. Peas should be cooked nearly half an hour longer than beans.

HOME PREPARED MUSTARD.—Three tablespoons mustard, one tablespoon sugar, one half teaspoon of salt, one teaspoon of corn-starch or flour. Mix well and add one egg. Beat egg into dry ingredients until smooth. Then add one cup of vinegar and cook all until the consistency of cream and add butter the size of a walnut. MRS. CHESTER I. SIMMERS, Hildebrand, Oregon.

COCOANUT BREAD PUDDING.—Cut a small loaf of bread in one third inch slices. Spread with butter and cut in halves crosswise. Pack in a buttered dish, sprinkling each layer with shredded cocoanut, using two thirds cup in all. Beat three eggs slightly, one half cup sugar, one quarter teaspoon salt and one quart of milk. Strain over bread and cocoanut. Cover and let stand one hour. Bake in a slow oven nearly an hour, keeping covered just twenty minutes of cooking. Serve hot with cream sauce.

CREAM SAUCE.—Work one third cup butter until creamy and add one cup of powdered sugar gradually while stirring and beating constantly, then add two tablespoons of milk, drop by drop, until of very creamy consistency. Flavor with one teaspoon of vanilla.

APPLES WITH ORANGE SAUCE.—Core six tart apples, put in pudding dish with two cups of water, cover tightly and bake in slow oven until very soft. Remove apples, add one of sugar and cook to a thick syrup; add the juice of two oranges and the grated rind of one, and pour over apples. Put whipped cream on top when served.

RYE BREAD. (Requested.)—Four cups flour, two cups rye meal, one tablespoon sugar, one half teaspoon salt and one yeast cake. Mix as stiff as possible; no shortening; let rise over night; knead just enough to make smooth loaves in morning. This makes two good-sized loaves.

MRS. A. P.

POOR MAN'S DROP CAKES.—Two cups sugar, one heaping tablespoon lard, two and one half cups milk or water, pinch of salt, flavoring, two heaping teaspoons baking powder and flour enough to make a rather stiff batter. Cream sugar and lard, add milk and flavoring. Sift in flour, baking powder and salt. Bake in muffin tins. Nut meats, cocoanut, grated apples or raisins may be added. This makes a cake that will surprise you.

MRS. H. I. B., Los Angeles, Cal.

COCOANUT DROPS.—One cup grated cocoanut, whites of two eggs, beaten stiff, one half cup of sugar, two tablespoons of flour. Mix. Drop by spoonfuls on slightly buttered tin sheets and bake light brown.

The MASKED BRIDAL

By Mrs. Georgie Sheldon

She pushed him from her and rushed into her chamber.

"Oh, Anna! pray show me in some way that you will not die hating me," he pleaded.

"Do your worst! I do not fear you; you can prove nothing."

CHAPTER XXX.

"I HATE YOU WITH ALL THE STRENGTH OF MY ITALIAN BLOOD."

ISABEL STEWART felt that she could not bear the painful interview any longer, and was about to touch the electric button to summon her servant to show her visitor out.

"Go, Gerald," said Mrs. Stewart, in a low, but not unkindly imperative tone; "it is better that this interview should terminate. The past is past—nothing can change it; but the future will be what we make it. Go, and if I ever hear from you again, let me know that your present contrition has culminated in a better life."

She turned abruptly from him and disappeared within her chamber, quietly shutting the door after her, while Gerald Goddard arose to "go" as he had been bidden.

As, with tottering gait and a pale, despairing face, he crossed the room and parted the draperies between the two pretty parlors, he found himself suddenly confronted by a woman so wan and haggard that, for an instant, he failed to recognize her.

"Idiot!" hissed Anna Correlli, through her pallid, tightly-drawn lips; "traitor! coward! viper!"

She was forced to pause simply because she was exhausted from the venom which she had expended in the utterance of those four expletives.

Then she sank, weak and faint, upon a chair, but with her eyes glittering like points of flame, fastened in a look of malignant hatred upon the astonished man.

"Anna! how came you here?—how long have you been here?" he finally found voice to say.

"Long enough to learn of the contemptible perfidy and meanness of the man whom, for twenty years, I have trusted," she panted.

By a powerful effort, he mastered himself, for he was anxious to escape from the house before the presence of his wife should be discovered.

"Come, Anna," he said; "let us go home, where we can talk over this matter by ourselves, without the fear of being overheard."

He attempted to assist her to rise.

"Do not dare to touch me!" she cried, hoarsely. "Go—call a carriage; I am not able to walk. Go; I will follow you."

Without a word, he turned to obey her, and passed quickly out of the suite without encountering any one, she following, but with a gait so unsteady that any one watching her would have been tempted to believe her under the influence of some intoxicant.

Mr. Goddard found a carriage standing near the entrance to the hotel, and they were soon on their way home.

Upon entering their house, they found Emil Correlli in a state bordering on frenzy, occasioned by the escape of Edith, and this circumstance served for a few moments to distract their thoughts from their own troubles.

Mr. Goddard was intensely relieved by the intelligence, and plainly betrayed it in his manner.

When angrily called to account for it by his brother-in-law, he at once replied, with an air of reckless defiance:

"Yes, I am glad of it—I would even have helped the girl to get away; indeed, I was planning to do so, for such a dastardly fraud as you perpetrated upon her should never be allowed to prosper."

He was rewarded for this speech, so loyal to Edith, only by an angry oath, to which, however, he paid no attention.

Strangley enough, Anna Correlli, after the first emotion of surprise and dismay had passed, paid no heed to the exciting conversation; she had sunk into a chair by the window, where she sat pale and silent, and absolutely motionless, save for the wild restlessness of her fiery black eyes.

Mr. Goddard, finding the atmosphere so disagreeable, finally left the room, and, mounting the stairs, shut himself in his own chamber, while the enraged lover dashed out of the house to the nearest telegraph office to send the message that caused the policeman to intercept Edith upon her arrival in New York.

A few moments later, Mrs. Goddard—as we will, from courtesy, still call her—crept wearily up to her room, where, tottering to a couch, she threw herself prone upon her face, moaning and shivering with the agony she could no longer control.

The blow, which for twenty years she had been dreading, had fallen at last; but it was far more crushing and bitter than she had ever dreamed it could be.

An hour passed, during which she lay where she had fallen and almost benumbed by her misery.

Then there came a knock upon her door, which was immediately opened, and Mr. Goddard entered the room.

He was still very pale, but grave and self-contained.

The woman started to a sitting posture, exclaiming, in an unnatural voice:

"What do you want here?"

"I have come, Anna, to talk over with you the events of the morning—to ask you to try to control yourself, and look at our peculiar situation with calmness and practical common sense," he calmly replied.

"Well?" was all the response vouchsafed, as he paused an instant.

"I have not come to offer any excuses for myself, or for what you overheard this morning," he thoughtfully resumed; "indeed, I have none to offer—my whole life, I own has, as Isabel rightly said, been a failure thus far, and no one save myself is to blame for the fact. Do not sneer, Anna," he interposed, as her lips curled back from her dazzling teeth, which he saw were tightly locked with the effort she was making at self-control. "I have been thoroughly humiliated for the first time in my life—I have been made to see myself as I am, and I have reached a point where I am willing to make an effort to atone, as far as may be, for some of the wrongs of which I have been guilty. Will you help me, Anna?"

Again he paused, but this time his companion did not deign to avail herself of the opportunity to reply, if, indeed, she was able to do so.

"I have come to propose that we avail ourselves of the only remedy that seems practicable to relieve our peculiar situation," he continued. "I will apply to have the tie which binds me to Isabel annulled, with all possible secrecy—it can be done in the West without any notoriety; then I will make you my legal wife, as you have so often asked me to do, and we will go abroad again, where we will try to live out the remainder of our lives to some better purpose than we have done heretofore. I ask you again, will you try to help me? It is not going to be an easy thing at first; but if each will try, for the sake of the other, I believe we can yet attain comparative content, if not positive happiness."

"Happiness!" she repeated. "Ha! ha! What mockery in the sound of that word from your lips, after what has occurred today!"

"I know that you have cause to be both grieved and angry, Anna," said Gerald Goddard, humbly; "but let us both put the past behind us—let us wipe out all old scores, and from this day begin a new life."

"'Begin a new life' upon a heap of ashes, without one spark among them to ignite the smallest flame!" was the mocking rejoinder. Then, with a burst of agony, she continued: "Oh, God! if you had taken a dagger and stabbed me to death in that room today, you could not have slain me more effectually than by the words you have uttered. Begin a new life with you, after your confessions, your pleadings and protestations to Isabel Stewart. Heaven! Never! I hate you! hate you; hate you! with all the strength of my Italian blood, and warn you—beware! And now, begone!"

"Very well, Anna," he said, as he arose, "I will obey you. I do not pretend to claim that I have not given you cause to feel aggrieved in many respects; but, as I have already said, that is past. I simply ask you to do what I also will do—put all the old life behind us, and begin over again. I realize that we cannot discuss the question to any purpose now—we are both too wrought up to think or talk calmly, so I will leave you to rest, and we will speak of this at another time. Can I do anything for you before I go?—or perhaps you would like your maid sent to you?"

"No," she said, briefly, and not once having removed her wild eyes from his face while he was speaking.

He bowed, and passed out of the room, softly shutting the door after him, then walked slowly down the hall to his own apartment.

The moment he was gone Anna Goddard sprang like a cat to her feet.

Going to her writing-desk, she dashed off a few lines, which she hastily folded and slipped into an envelope, which she sealed and addressed.

She then touched the electric button above her desk to summon her maid, after which she sat motionless with the missive clasped in her hands until the girl appeared.

"Dress yourself for the street, Mary, and take this note to Mr. Clayton's office. Be quick about it, for it is a matter of importance," she commanded.

Mary took the note and hastened away upon her errand, while Mrs. Goddard, throwing herself back in her chair, sat there waiting with an air of expectation that betrayed she was looking for the appearance of some one.

Half an hour later a gentleman was admitted to the house, and was shown directly up to my lady's boudoir.

CHAPTER XXXI.

RECORDS SOME STARTLING DEVELOPMENTS.

The gentleman caller referred to in the last chapter was closeted with Mrs. Goddard for fully two hours, when he quietly left the house.

A few moments later, however, he returned, accompanied by two other men—clerks from a neighboring drug-store—whom he admitted with a latch-key, and then conducted them up to Mrs. Goddard's boudoir.

The strangers did not remain long; whatever their errand, it was soon finished, and they departed as silently as they had come.

Mr. Clayton remained some time longer, conversing with the mistress of the house, but their business being finally concluded, he also went away, bearing a package of papers with him.

Emil Correlli returned just in season for dinner, which, however, he was obliged to partake of alone, as Mr. and Mrs. Goddard did not make their appearance at the table.

The young man paid slight heed to ceremony, but after eating a hasty meal, sought his sister and informed her that he was going to start for New York on the late evening train.

The woman gave him one wild, startled glance, and seemed strangely agitated for a moment over his announcement.

He could not fail to notice her emotion, and that she was excessively pale.

"You look like a ghost, Anna," he remarked, as he searched her face with some anxiety. "What is the matter with you? I fear you are going to be ill."

"I am ill," she said, in a hoarse, unnatural tone.

"Then let me call your physician," said her brother, eagerly. "I am going out immediately, and will leave a message for him."

"No, no," she nervously replied; then with a hollow laugh that smote heavily upon her companion's heart, she added: "My case is beyond the reach of Dr. Hunt or any other physician."

"Anna, have you been quarreling with Gerald again?"

"Yes," was the brief response.

"Well, of course I can understand that such matters are beyond the skill of any physician," said the young man, "neither have I any business to interfere between you," he added; "but my advice would be to make it up as soon as possible, and then try to live peaceably in the future. I do not like to leave you looking so white and miserable, but I must go. Take good care of yourself, and I shall hope to find you better and happier when I return."

He bent down to give her a farewell caress, and was amazed by the passion she manifested in returning it.

She threw her arms around his neck and held him in a convulsive embrace while she quivered from head to foot with repressed emotion.

She did not utter one word of farewell, but a wild sob burst from her; then, as if she could bear no more, she pushed him from her and rushed into her chamber, shutting and locking the door behind her.

Emil Correlli left the boudoir, a puzzled expression on his handsome face.

"Anna will come to grief some day with that cursed temper of hers," he muttered, as he went to his room to pack his portmanteau, but he was too intent upon his own affairs to dwell long upon even the trouble of his sister, and a couple of hours later was on his way to New York to begin his search for his runaway bride.

The next morning Mrs. Goddard was "too ill to rise," she told her maid, when she came at the usual hour to her door. She would not admit her, but sent word to her husband that she could not join him at breakfast.

He went up later to see if she would allow him to call a physician for her; but she would not see him, simply telling him she "would do well enough without advice—all she needed was rest, and she did not wish to be disturbed by any one until she rang."

Feeling deeply disappointed and depressed by her unusual obstinacy, the wretched man went down-stairs and shut himself into the library, where he remained all day, while there was such an atmosphere of loneliness and desolation about the house that even the servants appeared to feel it, and went about with solemn faces and almost stealthy steps.

Could any one have looked behind those closed doors he could not have failed to have experienced a feeling of pity for the man; for if ever a human being went down into the valley of humiliation, Gerald Goddard sounded its uttermost depths, while he battled alone with all the powers of evil that beset his soul.

When night came he was utterly exhausted, and sought his couch, looking at least ten years older than he had appeared forty-eight hours previous.

He slept heavily and dreamlessly, and did not awake till late, when an imperative knock upon the door and a voice, calling in distress, caused him to spring suddenly from his bed, and impressed him with a sense of impending evil.

"What is it, Mary?" he inquired, upon recognizing the voice of his wife's maid.

"Oh, sir! come—come to madam; she is very ill!" cried the girl, in a frightened tone.

"I will be there immediately. Send James for the doctor, and then go back to her," commanded her master, as he hurriedly began to dress.

Five minutes later he was in his wife's room, to find her lying upon the lounge, just as he had seen her thirty-six hours previous.

It was evident that she had not been in bed at all for two nights, for she still had on the same dress that she had worn at the Copley Square Hotel.

But the shadow of death was on her white face; her eyes were glazed, and though only partially closed, it was evident that she saw nothing.

Gerald Goddard was shocked beyond measure to find her thus, but he arose to the occasion.

With his own hands and the assistance of the maid, he removed her clothing, then wrapped her in blankets and put her in bed, when he called for hot water bottles to place around her, hoping thus by artificial heat to quicken the sluggish circulation and her failing pulses.

But apparently there was no change in her, and when the physician came and made his examination, he told them plainly that "no effort could avail; it was a case of sudden heart failure, and the end was but a question of moments."

Mr. Goddard was horrified and stricken with remorse at this hopeless verdict, for it seemed to him that he was in a measure accountable for the untimely shock which was fast depriving of life this woman who had loved him so passionately, though unwisely.

He put his lips to her ear and called her by name.

"Anna! Anna! You must try to arouse yourself," he cried, in a voice of agony.

At first the appeal seemed to produce no effect, but after several attempts he thought he detected a gleam of intelligence in the almost sightless eyes, while the cold fingers resting on his hand made an effort to close over his.

"Doctor, she knows me!" he exclaimed. "Pray give her some stimulant to arouse her dormant faculties, if only for a moment."

"I fear it will be of no use," the physican replied, "but I will try."

He hurriedly prepared and administered a powerful restorative; then they waited with breathless interest for several moments for some sign of improvement.

It came at last; she began to breathe a trifle more regularly; the set features became a little less rigid, and the pulse a shade stronger; until finally the white lids were lifted and the dying woman turned her eyes with a pitiful expression of appeal upon the man whom, even in death, she still adored.

"Leave us alone!" commanded Gerald Goddard, and physician and servants stole noiselessly from the room.

"Anna, you know me—you understand what I am saying?" the wretched man then questioned.

A slight pressure from the cold fingers was the only reply.

"You know that you are dying?" he pursued.

Again that faint sign of assent.

"Then, dear, let us be at peace before you go," he pleaded, gently. "My soul bows in humiliation and remorse before you; for years I have wronged you. I wronged you in those first days in Rome. I have no excuse to offer. I simply tell you that my spirit is crushed within me as I look back and realize all that I am accountable for. I would have been glad to atone, so far as was in my power, could you have lived to share my future. Give me some sign of forgiveness to tell me that you retract those last bitter words of hate—to let me feel that in this final moment we part in peace."

At those last words those almost palsied fingers closed over his; the look of agony in those dusky orbs was superseded by one of adoration and tenderness; a faint expression of something like peace crept into the tense lines about the drawn mouth, and the repentant watcher knew that she would not go out into the great unknown bearing in her heart a relentless hatred against him.

That effort was the last flicker of the expiring flame, for the white lids drooped over the dark eyes; the cold fingers relaxed their hold, and Gerald Goddard knew the end had almost come.

He touched the bell, and the physician instantly reentered the room.

"It is almost over," he remarked, as he went to the bedside, and his practised fingers sought her pulse.

Even as he spoke her breast heaved once—then again, and all was still.

Who shall describe the misery that surged over Gerald Goddard's soul as he looked upon the still form of the grandly beautiful woman.

He felt almost like a murderer; for, in spite of Dr. Hunt's verdict that she had died of "sudden heart failure," he feared that the proud woman had been so crushed by what she had overheard in Isabel Stewart's apartments that she had voluntarily ended her life.

It was only a dim suspicion—a vague impression, for there was not the slightest evidence of anything of the kind, and he would never dare to give voice to it to any human being; nevertheless, it pressed heavily upon his soul with a sense of guilt that was almost intolerable.

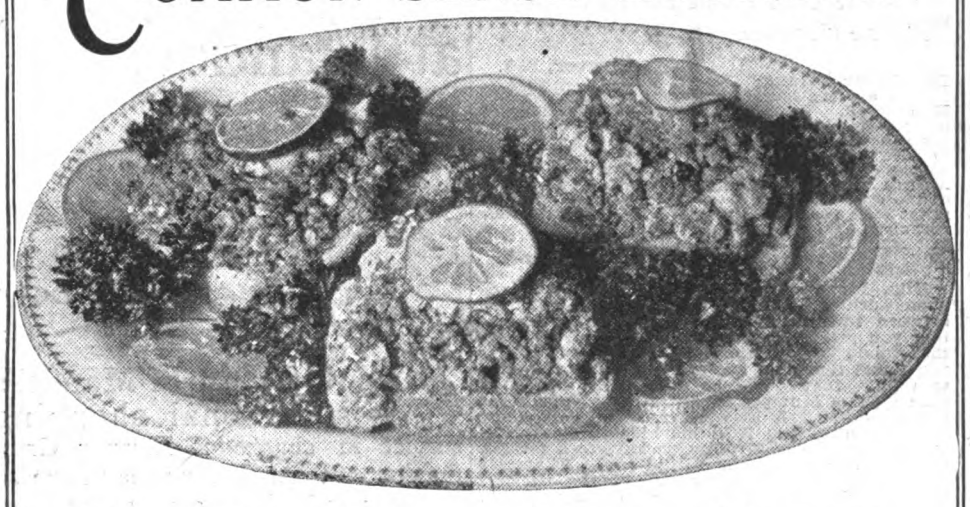
A message was immediately sent flying over the wires to New York to inform Emil Correlli of the sad news, and eight hours later he was back in Boston crushed for the time by the loss of the sister for whom he entertained perhaps the purest love of which his selfish heart was capable of experiencing.

We will not dwell upon the harrowing events of the next few days.

Suffice it to say that society, or that portion of it that had known the brilliant Mrs. Goddard, was greatly shocked by the sudden death of one of its "brightest ornaments," and gracefully mourned her by covering her costly casket with choicest flowers; then closed up its ranks and went its way, trying to forget the pale charger which they knew would come again and again upon his grim errand.

The day following Anna Correlli's interment in Forest Hill Cemetery, Mr. Goddard and his brother-in-law were waited upon by the well-known lawyer, Arthur Clayton, who informed them that he had an important communication to make to them.

"Two days previous to her death I received this note from Mrs. Goddard," he remarked, at the same time handing a daintily perfumed missive to the elder gentleman. "In it you will observe that she asks me to come to her immediately. I obeyed her, and found her looking very ill, and seemingly greatly distressed in body and mind. She told me she was impressed that she had not long to live—that she had an affection of the heart that warned her to put her affairs in order. She desired me to draw up a will at once, according to her instructions, and have it signed and witnessed before I left the house. I did so, calling in at her request two witnesses from a neighboring drug-store, after which she gave the will into my keeping, to be retained until her death. This is the document, gentlemen," he remarked, in conclusion, "and here, also, is another communication, which she wrote herself and directed me to hand to you, sir."



He arose and passed both the will and the letter to Mr. Goddard, who had seemed greatly agitated while he was speaking.

He simply took the letter, remarking:

"Since you are already acquainted with the

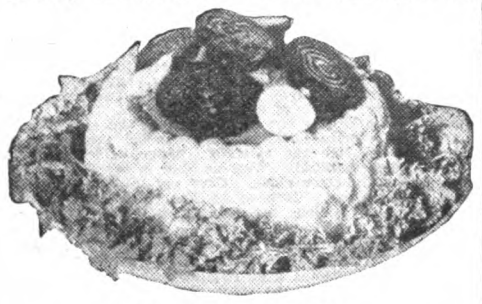
COMMON-SENSE ECONOMY



TO MEET HIGH FOOD PRICES

By Ella Gordon

Copyright, 1917, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

NEVER has there been a time when good management in the home was more essential to the welfare of the family and nation. Although potatoes and green vegetables—thanks largely to the success of the back-yard and lawn gardens—are selling way below the frightful prices of last season, staple foods such as flour and sugar are as high or higher than a year ago while meats, milk, butter, cheese and eggs have reached a figure that brings consternation to the housewife of moderate means. While there is no getting away from this advance in price of food stuffs, the housewife who is willing to put her time into developing household expertness, beginning in the kitchen, can do much toward minimizing the cost of three wholesome, nourishing meals a day.

Months ago when the price of food began advancing so rapidly, we did not understand the cause, and became alarmed lest we were facing an actual food shortage, as was heralded in some of our daily newspapers. But true to the natural trait of womankind to rise supreme in emergency, we have become students of the "Food Problem" and in the bitter school of high prices, learned a lesson that puts us back to the days of our ancestors when the feeding of the family was the individual responsibility of its women members. In the absence of glass jars, vegetables and fruits were either preserved or dried; cooked food from the shelves of the grocer was unknown; waste through too great a variety of food at one meal was seldom seen. Nowadays health and pocketbook are both taxed through over-eating to a degree that we did not comprehend until the present stringency brought us to our senses.

We have long pondered over that word "conservation," so commonly used these days. At first we confused it with "hoading," but now in the new light of accepted responsibilities, it simply means to us that it is our patriotic duty to see that every atom of food is taken care of and used to advantage, in order that the world's scant food supply may be stretched to the utmost to prevent famine.

Always Remember

that careless methods of buying, hastily planned and hurriedly cooked meals, and a waste of the left-overs, are the first causes of many discouragements and bodily ailments, and that the secret of preventing these troubles is to banish the notion that domestic work is drudgery, and to wake up to the fact that the housewife by no means occupies a position of secondary importance.

It was under the grim necessity of meeting a persistent food shortage mid the ravages of the old wars that the inventive genius of the French women developed the art of cooking to the degree of perfection for which they are famous; in seeking to avoid privation through thrift they have learned how to economize without sacrifice. Bits of left-overs were skillfuly worked over into nourishing and appetizing combinations for another meal. A marrow bone, so often thrown into the garbage pail by the American woman, was boiled with vegetables or rice and served as a substitute for meat. They used green vegetables and salad in greater variety and more extensively than we, and the kitchen garden, for all who could command a little land, was deemed an indispensable adjunct and an object of special care. The war will not be without its permanent good effects on our people, not the least of which will be the making of better cooks and better economists of American housewives.

Dishes Made Entirely of Left-overs

Soup

Do not put into the soup kettle anything that is tainted or unfit to serve; that is not its mission. A good soup requires bone, so be sure your butcher puts in the bone and other trimmings that you pay for in buying meat. Here a great saving is made, particularly on the precious fat which is so expensive in any form at present.

Gravies, left-over vegetables and cereals, scraps of meat, fat and bones can all be made into soups. Soup, when cooked, should stand over night to cool so the fat may be removed and used for frying purposes, and for shortening in molasses cookies.

Remnant of baked beans makes a good soup. Add water and simmer until soft, then put through the potato ricer. A left-over of tomato, either fresh or canned, gives a delicious flavor when cooked with the beans. Season with pepper and salt and add a piece of butter just before serving. Serve with dice of bread toasted brown in the oven.

Salad

Any kind of left-over vegetables makes a good salad to be served with buttered bread for supper. A spoonful of peas, a few slices of beef cut into dice, tender leaves and stalk of celery cut fine, a little carrot and asparagus, in fact most vegetables combine well in this form. Mix generously with French dressing or Mayonnaise.

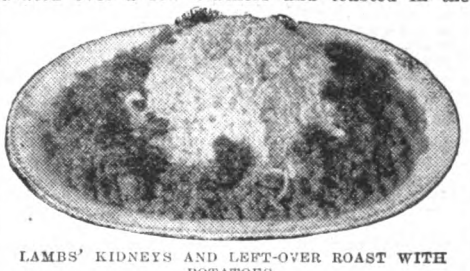
Bread and Cereals

A delicious cereal is made by combining left-overs of different cereals, often wasted. Another use is to slice cold and fry brown, serving with syrup, or butter and powdered sugar.



Potatoes

Utilize left-over boiled potatoes, either sweet or white, by adding one third the amount of pieces of dried bread cut small, and fried together.

A delicious Southern dish is made by quartering medium-sized sweet potatoes or yams, lightly sprinkling with brown sugar, a dash of cinnamon, a very little salt, and hot water in bottom of dish to make steam. Put into earthern baking dish, and bake covered half an hour, then remove cover and brown.

Cheese

Broken pieces of cheese never need be wasted. Grated over a few crackers and toasted in the oven makes a good dessert after a heavy dinner. Cheese combined with a little butter and milk and brought to a scald, then thickened with the yolk of an egg is most appetizing on slices of graham toast.

Various Recipes

CREAMED MEAT ON TOAST.—A supper dish of meat on toast is always appetizing and affords an excellent way in which to serve left-overs. Meat that has been roasted must simmer one hour before serving on toast. Take most any kind except pork, chop fine and brown in butter very lightly, then cover with boiling water and simmer one hour. Add enough browned flour (brown in oven) to thicken, season with pepper and salt and serve on slices of toast. Just before eating, squeeze a little lemon juice over the meat, and serve the lemon in slices as a garnish. (See illustrated heading).

VEGETABLE CROQUETTES.—Use vegetables left from boiled dinner, chopped fine with boiled rice,—three cups of vegetable to one of rice. Season with butter, pepper, salt and a little lemon and onion juice, and moisten with enough cream to shape. Roll in flour very lightly and fry in smoking hot fat. Garnish each croquette with a small round of red beet.

SAVORY WAY TO PREPARE LEFT-OVER FISH.—The best way to reheat fish is in the oven, covered, where it will steam and not become hard and tasteless. Pick in small pieces, add left-over rice, potato or pieces of stale bread; season, add drawn butter sauce and when hot serve on slices of toasted brown bread. A little scrambled egg on top is a delicious addition.

MEAT IN BLANKETS.—Cut open dried or stale rolls lengthwise, remove the inside and save for bread crumbs in which to roll croquettes. Make a hash of meat and vegetable chopped together and bake in a hot oven. Fill cavities in rolls and return to oven until rolls are a golden brown. A sauce made from a few slices of left-over tomato, thickened and highly flavored with butter, pepper and salt, may be spread over the meat in each roll just before serving.

LAMB KIDNEYS AND LELF-OVER ROAST WITH POTATO.—When buying a roast of lamb, see that the butcher puts in the kidneys for which you pay, as meat is usually weighed before trimmed. Stew the kidneys so they will keep until lamb is used, then chop the remnants of roast with the kidneys and simmer one hour. Add gravy from roast, season with salt and pepper and add a little flour thickening. Heat mashed potato in the oven, put rice into middle of platter and surround with the lamb.

LEFT-OVER FISH, POTATO AND BAKED BEANS.—Pick up the fish, add cold potato mashed, one beaten egg and hot milk to mold into balls. Brown in a very hot oven, arrange on platter and pour over the remnants of hot baked beans. A good breakfast dish for the men-folk.

LEFT-OVER POT POURRI.—A good supper may be prepared from the small left-overs of a chicken and vegetable dinner. Remove every bit of chicken from the carcase and chop fine. Break up the bones, cover with cold water and simmer till they are lighter in color, then strain. Brown the chicken in butter, add liquor and simmer half an hour. Thicken with browned flour and season. Shape cold mashed potato like a nest, deep enough to hold meat, and left-over vegetables. Brown the nest, and heat the vegetables in the oven in a separate dish at the same time, putting all together just before serving.

friends but on the average there are just as many bad in the country as in the cities. The only difference I see is that they are more scattered and have more chance to hide their badness.

I know of a country revival meeting that was broken up on account of the farmer boys' bad tricks and I never heard of anything like that in the city. Nor did I ever hear of stealing corn and chickens till I visited the country and it was suggested by country girls.

I do not say all farmers are bad but I do say they have their faults as well as the city folks. Another thing I know is this: that the farmers were offered a good price for their potatoes but they held them back for a larger price.

I am five feet, three inches tall and weigh one hundred and five pounds. I have light hair, blue eyes and light complexion. I have been married seven years but am sorry to say I have no family; my one little girl is dead. I belong to the M. E. Church and Aid Society and love the work.

SPRINGFIELD, 5 West Main St., OHIO.

MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

Since my last letter to you I have been deluged with letters from the sisters, some containing stamps for answers and some without, and I am sorry to say I could not answer on account of an accident so, COMFORT friends, do not be offended if you have not received an answer for I will tell you how it happened. I have a woman come each week and clean for me and she thought the letters on my desk were of no value and as I was not at home she destroyed all of them and that left me without the addresses. The stamps were burned also. I am very sorry but if you will write again I will answer.

All who wrote asked me to tell them "all about Japan." I only wish I could do so but it is impossible. That would take a book so I'll tell you a little at a time as I cannot take up much space in COMFORT as others want a chance. As Uncle Charlie says, "Now for the letters," I'll say, "Now for Japan."

The people are a quiet, home loving, economical, hard working race. Work always comes first. After that is done for the day, then sports are indulged in, chiefly wrestling and fencing. Some girls in Japan are all muscle and can wrestle better than some men; they are also excellent at fencing, racing, swimming, and, in fact, they can do almost anything in the sports line as well as the men but they are quiet and modest always. If they win they are, of course, proud, but a great noise about it is considered quite vulgar and may banish them from future games.

The women at home are very industrious. They are never idle and when the home is in order they teach the babies, sew, or garden. Shows are seldom honored with housewives, only once in a great while and then the husband accompanies them. A woman of good character will not go to such amusements without her husband but shows and dances are not as interesting to the Japanese woman as a daintily embroidered kimono or slippers so you see the housewife always works but she takes her pleasure in sewing and so the husband praises his wife and is proud of her. Each woman tries to embroider her gown the nicest and, of course, the husband takes pride in his wife's ability.

These kimonos are long and loose and held in place by a wide belt of silk or as you would call it, "a girdle," but it is drawn tightly around the waist. The kimonos are made entirely by hand, no machine stitching whatever, and at times quilted by hand in the tiniest of stitches, and roses, birds, butterflies and cherry blossoms are embroidered down to the hem on each side in front and around the collar and sleeves while the rest is of plain material, black or blue, but the inside of the kimono is a delight to the eye. It is of the best of silk and shows only when the wearer walks. The best of the clothes are worn on the inside. The present styles in the United States are shocking to the average woman in Japan.

In the winter the women make pin money by roasting and selling sweet potatoes. The men like to stop and eat a hot sweet potato or by putting it in their pocket it keeps warm for a long time and the man warms his hands on it.

The foods are chiefly rice and fish. The old-fashioned people will not eat meat and will not allow it to be cooked in their house; however, the younger people sometimes cook meat outside the house and eat it. Many learn to eat and like meat from those who have been in this country and returned or those who want to come to this country learn to eat meat before they come here so as not to seem so "green."

The land in Japan is very fertile, raising the finest crops. There are also valuable mines of copper, gold, silver and coal but the copper and coal are the best paying.

Fish are so numerous that a net will be full in five minutes near shore; a line will keep one busy taking the fish off. No one ever thinks of buying fish, only the richer class who will not fish and they buy all they want for a sum too small to mention.

Sometime I will tell you about the school and military training of the soldiers.

I am a poor writer, but you must try to understand it the best you can. I have not United States education.

We are enjoying fine weather now and all that spoils the beauty of summer is the war cloud on the horizon, blotting out the sun of warmth, peace and content. We can only all do our bit to help in case of war by saving all possible from hunger at home and to assist those in grief. I pray that God will give us peace and victory.

I thank you all for the greetings you have given me, a stranger and an alien. I am indeed glad that I am welcome in your charming corner.

Your COMFORT friend, MRS. TONY KOGA.

Mrs. Tony Koga. You forgot to mention your little babies this time as we were all so interested in them too; however, we'll forgive you if you'll write another interesting letter and tell us more about Japan and other countries you have seen.—Ed.

VIOLA, ARK.

DEAR SISTERS AND ALL:

Mattie Mae Clark, will you sit over just a little wee bit and give a seventeen-year-old farmer girl room to rest a little. I'll take off my bonnet and tell you of a trip I made. I visited the famous Mammoth Spring and it certainly was a wonderful sight. I'll describe it to you as Shinn's Ark. History does.

"Mammoth Spring wells up from a deep abyss from an opening forty yards in circumference and forms a lake at its very source, about one sixteenth of a mile from north to south and about one fifth of a mile from east to west. The spring sends out about 8,000 barrels of water per minute, and forms the main source of Spring river. In the early settlement of the country it was a resort for wild beasts and fowls. A mill placed there by Mr. Mills, although small and rude, attracted the custom of farmers from

I DO not think I can devote the space allotted to me this month to more valuable purpose than in clearing up some of the extraordinary, weird and preposterous ideas that so many people hold about this war.

The first insidious calumny to combat, a contemptible lie that has been spread broadcast by the foreign language press, and reechoed by the peace-at-any-price, anti-American, pro-Kaiser radical press, is the monstrous accusation that this is England's war, and we have no right to fight England's battles.

If this is England's and not our war, whisper it with shame, for when you say that, you imply that we are curs and cowards, and that England and her allies alone have had the courage to face the fiendish foe that has run amuck and spilled its bloodthirsty hordes over the boundaries of its neighbors. These murderous marauders, bent on world domination, for forty years forging the weapons that were to beat into dust all those that dared to stand in the way of their ruthless ends, have carried fire and sword, desolation and destruction in all directions, sparing neither man, woman nor child, nor any living thing that came in their path. For nearly three years we not only have had to watch the frightful onslaught of a people that had lapsed into savagery, a people that have made even the deeds of Genghis Khan and Atilla, seem in comparison, like a pink tea or a Sunday School session; but we too have felt the heel of Prussian despotism. Our citizens, men, women and children have been murdered by the hundred. We have been vilified and insulted. The whole country has been made the stamping ground for an open and outrageous assault, not only upon nations with which we were at peace, but upon ourselves. Millions of dollars' worth of property has been dynamited and burned; labor movements, political parties, and even Congress itself has been made to do the work of the Pirates of Potsdam. We begged and pleaded with Germany not to embroil us in this world debacle. False promises were made and submarine ruthlessness was temporarily halted, so that hundreds more of the destructive U boats could be rushed to completion. Next we found that our enemies were offering whole sections of our commonwealth as an inducement for other nations to attack and dismember us. Finally we were insolently ordered to keep off the seas entirely. That was the last straw. High officials and officers of the German military and diplomatic service spent millions upon millions of dollars in their efforts to stir up trouble. They hoped by their propaganda to so befog the issues and fool the national mind, to come as near as possible to starting internal revolution and by winning sympathy for their cause, make us active supporters of their mad campaign of conquest, horror and frightfulness. They almost accomplished their dastardly work, but their methods were so typically Prussian, so raw and outrageous that they, the Kaiser's agents, were finally ejected from the country and we the long-suffering victims of their machinations were derided and sneeringly referred to as "Idiotic Yankees." The Bernstoffs, Von Papens, Dumbas and Dernbergs have gone, but the effects of their evil work still remain, as is evidenced by the fact that millions of gullible, credulous, sallow-anything people have been led to believe that this is England's war, when as we all know, or at least all know who are not blinded by ignorance, prejudice or hate, that this is a holy war, God's war, against a gang of ruthless, medieval, sword-rattling, gun-toting military pirates and fanatics, who have got a strangle-hold on the throats of the great democracies of the world, and are trying to choke liberty and freedom to death and banish government of, for and by the people from the face of the earth.

It is gall and wormwood to our enemies, to those who would Germanize our country and the world at large and transform the land of Washington and Lincoln into a Prussian annex, to know that not only their plots failed miserably, but that we too are going to stand shoulder to shoulder with Britain and France in the gory trenches which have so long held back the mad onslaught of the Teuton hordes. That we are on the side of Britain is Germany's fault and Germany's fault alone. If Britain were to run amuck in Europe as Germany has done, we should be on the side of Germany. We are not in this war because we love Britain and hate Germany, we are in this war so that the world may be made a safe place for decent, law-abiding, self-respecting people to live in. We are in this war to liberate Belgium and France, and no less to liberate Germany from the ruthless gang of military maniacs who have converted a people naturally kind and docile, into obedient cogs of a military machine which threatens to overrun the world. We are in this war because we have been infamously mistreated, and our honor, our flag and our rights trampled into dust. If there are Americans among us who do not know of the infamies to which we have been forced to submit and who still think this is not our war, let these craven poltroons hang their heads in shame and forever keep silent or openly confess they prefer German lies to American truth.

Let them remember what President Wilson said in his Flag Day speech: "Woe be to that man, or group of men, who seek to stand in our way in this day of high resolution when every principle we hold dear is to be vindicated and made secure for the salvation of the nation."

I am constantly asked who started this war. The foreign language press has almost succeeded in fooling the masses of the people into believing that Germany was attacked and forced into the war. Let our President answer this contemptible falsehood. In his Flag Day speech President Wilson said: "The war was begun by the military masters of Germany, who proved to be also the military masters of Austria-Hungary. Their plan was to throw a broad belt of military power and political control across the very center of Europe and beyond the Mediterranean into the heart of Asia." Here you have the truth from the highest source.

Next I am asked why we send so much money especially gold to England? We have not sent any gold to England. On the contrary England has been sending us gold by the shipload. Please remember until the Allies commenced to buy war supplies here and send shiploads of their money here, we were suffering from a period of acute business depression and soup kitchens and bundle days were a regular thing, and too we owed Europe enormous sums of money. Here is a little newspaper heading, a sample of many similar ones, cut from the New York Times of June 19, of this year: "England Continues to Send Gold Here. $22,000,000 Arrives. Goes to Reserve Bank." I trust that will help to relieve the anxiety of England haters and those many good, but deluded souls who hate to think that the nation which for three years has been shedding its best blood for us (giving us the opportunity to wipe out our foreign debts and to roll up the biggest stock of gold we have ever possessed in our history and also to experience the greatest wave of business prosperity the country has ever known) is getting a ten-cent piece of our money. We are not giving, but merely loaning John Bull and France and our Allies generally, money, in other words we are giving them credit for the goods they buy of us. Not a dollar of this money is going out of the country. Every cent is being spent here and these loans will be repaid with interest. England has been our best customer. The amount of goods she purchases from us yearly is enormous. Her money too has built many of our railroads and still keeps many of our enterprises going. Would we not be a bunch of dastards and churls and misers, if we refused to give our best customers in the hour of their agony, credit for a year or two?

Now as regards food. Why should we stop supplying these nations with food when they are spilling rivers of blood to hold back the common enemy of mankind. We have always supplied Britain and France with large quantities of food, for remember we raise a great deal more wheat, etc., than is required for our own needs. If we had not fed and helped our Allies, they would have been overwhelmed long ago. Then the bowels would have been torn out of this country, and you would not only have had to have fed your conquerors, but they would have taken every dollar they could have got their hands on, and put you in Prussian uniforms and made you fight their battles.

The cry which came from the foreign language and pro-Germanized socialist press: "Feed America and Starve the War," was another exhibition of the malevolent workings of German propaganda. It fooled the ignorant and the boncheads, and also fooled a lot of the dupes of the foreign socialist movement, and it fooled nobody else.

Many people ask: "Why is Germany able to successfully combat and hold off so many nations?" Germany and Austria straddle over the heart of Europe. These two countries are honeycombed with splendid railroads, many of them built purely for military or strategic purposes. From her central position Germany can roll her troops in a few hours from the eastern to the western front, and thanks to these bands of steel she has been able to concentrate vast masses of troops at any point where enemies threaten to break through. It is not superior science or superior fighting ability that has enabled Germany to hold out. When the British and the French come to grips with the Germans on anything like equal terms, Fritz nine times out of ten gets the worst of it. It is Germany's central position, her strategic railroads and the submarine that has enabled her to hold out as long as she has done. Without the aid of the submarine she would have been put out of business long ago.

How long will the war last? This war may last for years, and it is absolutely necessary that you should know the real truth about this struggle and those engaged in it. We cannot win this war unless people know the truth, for our enemies have filled our people so full of abominable falsehoods, and have painted our allies so black, that they have had more sympathy for our foes than for our friends.

Why should we help France some ask? Good God what a question, and what wicked ingratitude. Without the assistance of France, who came to us with men and money, George Washington's efforts would have been in vain, and our freedom never would have been won. We are paying France a tithe of what she did for us in the brave days of old and we are paying back Britain, the motherland of Washington and Lincoln, for what they did for us in Manila Bay, during the Spanish American War, when only Britain stood between us and a European coalition headed by Germany that fairly itched to conquer and Germanize us. We have had the Fatherland stuffed down our throats until we are nauseated. Don't forget this country once had a motherland that gave us our best blood, Pilgrims, Puritans and Cavaliers. Colonel Roosevelt in his Fourth of July speech said: "Any man who now announces that though he favors the United States against Germany, yet favors Germany against England, is a traitor against America. The offences committed against Americans of 1776 by King George and the England of his day were as nothing compared to the crimes committed against us all and against all civilization and humanity by the brutalized Germany of the Hohenzollerns during the last three years." Because our great grandfathers quarreled with Great Britain is no reason why we should perpetuate today the hate of nearly 150 years ago. The foreign language press wants to perpetuate that hate in the interests of our enemies. The foreign press, however, is doomed. When it goes racial hate will go with it and we shall have one united, freedom-loving people with no fifty-fifty allegiance. Let the blood we are shedding knit all races together in one bond of common brotherhood. That is my dream on this my 54th birthday. God grant I may live to see it realized. I hope you will be able to help me to see it realized by being, no matter what your race or birth, for America first, last, and all the time.

Don't forget that Uncle Charlie's four wonderful books may still be had. Start in at once to obtain them,—they cost you no money, only a very little time and effort,—and keep at it until you have the entire set. The book of Poems is beautifully bound in ribbed silk stiff covers; the Story Book is bound in two styles, the one in ribbed silk stiff covers like the Poems, the other in paper covers; the Song Book is bound only in heavy paper covers and the Picture Book in handsome stiff covers. Poems or the Story Book in ribbed silk stiff covers, either one for a club of four subscriptions; the Song Book or the Story Book in handsome paper covers or the Picture Book in pretty stiff covers for a club of only two subscriptions. These four books are a library of endless joy and merriment, the best medicine to drive away the blues and the best gifts in the world.

My picture book, too, has started a deluge of inquiries: Is Billy the Goat my daughter, is Maria her Ma? Is there an Aunt Charlie? Is the big boy in the picture book my only baby? I have had a little leaflet specially printed answering all these questions fully, and these who are interested will find the same in every copy of the four Uncle Charlie Books sent out this season.

Now for the letters.

MATTITUCK, L. I.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I am a young lady fifteen years of age and am in High School. Uncle will you explain the difference between invention and discovery. Our teacher gave us her ideas about them one day in school and I want to know what you think. I have heard people say no one can invent anything, it is just a discovery. Are you as afraid of disease germs as you were a year or two ago? I don't see how you can live with a goat in the same house. I always thought that goats were real dirty. Do you really live with the Goat or is it just fun. I hope to see this letter in print.

Your niece, RITA DURYEE.

Rita, I can't see how anyone can get mixed upon such a simple matter as differentiating between invention and discovery. If a fellow told you you were the only girl he ever loved, that would be invention. If a day or two later you found that man was married and had seventeen kids, that would be discovery. Once on a time I put a bent pin in my father's chair. That was invention. A little later, when Papa drew the tormenting pin from his hide that was discovery. Once a man sold a package to a farmer, and told him it contained solid gold. That was invention. When the farmer got the package home, he found it contained an ordinary brick. That was discovery. There is a store near us which advertises the best and purest ice-cream in the city. The other day the Goat went in and bought a plate of this guaranteed ice-cream. The cream was invention. When Billy dug his spoon into the cream the first thing that met his eye was a deceased cockroach. That was discovery. When the mayor of Chicago was elected to office, he proclaimed himself an American. That was invention. When war broke out we found that he was a Kaiser rooter. That was discovery. When Senator La Follette and Gum Shoe Bill Stone of Missouri went to Congress they swore they were Americans. That was invention. Later on when we found they were working for their German constituents in the interests of Kaiserism and Prussianism and the President was forced to refer to them as willful men, and when these willful men found that every man with a drop of real American blood in his veins regarded them with contempt, that was discovery. As regards Billy the Goat, Rita, that individual is more or less invention, but if you look in Uncle Charlie's Picture Book, you will see a very beautiful goat and that will be a discovery. Your teacher may not lack knowledge, my dear, but evidently she lacks imagination.

LEADORE, IDAHO.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I have been taking my final examination this week, and I hope I will pass. I will send you some poetry we had to make up for "language." So here it is. A Lake in the Woods, that is the title.

This little lake three miles across,
A very little flight for a albertross.
Two dozen camps at the side
And out on the wave a raft does ride
It is some eight hundred feet deep.
On two sides the banks are steep.
The lake has a greenish hue,
The sky a very deep blue.

As ever your nephew, GEORGE E. JEWETT.

Sorry George, I couldn't print all your pottery, as you have tackled an inspiring subject and have handled it in a highly creditable way. In fancy we can see that silvery lake shimmering in the woods. But who is this albertross that makes a specialty of flying across lakes? If you had said a very little flight for an airplane or Zeppelin we could have understood it, but apparently this man bird Albert Ross scorns ordinary methods of air locomotion and flies without wings or machinery. The government ought to capture Albert and send him over to France. Maybe he could fly to Berlin and drop a ton of dynamite on the Kaiser's cocoanut. It is about time someone gave the Kaiser a dose of his own medicine. His specialty is butchering women and children. Maybe we could hire Albert Ross, if he is not too busy flying over Lake Leadore, to do a much needed job of this kind. What's that Billy? George means an albatross, a seabird that inhabits the Pacific and Southern Oceans? Isn't that too bad? Once more Wilhelm escapes, but we are going to get him yet. That must be some raft to be eight hundred feet deep, with banks on both sides. There is no submarine that could sink a raft of those gigantic dimensions. That raft ought to be used for ferrying soldiers to France instead of floating idly around in the mountain recesses of Idaho. What's that Billy? George means the lake and not the raft is eight hundred feet deep. My, ain't that too bad. Another attempt to do our bit in the war gone a glimmering. The Goat says George, if you don't look in that lake so much it won't have such a greenish hue. Maybe however, one of the campers has dropped a dollar bill in and that has changed its complexion. Then too it may be trying to imitate Killarney, whose lakes have the correct and patriotic Irish hue. Uncle Charlie, if you go any further you are liable to get into trouble. Billy, I know it, so we'll just thank George for his delightful pottery and evaporate.

HOLLAND, KY.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

Have been a subscriber to COMFORT for several years and have enjoyed your talks and letters so much. Wish the world was full of Uncle Charlies. I am writing this for information and advice. I have been thinking seriously of joining the Red Cross since this terrible war started. I don't think I would like to be a nurse though. I have been sewing for a living for several years, get all the work I can do, still I want to do my part in this great struggle. I am willing to do all I can. What I want to know is this: Is there not a place somewhere that I could get work to do, sewing for the soldiers and would you advise this? I want to help if there is work for me to do. I could do nursing if I am needed. Where must I write to get information concerning the Red Cross?

Wishing you a long life of continued usefulness, I am sincerely your friend,

MISS ETHEL HUGHES.

I have written a personal letter to Ethel, and by now I have no doubt she is either sewing or knitting for soldiers, or doing some other work for the "Great Cause." If you can't be a Red Cross nurse, you can all join the Red Cross, and that entitles you to wear the Red Cross button. It costs a dollar a year. No money is better expended than that which goes to the Red Cross. In peace it is used for those who are the victims of flood, famine, pestilence, earthquake and storm. In war it is used to aid and succor the wounded and sick. Over a hundred million dollars was raised the other day during Red Cross week and we shall need another hundred million in six months' time. In this state, a military census has been taken and probably by now a similar census has been taken the country o'er. This is a war of nations and peoples for ideas and principles. Every atom of energy must be conserved and directed into channels that vitally aid the nation and the whole world in its struggle against that section of the human family which has run amuck, crazed with the idea of conquest and insane with military madness. This war cannot be won by letting George do it. You are George, and you cannot push your burden on anyone else. No matter how old you are or how young you are, there is something you can do and something you must do. The great thing is to realize the danger and have the will to do. The Red Cross headquarters is in Washington, D. C., but the organization has branches and chapters in every city in the land. If you write Red Cross Society, Local Chapter, and send it to the nearest town of any size you will get a reply. There is not one pair of hands, no matter how knotted with toil or weakened by sickness that cannot do some little thing for the war to end war.

HORSE CAVE, R. R. 2, KY.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I am sixteen years old, five feet four inches tall, weigh one hundred and two pounds, have blonde hair and blue eyes. I live in the country two miles from Horse Cave, on top of a knob.

I go to a contry school, and am in the eighth grade, and my favorite books are arithmetic, geography and spelling. I like the COMFORT paper better than any other paper printed. Well as this is my first letter I guess I had better close. Give my love to Maria and Billy the Goat. Hoping to hear from some of the cousins, Your neice, MATTIE LEE NICHOLS.

So Mattie, you live on a knob do you? Don't you find it rather uncomfortable? Life is a pretty tough proposition and rather hard to live at the best, but I can't see why you should add to the hardships of existence by living on a knob, and especially on top of a knob. Of course there are knobs and knobs, and I don't think I'd care to sit on one, let alone live on one. From the fact that you live on a knob Mattie, it seems to me we have the right to assume that you belong to the knob-ility. Talk about living on things I know a boy who lives on his father, and a girl who lives on her mother and a Kaiser who lives on a bluff. For my part I live on a rubber ring. You'd better try it Mattie, I think you'd find it more comfortable than living on a knob. So you go to a contry school, do you Mattie? I hope that is an improvement on some of the country schools they have in Kentucky. It does not matter whether schools are "contry" schools or country school, not half of them succeed in teaching their pupils to spell that one little word, niece, correctly.

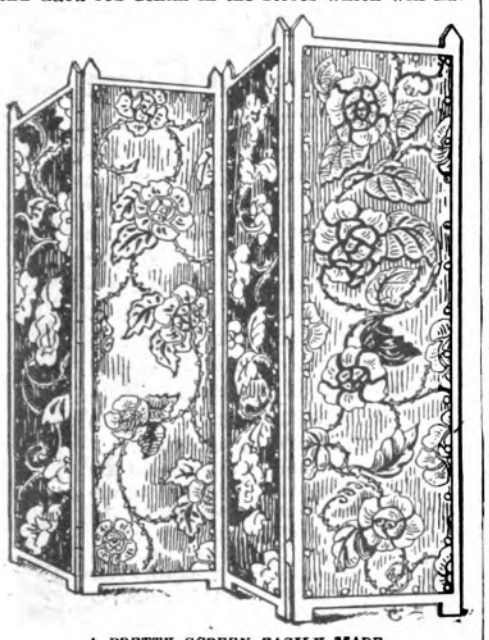
Brass Tacks and Denim

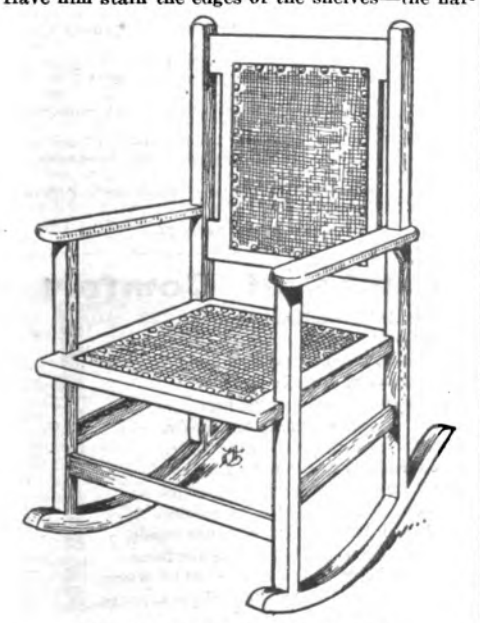


How to Do Your Own Upholstering

By Geraldine Ames

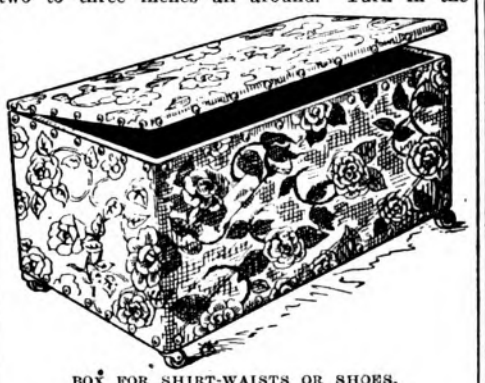
Copyright, 1917, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

HAVE you an old piece of furniture that you would like to reupholster, or an ugly corner in your living-room that you would beautify? Perhaps your window seats need recovering, or they do not harmonize with the general furnishings. Some old flat top desk you may have would be all right for your library if the top were not so scratched up and banged up.



All these things can be made artistic and satisfactory by using brass thumbtacks and denim, a little patience and a few leisure hours. If your home is fitted with mission furniture it is easy to secure any of the soft tones of green, brown and dark red denim in the stores which will harmonize with it. If your furniture is of any other wood, study carefully the color scheme of the room you wish to redecorate and secure samples of the different denims obtainable. After studying the effect of each on the furniture, select the most inconspicuous and suitable to the lighting of the room.

A PRETTY SCREEN EASILY MADE.

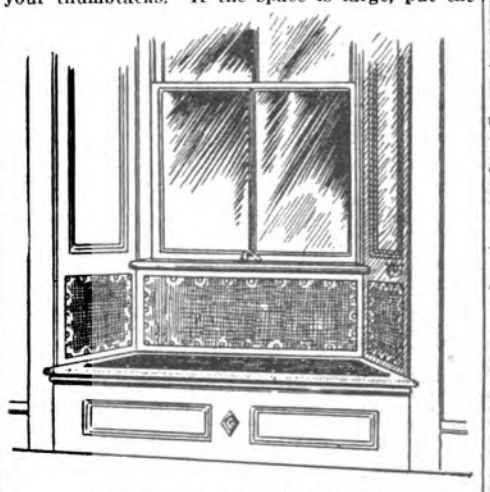


Brass thumbtacks may be bought or you can get thumbtacks with nickel or bronze heads. These go beautifully with almost any shade of denim. However, if you have a number of brass objects in your room, I should suggest using a very inconspicuous thumbtack. If your room is dark, the brass-headed thumbtack with a pleasant green of brown denim gives a very cheerful and cozy effect.

To make a bookcase, use an old bookrack or have a carpenter build you a set of shelves, paying no attention to the cheapness of the wood. Have him stain the edges of the shelves—the narrow strip of wood that shows after the rest is covered. Cover the top and bottom of the shelves with your denim, or even burlap may be employed for this purpose. Draw the material taut and fasten it down at even intervals with the tacks. Stretch a piece of denim across the top and down the sides of the frame, treating it as you do the shelves. Of course the frame must be lined with the denim, for it would not do to show the rough wood frame.

THE OLD CHAIR AS GOOD AS NEW.

To fix up an old chair, the back and seat of which may be in poor condition, cut out a piece of denim the size desired to fit the chair—if the wood will allow, leave a margin of from two to three inches all around. Turn in the denim so that it will not ravel and pit it down with your tacks. If you wish to have a more upholstered effect, pad your denim with either felt or cotton batting.



BOX FOR SHIRT-WAISTS OR SHOES.

Window seats may be recovered in the same way. And in a room where little feet disregard velvet or cotton, denim will make most satisfactory coverings. Pinned on by means of thumbtacks they may be changed occasionally at little expense and always be kept fresh and neat.

To make an old scratched top desk presentable, cut out your denim to fit the top of the desk, leaving a margin all around of about three inches. The denim studded with the thumbtacks will not only take away that banged up look but make the desk really artistic. Then, if you are handy with your needle, you might make a few denim ornaments to match—a picture frame, a blotter holder, etc.

Even an old ugly corner of your room may be made cozy and decorative. Perhaps the paper is torn off and the woodwork damaged in one corner and it is not convenient at the time to repaper and varnish. Denim will assist you. Cover a portion of the wall with it, studding it with your thumbtacks. If the space is large, put the tacks further apart as too many tacks are not very effective. Cover a board with your denim and by means of little iron brackets make a shelf of it. On this you might place a vase with flowers, thereby decorating the corner, or books or pictures may be placed on this shelf. A picture or two hung artistically on this portion of the wall and your "ugly duckling" will surprise you most agreeably.

A PRETTY SCREEN EASILY MADE.

If you need a shirt-waist box or a receptacle for your shoes, etc., or for any other purpose, here too, thumbtacks and denim will help you. Study the size of your room. See whether you wish to make your box a window seat or to be rolled under your bed. If for the latter, be sure and put casters on your box. If you want a window seat, and in most cases that would probably be most acceptable, secure an egg box from your grocer. Take out the middle partition, if you wish to utilize it for shirt-waists. Line the box with heavy cardboard—fastening it to the sides either with glue or small tacks. Stretch your denim on all sides of the box, fastening it with thumbtacks. The top may be treated in like manner. After the box is carefully covered, buy two hinges and fasten them to the box proper and to cover, so that the cover may be lifted easily.

A pretty screen is often a much desired article. Buy or make a framework and stain it to harmonize with your other furnishings. Stretch over it a soft shade of denim or burlap and fasten it to the framework with your thumbtacks. This makes a most satisfactory screen for all purposes.

There are hundreds of other ways to employ this time-, money- and labor-saving material and the handy housewife will find it a wise expenditure to experiment with a few yards of denim or burlap, a box of thumbtacks and an old bit of furniture. For nearly all purposes cretonne or some other fabric will answer the purpose as well as denim.

The Masked Bridal

contents of the will, sir, will you kindly read it aloud in our presence?"

Mr. Clayton flushed slightly as he bowed acquiescence.

The document proved to be very short and to the point, and bequeathed everything that the woman had possessed—"excepting what the law would allow as Gerald Goddard's right"—to her beloved brother, Emil Correlli, who was requested to pay the servants certain amounts which she named.

That was all, and Mr. Goddard knew that in the heat of her anger against him she had made this rash disposition of her property—as she had the right to do, since it had all been settled upon her—to be revenged upon him by leaving him entirely dependent upon his own resources.

At first he experienced a severe shock at her act, for the thought of poverty was anything but agreeable to him.

He had lived a life of idleness and pleasure for so many years that it would not be an easy matter for him to give up the many luxuries to which he had been accustomed without a thought or care concerning their cost.

But after the first feeling of dismay had passed, a sense of relief took possession of him; for, with his suspicions regarding the cause of Anna's death, he knew that he could never have known one moment of comfort in living upon her fortune, even had she left it unreservedly to him rather than to her brother.

Emil Correlli was made sole executor of the estate; and, as there was nothing further for Mr. Clayton to do after reading the will, he quietly took his departure, leaving the two men to discuss it at their leisure.

CHAPTER XXXII.

"YOU WILL VACATE THESE PREMISES AT YOUR EARLIEST CONVENIENCE.

"Well, Gerald, I must confess this is rather tough on you!" Monsieur Correlli remarked, in a voice of undisguised astonishment, as soon as the lawyer disappeared. "I call it downright shabby of Anna to have left you so in the lurch."

"It does not matter," returned the elder man.

"What in the world do you suppose possessed her to make such a will?" the young man inquired. "And how strange that she should have imagined all of a sudden that she was going to die, and so put her affairs in order!"

"I think I can explain why she did so. On the day of our return from Wyoming, Anna and I had a more serious quarrel than usual; I never saw her so angry as she was at that time; she even went so far as to tell me that she hated me; and so, I presume, in the heat of her anger, she resolved to cut me off with the proverbial shilling to be revenged upon me."

"Well, she has done so with a vengeance."

"I went to her afterward and tried to make it up," Goddard resumed, "but she would have nothing to say to me. She was looking very ill, also; and when the next morning she sent me word that she was not able to join me at breakfast, I went again to her door and begged her to allow me to send for Dr. Hunt, but she would not even admit me."

"What was this quarrel about?"

"Oh, almost all our quarrels have been about a certain document which has long been a bone of contention between us, and this one was an outgrowth from the same subject."

"Was that document a certificate of marriage?" craftily inquired Emil Correlli.

"Yes."

"Gerald, were you ever really married to Anna?" demanded the young man.

"Isn't that a very singular question, Emil?" he inquired, with cool dignity. "What led you to ask it?"

"Something that Anna herself once said to me suggested the thought," Emil replied. "I know, of course, the circumstances of your early attachment—that for her you left another woman whom you had taken to Rome. I once asked Anna the same question, but she would not an-

1001 Fashion Masterpieces of 17 Famous Designers All Shown in My $100,000 Free Book—Long Credit

MANY MONTHS TO PAY

(c) 1917 M. L. A.

Send for my Style Book because of the advantage that most appeals to you. I attract some women simply through the saving in price. Others are charmed by the beauty of my styles. Unfailing quality of workmanship and material wins the particular folks. Those who have failed in being satisfied elsewhere turn to me because of guaranteed satisfaction.

Rich and poor alike enjoy the convenience of my open charge account. Prompt service binds new customers to me permanently.

Do Not Wait

This is probably the most widely known Style Book in America. Each season it brings out scores of the most popular fashions. Most women have learned that the styles it shows are invariably correct.

Last season, I had to disappoint 100,000 late inquirers. I offer you a free copy now. If you wait you are almost sure to miss it.

It is a bigger Book than usual. It shows a great many things in lifelike colors. It will acquaint you in advance of the season with the latest modes for Fall and Winter.

It pictures 1001 articles of women's and children's wear.

Suits—Coats—Dresses—Waists
Skirts—Hats—Shoes—Lingerie—Furs
Underwear, Children's Wear, etc.
Also 300 Kinds of Piece Goods

To get it, simply mail the coupon below.

Gold Medal Styles

Thousands of women have known me for years as a style expert. My experience has taught me that nine out of ten new styles are failures. Few designers produce more than one or two really good models in a season.

So I get my styles by offering prizes to hundreds of famous experts. This brings me their best ideas first. To my own staff, I offer gold medals. I use my own time to search out models in this country and abroad and to reproduce them at reasonable prices.

Then all models are submitted to a board of seventeen fashion authorities. The cream of all selections goes into my Style Book.

It is seldom that the judgment of so many experts goes wrong. That's why my styles are so popular; why my creations are usually the season's hits.

Divide the Cost

If you permit me, I will show you how credit will save you money. So with your Style Book will come a Credit Card opening your account here.

When you wish anything, simply tell me to send it on approval, prepaid. Judge your selections in your own way. If they fall short of your expectations, return them at my expense.

If you keep it, I will divide your bill into several payments coming a month apart. Such a plan means perfect satisfaction and better things. Thus you save on first cost and you save by cutting out waste.

By dividing the cost, folks buy better and articles last longer. One pay-day doesn't have to bear the burden of a season's wardrobe.

Send Only "SALTS" Wool Velour $1.00

Express Prepaid—$2.25 a Month

This delightful, handsome and luxurious coat, stunningly fashioned, is just a sample of my 1001 new styles. It is a prize design and one of which I am extremely proud. Nothing can approach it for less than twice my price.

SALT'S WOOL VELOUR

It is an extremely splendid quality fine winter weight genuine Salt's wool velour. It is so heavy that it does not require lining. It will wear indefinitely and always look beautiful.

Large Raglan Sleeve and long flaring back. Smartly tailored loose belt in front; may be removed if desired. Pockets are well tailored and smartly stitched. Cuffs have a deep gauntlet effect and the stitching and large button trimming is unusually pleasing.

Large Cape Collar extends to a depth of ten inches in back; is trimmed with four rows of tailored stitching and big buttons. May be buttoned up around the face and provides ample protection in stormiest weather. Length 48 in.

$1.00 With Order and $2.25 Monthly

Colors: Navy blue, black, dark green, Burgundy or brown. Sizes to fit misses—14, 16 and 18 years; ladies' sizes, 32 to 44 bust measure. Large sizes cost one-fifth more. No. A4M883. Price, $11.98 prepaid . . . . . .

Free Furniture Book on Request

Your account with me is also good with a mammoth Housefurnishing concern. If you ask, I will also send you their Bargain Book, picturing home things on a year's credit.

$10.00 Left Over

On all your expenses in wearing apparel for a season, I will save you at least $10.00. I will do this while giving you nicer styles and better quality. You will have at least as many things.

So under my plan at the end of a season, you will have $10.00 left over. Or you can have something extra for yourself for that amount. Either way, it is a pleasing surprise.

I accomplish this saving simply because I buy for half a million women at one time. My life has been spent in learning how to secure lowest prices. I never get my things from middlemen. I deal exclusively with mills and makers.

My garments are made in my own shops. There the strictest economy is practiced. Then I have no salesmen or collectors; no store expense; no end-of-the-season left-overs.

For all these reasons, I urge you to ask for my Book now. I can't promise it if you delay.

swer me directly—she evaded it in a way to confirm my suspicions rather than to allay them. And now this will—it seems very strange that she should have made it if——"

"Pray, Emil, do not distress yourself over anything so absurd," coldly interposed Gerald Goddard, but with almost hueless lips. "However, if you continue to entertain doubts upon the subject, you have but to go to the Church of the—the next time you visit Rome, ask to see the records for the year 18—, and you will find the marriage of your sister duly recorded there."

"I beg your pardon," apologized the doubter, now fully reassured by the above shrewdly fashioned answer, "but Anna was always so infernally jealous of you, and made herself so wretched over the fear of losing your affection, that I could think of no other reason for her foolishness. Now, about this will," he added, hastily changing the subject and referring to the document. "I don't feel quite right to have all Anna's fortune, in addition to my own, and no doubt the poor girl would have repented of her rash act if she could have lived long enough to get over her anger and realize what she was doing. I don't need the money, and, Gerald, I am willing to make over something to you, especially as I happen to know that you have sunk the most of your money in unfortunate speculations," the young man concluded, Mr. Goddard's sad, white face appealing to his generosity.

"Thank you, Emil," he quietly replied; "but I cannot accept your very kind offer. Since it was Anna's wish that you should have her property, I prefer that the will should stand exactly as she made it. I cannot take a dollar of the money—not even what 'the law would allow' in view of our relations to each other."

"Pray do not take it to heart like that, old boy," Correlli said, kindly, after a moment, "and let me persuade you to accept at least a few thousands."

"Thank you, but I cannot. Please do not press the matter, for my decision is unalterable."

"But how the deuce are you going to get along?"

"I shall manage very well," was the grave rejoinder. "I have a few hundreds which will suffice for my present needs, and, if my hands have not lost their cunning, I can abundantly provide for my future by means of my profession. By the way, what are your own plans?—if I may inquire," he concluded, to change the subject.

"I am going to return immediately to New York—I am bound to find that girl," he said.

"Then you were not successful in your search?" Mr. Goddard remarked.

"No, and yes. I found out that she arrived safely in New York, where she was met by a young lawyer—Royal Bryant by name—who immediately spirited her away to some place after dodging the policeman I had set on her track. I surmise that he has put her in the care of some of his own friends. I went to him and demanded that he tell me where she was, but I might just as well have tried to extract information from a stone as from that astute disciple of the law—blast him! He finally intimated that my room would be better than my company, and that I might hear from him later on."

"Ah! he has doubtless taken her case in hand—she has chosen him as her attorney," said Mr. Goddard.

"It looks like it," snapped the young man; "but he will not find it an easy matter to free her from me; the marriage was too public and too shrewdly managed to be successfully contested."

"It was the most shameful and dastardly piece of villainy that I ever heard of," exclaimed Gerald Goddard, indignantly, "and——"

"And you evidently intend to take the girl's part against me," sneered his companion, his anger blazing forth hotly. "If I remember rightly, you rather admired her yourself."

"I certainly did; she was one of the purest and sweetest girls I ever met," was the dignified reply. "Emil, you have not a ghost of a chance of supporting your claim if the matter comes to trial, and I beg that you will quietly relinquish it without litigation," he concluded, appealingly.

"Not if I know myself," was the defiant retort.

"But that farce was no marriage."

"All the requirements of the law were fulfilled, and I fancy that any one who attempts to prove to the contrary will find himself in deeper water than will be comfortable, in spite of your assertion that I 'have not a ghost of a chance.'"

The Kingdom of Our Birthright

In running this series we are not advocating belief in astrology or faith in the pretended talismanic charm of birth-stones, although these beliefs have persisted from remote antiquity and have not a few devotees even in this present age of reason. Yet as myths and superstitions that have dominated through the ages they possess historic interest and educational value. Miss October will appear with a pleasing message next month.—EDITOR.

MISS SEPTEMBER.

THE sign Libra (The Balance) exercises a benign influence over those born between the 22nd of September and the 23rd of October, for they are endowed by nature with spiritual intuitions and helpful foresight. First impressions are usually their best, as their sensitive natures grasp by intuitive insight truths which others discover only through experience. While success generally follows their efforts, it would be greater, if a lesser degree of positiveness could be maintained. We owe to Colton some very helpful advice to persons born under this sign: "Accustom yourself to submit on all and every occasion, and on the most minute, no less than on the most important circumstances of life, to a small present evil, to obtain a greater distant good. This will give decision, tone and energy to the mind, which, thus disciplined, will often reap victory from defeat and honor from repulse."

Several strong types appear among those born within this period, but the faculty of intuition is the predominating characteristic of all. In one type the speculative propensity is very strong, coupled with a natural longing for excitement. They are quick to perceive which enables them to make money in quick buying and selling. Were it not for a strict regard for the dictates of conscience they might become gamblers, but even with this safeguard they must shun immoral associates.

Another type, controlled almost wholly by a keen sense of intuition which seldom fails them, will, like the first, make successful tradespeople. If they marry philosophical, thoughtful persons, there is sure to be incompatibility, for Libra never gives a reason. They may be right; quite likely will be, but why they cannot tell.

Another type will be interested in all new things, being dilligent students of all scientific knowledge, and possess a natural gift for mechanics superior to those born under any other of the twelve signs. They excel in mathematics and belong to the world of mechanical inventors and originators. They are very social, frank and open in their affections. They keep to their ideals, and dislike combat of any kind. They like quiet, when, uninterrupted they may work according to their determined purposes.

Children born under this influence should be held in strict control and intelligent guidance by their parents, for they require careful training and broad and thorough education. "The aim of education should be to teach us rather how to think than what to think—rather to improve our minds, so as to enable us to think for ourselves, than to load the memory with the thoughts of other men."

September Birth-Stone is the Sapphire

It is of great importance that those born in September should wear their birth-stone as a constant reminder, for it symbolizes constancy, and without this virtue they will not make the best of the grand nature that fate gave them. To succeed, there must be constancy of purpose, yet, it is often consistent with constancy to change seemingly well laid plans that took years of labor and study to develop. Failure is frequently the light to success, yet it takes the most heroic constancy to pick up the broken threads and start again with experience as the greater asset.

Millet, the painter of the famous "Angelus," in the depths of sorrow and with a supreme effort, worked at his canvas all the spare hours he could take from his menial labors as a railway porter, that his beloved wife, in a dying condition, might have strength-giving food and medicine. Millet's first failures in art plunged him into the direst state of poverty, and while he lived and worked in the grip of trial and sorrow, it intensified all the fineness of a beautiful nature, which gave eloquence to his brush, and adversity did what prosperity never could have accomplished.

It is not by any one chapter in the individual life that failure or success is proven. It is the summing up, the amount gleaned from the possibilities given us with life, that tells with what constancy we have labored.

Constancy of Purpose Applied in the Schools

Miss September, with books swinging in a strap, brings visions of school days soon to come. During vacation time, the youngsters have grown physically stronger while storing their minds with knowledge of the woods and valleys, the flowers and bees, the birds and creeping ants.

Too much cannot be said in praise of the modern system of school gardening, which has proven that the education goes on more actively out of the schoolroom, than in it. School gardening gives the child a full opportunity to work out his own plans, while applying what he has learned at school. In this way both girls and boys are happily employed. They feel they are producers, and the spirit of rivalry adds enthusiasm and interest. They learn carefulness, a regard for property rights, and carry their knowledge into the home.

Thrift, taught and encouraged by the school bank system, is another important educational feature of modern learning. This banking system was founded by Professor Laurent, a Belgian teacher of Ghent, in 1873, and first inaugurated in America at Long Island city by another Belgian, John H. Thirty. The idea was at once very popular with the school children, and has so continued, and besides the advantage of the savings, children are spending less for unwholesome candy, soda and gum. That this must be so is apparent in the wonderful story told in actual figures, for the children's deposits in the school banks have gone over the $1,300,000 mark and there are over 217,000 child depositors.

In taking money to school it is accompanied by a deposit card, and after record of amount is made, the card is returned to child to be taken home.

The deposits are received on specified days and usually the money is kept by the school teachers until the sum of three dollars is on hand, when it is deposited in the child's name in a savings bank paying not less than three per cent. From Maine to California the children are depositing their pennies, and the custom merits great encouragement. The time will come when we shall begin to hear of great successes which were made possible because of the constant saving of pennies during school days. It trains the young mind to look ahead and to become purposeful.

Make this little school maid by covering a doll with crepe paper, and for variety, the hat, tie and band around skirt of a different color.

The Simplest Way to End a Corn

DECIDE now to master your corn forever. Let today's corn be the last. Blue-jay will free you from the most painful corn. Apply one of these soothing plasters tonight. Pain ends. In 48 hours the corn disappears. Only Blue-jay gives this insurance. Paring is temporary. Harsh liquids are dangerous.

"Possibly, but I doubt it. All the same, I warn you, here and now, Correlli, that I shall use what influence I have toward freeing that beautiful girl from your power."

"Do you mean it—you will publicly appear against me if the matter goes into court?"

"I do."

"Do your worst! I do not fear you; you can prove nothing."

"No, I have no absolute proof, but I can at least give the court the benefit of my suspicions and opinion."

"What! and compromise your dead wife before a scandal-loving public?"

Crumbs of Comfort

Goodness heightens beauty.
Contentment wears a crown.
Ambition is a glorious cheat.
Fear and cruelty are ever twins.
Books are the mentors of the heart.
Anger manages everything done badly.
Worry is always fine rust on the blade.
There is small choice in rotting apples.
Sleep is a poor guest where care lodges.
He that sows craft shall harvest trouble.
Friendship is the best cement of like minds.
A man in authority is but as a candle flame.
A poor teacher may be a hinderer of his lesson.
Fear is an acid; love and truth are sweet juices.
God is ever the lender of all of our created joys.
Prayers are steep steps a soul has taken to climb.
A youth of labor has the winning of an age of ease.
Hasty counsels are generally followed by repentance.
Poverty may want many things, but avarice needs all.
The body of a man is one of the great miracles of God.
Character is found in the most perfectly educated will.
The truest courage is always mixed with circumspection.
Try to leave unsaid the wrong thing at the right moment.
A river flows smoothly when it follows a straight course.
Cultivation is as necessary to the mind as food to the body.
Despair is the offspring of fear, of laziness, and of impatience.
The darkest day is sure of finding an end with another day's dawn.
The most manifest sign of wisdom is to be seen in calm cheerfulness.
A light supper, a good night's sleep, and a fine morning makes a hero.
There is always more day to dawn; the sun is but a morning star.
Fortune is rarely brought home in boats that were not carefully steered.
There is a nobleness of mind that can heal all wounds better than salve.
He that opposes us strengthens our nerves and finely sharpens our will.
Some men, like some pictures, are fitter for a corner than for a full light.
In adversities and difficulties arm yourself with patience, firmness and fortitude.
A place can be found for a peaceable man in the smallest and most crowded room.
The best portions of a good man's life are unremembered acts of truth, kindness and love.
No man ever offended his own conscience, but first or last it was revenged upon him for it.
If we had no defects in ourselves it is certain we should not take pleasure in those of others.
Humanity never seems so beautiful as when asking forgiveness, or else when forgiving another.
Commend a fool for his wit, or a knave for his honesty, and they will receive you into their bosom.
A man who gives his children habits of industry provides for them better than by giving them great wealth and idleness.

When the Light went out

by Hapsburg Liebe

Copyright, 1917, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

GROPING in the sticky darkness of his room in a tenement district lodging-house, Morris Gayle found a chair and dragged it slowly to the one window. Wearily he sat down, and wearily he began to stare at the metallic gleam of the wet pavements below. To go back over his life, day by day, was a thing he did every evening now; Gayle was not yet thirty-three, but already he was finding more in the past than he found in the present or future. And that is no good sign.

His reflections were not altogether pleasant. Gayle had much to regret. And as he thought on and on, he gathered his ragged coat close about him, as though he were cold.

There was a rap at the door, the rap of one who would not be denied admittance. Gayle rose half frightenedly, touched a lighted match to a stub of a candle that set in the neck of a dusty bottle, and bade the caller enter. The latch turned with a slow deliberateness, and the door creaked inward; then a tall man with graying temples and a thin, strong face stepped into the feeble glare of the tallow dip.

"Tom Wardlaw—from home!" exclaimed Gayle. Oddly, he remembered the name better than he remembered the man himself. He ran on feverishly: "Let's see, Tom, you—you used to be an engineer on the railroad that passed through home, through little old Wellsboro. Didn't you?"

The visitor's eyes lost their look of stern reproof as they noted the gloom and the hopelessness that was depicted in Gayle's whole appearance.

"Yes," slowly, "it is Tom Wardlaw, from Wellsboro."

He advanced, trying to smile, and held out his hand. Gayle took it and clasped it weakly.

"I see," said Wardlaw, breaking a heavy silence, "that you still shave. As long as a man shaves, there's hope for him, Gayle," and this came like a bullet—"Gayle, you've got to go back to Alice."

"Back to Alice!" Gayle jerked his hand nervously from the other's grip. "No, Tom Wardlaw; not that; I'm dead to Alice."

"You are not dead to Alice," Wardlaw contradicted flatly. "When you had ten thousand dollars sent her as life insurance money, you fooled a great many people; but Alice has never believed that you were dead. She believes the truth; and the truth, Gayle, is this:

"You brought your invention to this city, this boundless city. You sold that invention for a fortune, and money made you a fool. You went the gait. The patient little woman you left in the vine-covered cottage back on little Wellsboro's Rocky Hill became insignificant when compared to the butterflies your money brought sailing around your head. So you decided to 'die.' You did a good job, but you didn't fool Alice!

"And now it's been seven years, Gayle. And Alice has waited, alone in the little house that she helped you build, those seven years for you. And listen, man: Just as she used to burn a light in the window to show you the way up the hill when you came home at night from your work, just so she still burns it—through every hour of every black night! That lamp has set there in that one window for seven years. So you've got to go back to her, Gayle. And you've got to be a man in the future. Do you understand that? You've got to be a man in the future."

Force of habit drove Morris Gayle to the window. His unseeing eyes began to stare again toward the wet pavements below.

"Seven years," he muttered; and it sounded as though he were speaking to himself—"seven years. And they've been as long to me as they've been to Alice. * * * * You were right, Wardlaw; I went wild because of the city's glamour and the things my money brought to me. But, Wardlaw, it was short; my money was all gone at the end of a year. Then I repented. I repented most bitterly. I would have gone back to Alice then, had I not been ashamed to go. I merit your condemnation of me, Wardlaw, I know; but—I have suffered too."

He had faced about; he was looking the other squarely in the eye.

"How did you find me, Wardlaw?" he finally asked.

"I have been spending my vacations each year since your supposed death in looking for you," answered the engineer. "Like Alice, I refused to believe you were dead. I learned from the proprietor of this lodging-house that you had a room here. And you're about broke, Gayle, or you'd stay at a better place than this."

Gayle turned out his empty pockets, which was sufficient. He sank to a chair and bent his head to the back of it. Wardlaw continued to stand.

"A man," said Gayle, "who is as full of regret as I am, can't hold a job when he gets it."

There was a long period of utter silence, save for the clatter of hoofs and the rush of wheeled things in the streets below. Morris Gayle was once more back in the little vine-covered cottage, with Alice's dark-brown head bending to his knee, her lips singing low and sweetly an old, old lovesong. Again was his hand fondling her hair, caressing it. Again did they walk in the evening, laughing and naming stars and wishing, laughing and naming stars and wishing:

"God!" he sobbed aloud.

Wardlaw's face softened with pity. He understood fully. He took a step forward, put a hand on the suffering man's shoulder, and dragged the heavy head gently around.

"She'll be glad to forgive you, Morris," he said. "Come; let's go back. You must, Morris. You must go back before the light goes out. For the light will go out, some day—and when the light goes out, then what?"

Tom Wardlaw, splendid man, his soul bleached white with the fire of a sorrow of his own, which was a sorrow that he never spoke of, turned away to hide his jerking lips from the other's gaze.

"How I wish I could!" Gayle rose, turned to the window, and then faced his caller again, "But I'm ashamed to go back now. I'm broken in spirit, penniless, in tatters. It would be too cheap a thing, too unfair. Wardlaw, I can't go!"

"But the light," reminded the engineer, in a voice that seemed to have come from far away. He took Gayle's ragged coat by its rumpled lapels. "Morris, it will go out, some day. It's terrible, when a light like that goes out. I know about this, Morris. I had a light that went out. And the darkness that came to that window——"

In a strained, uneven voice he went on: "I don't think you've heard of it, Gayle, so it won't bore you to hear of it now. I had a sweetheart once, who lived in the old home village, in Wellsboro. She lived with her parents, in a little vine-covered cottage like that you built for yourself and Alice. Each time I passed through the village, I would blow what railroad men call 'The Whippoorwill' with my engine's whistle; and when she heard it, she would put a lighted lamp in a front window as an answer to my signal. Then there came a time when I blew my whistle and had no answer. * * * *

"Shortly after that, Gayle, the light of my life went out. Not that she was false; she had never promised herself to me. * * * * * When I pass that window now, Gayle, I try to keep from looking toward it. But I see it, whether I look or not. Morris, for Heaven's sake, go back while your light is still burning for you!"

"But it's too late!" Gayle cried smotheredly. "I tell you, Wardlaw, it's too late!"

"It's never too late," declared Wardlaw. He corrected himself—"Not while there's a light to show you the way up the hill. Come; go to her and make reparation. You're not an old man yet. Come!"

Gayle paced the length of the room and back. Then he halted before Tom Wardlaw and determinedly:

"I'll go. And I'll try to make reparation."

* * * * * * * * * * * *

He started immediately. Wardlaw bought a fare to Wellsboro and gave it to him, then saw him off with the heartiest of handshakes.

Gayle found the village much the same, when he stepped from the midnight train to the deserted station platform. The same stores, the same tall-spired church, the same blacksmith shop, greeted him like sleeping friends in the moonlight.

He set out down the main street, and a walk of ten minutes brought him to the foot of Rocky Hill. There he stopped and lifted his eyes. In the vine-covered cottage on the crest there was a light, but it was somehow dim. Gayle took a few more steps, and stopped; a realization of his own unworthiness had put up a well-nigh insurmountable barrier between him and the vine-covered cottage.

"I can't do it!" he throated to himself. "I can't, I can't!"

"But you can!" said the soul of him. "You can, you can!"

He drew himself together and almost ran up the slope. Before he was halfway of the hill, he saw that the lamp in the window had begun to sputter! At the sight of that, Gayle ran on, faster, faster. Two more minutes, and he had reached the vinehung veranda, where the sweet fragrance of honeysuckles made the very air intoxicating. He rapped on the front door and stepped backward, with his heart beating wildly. There was no response.

A great and smothering fear fell over him. He stepped to the end of the veranda, and saw that the light had gone out!

Yes, the light had gone out.

With a choking cry, Morris Gayle ran to the front door, threw himself against it and broke the latch. The hallway was dark and still, and full of the odor of faded roses.

"Alice!" cried Gayle. "Alice!"

And a voice answered: "Here, Morris," weakly.

He staggered, sobbing, afraid, into the little living-room.

He saw that there was a low-burned fire in the old-fashioned fireplace. And before it, crumpled on the floor, her shoulders shaking, her wealth of dark-brown hair flowing over her bare arms, was Alice, Alice—who had just given up at last!

With a great, glad cry Gayle sprang to her, stooped and caught her up in his arms and kissed her.

"I have always believed that you would come back, until tonight," she told him. "And I saved the ten thousand dollars you sent me. With that we can begin all over again."

A little later, Gayle told her about Wardlaw. When he had finished the little story, Alice said to him this:

"Tom was right. His sweetheart had never promised herself to him. You see, I was that sweetheart, Morris."

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

I want to talk on stepmothers a while, as I am one. I married a divorced man with two children and they live in this city. My husband supports the two little girls and gives their mother alimony. He dearly loved the little girls, five and three years old, and was in the habit of seeing them often at his mother's home. After we were married I used to go with him on these visits and before long they came to our home and we learned to love each other. When my baby boy came they were as eager over him as his father and I were and grew very fond of him as the years went on. He is now seven years old and his little sister is five. He is in school and now, sisters, comes the problem. His half sisters are ten and twelve years old and both attend the same school and his little playmates throw it up to him that his father has two wives and the two half-sisters. I cannot stop the little girls from coming to our house for they are as dear to me as my own children. My husband says the children at school will soon stop teasing my little boy but I fear not and what will my little girl do when she starts to go to school for she won't be able to stand the teasing as brother does. My husband says he will move to another town if I wish but we don't want to do that. I know that my children are as pure and good as any children but why should they be hooted at and teased because their father has a divorced wife.

Let me hear some comments on my problem through COMFORT's pages.

Love to all readers, Perplexed.

MINERAL WELLS, TEXAS.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

I want to ask your advice about taking lessons from a correspondence school. I want very much to get an education and as I cannot go to public schools (because I have to work and do not have time) I thought of taking lessons from a correspondence school but many people have advised me against it, tell me I would be wasting my time and money and that the certificates they give are not worth anything. Some of you may advise me to go to private or night schools but I live in a small town where there are no schools of that sort. Of course I could study at home with benefit to myself but it isn't like taking lessons from a school.

I hope you will give me your advice for it will mean much to me and I shall be very grateful.

Wishing COMFORT staff and readers all success,

ANNIE.

Annie. It is my opinion that the people who think their time and money wasted in taking a correspondence school course are people who didn't make the most of what the school offered them and consequently were more at fault than the school. Select your school with care though and then make up your mind to stick to it and study diligently, and, remember all of us are wishing you success, and perhaps someone can give you their personal experience along that line. —Ed.

ARKANSAS.

MY DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

It seems I have, along with many others, formed the habit of bringing my troubles and other affairs to the columns of dear old COMFORT. I wonder how many of the sisters living in the country are familiar with the same school conditions as prevail in our state, this section at least, and are satisfied with them? We have a term of three months' school beginning in July, then skip three or four months and have another three months' term, making but six months during the year, of school. This state has a compulsory school law, which in our particular district is not enforced, any flimsy excuse sufficing to allow children to absent themselves from school for a month at a time or more. Parents keep children from school to pick cotton, fruit or get up fuel, etc. Our teachers are mostly recruited from the ranks of beginners, who practise on our children and as soon as the needed experience is gained depart for town or city to teach, where the terms are eight or nine months and remuneration greater. Our directors are so economical in trying to save five or ten dollars per month on teachers' salary for possible future repairs (which they usually forget to have made) that of course a really experienced teacher cannot afford to take a district school, if he has to live on his salary alone. Are these conditions common in rural districts or do I look at it in a wrong light, having always been accustomed to city schools heretofore.

I, too, believe in Woman Suffrage and believe their vote would change many disagreeable things in this state. But, Arkansas is coming into her own rapidly. She has so many wonderful natural resources, agriculture, fruit growing, gas, oil and coal, pearl fisheries, manufactories of almost every sort, health resorts, etc. And to the pioneers of the state, we late comers owe a great debt of gratitude, in that they have labored so hard to make the way easier for us.

I enjoy COMFORT. May it live long and continue in its good work of helpfulness is the sincere wish of "Arkansas Grouch."

TEXAS.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

I am here because I want to tell you that I like your paper very much and think the letters are wonderful. "Mother's Old Maid" is asking someone if she can tell her anything about me. I suspect not as I don't know much about myself. I have been in school since I was six years old, till three years ago when I began to study dancing. Terrible, isn't it, but I love it and I have been on the stage. I wish I were like F. G. C., and loved home, country, Sunday School and such, but I am not wicked even if I do not care for such things. I love dancing, music, bright lights, flowers and everything gay. Yes, I have lived in the country and Daddy and Mamma live there now and I like to stay at home a little while at a time. So many people think that if a girl ever goes away from home she is disgraced forever. I have traveled, been in all kind of places and have had thrilling experiences but I can still claim my honor. I have one thing against country people and that is, they will condemn a girl much more quickly than city people. A girl has many more privileges in the city. Some mother will say there are many more temptations. Well, if your girl isn't strong enough to resist them, keep her at home and then watch out.

The most important subject we are discussing is children. I love them, but do you think it right for a woman to have five or six children to care for? She never has any pleasures as she has to work so hard to care for the newest baby. I am a believer in children, but in small families and five or six years' difference in their ages. I want a home some day. Don't think because I am a dancer I do not love home life. So many people think we are not human, that we are without life and just clay that can stand on its toes and smile at the crowd (audience). I hear Mrs. A. B. C. saying, "You can't be nice to wear such short dresses and do such high kicks." We give the people what they want, not what we want for if we did that I am sure I wouldn't do the high kicks as I can assure you they are not so easy as they look. (Get behind the door and try it.)

Shall I come and tell you all about my life, work and everything else? I am leaving tomorrow to join my company to go in training. We will start out in September but will give private dances until then. I love everything and everybody and my greatest problem in life is to keep my weight down to one

"SATTERLEE did you say? What has he got to do with your brother?"

"Jim knocked a boy down in Satterlee's stables years ago for ill-using a horse, and the boy died. Satterlee was going to prosecute him, but he ran for it, and never was caught. I don't know how Simpson got to know it, but he did, and he's held it over Jim and me ever since."

"Is it Jones you mean by Jim?" a sudden light breaking in upon her. "But I always thought he was devoted to Mr. Mayne."

"He's frightened of him, more like. Too frightened ever to try to leave him. Besides, it's an easy place, and he would have to get a character to go to another. Oh, he'd never dare leave Mayne."

"But the Lord Satterlee you speak of is dead," Nerine said, musingly. "And his son, who is engaged to my sister, is Lord Satterlee now. I think he would be willing to do a good deal to get rid of Mr. Mayne; perhaps he would give your brother money to get out of the country; at least I know he would give him time." She rubbed her forehead worriedly. "What is the good of talking like this?" she cried. "We can't prosecute Mayne, and have you witness against him. It would all come out about my mother."

"No," said Mrs. Simpson; "not if you don't want any publicity, we can't. But you and I could go and see Simpson, and tell him we were going to have it all out, and that if he restored all the money he'd put away these years past, we'd keep it quiet. No fear, my dear, of his ever letting on that he was not married to Mrs. Lispenard. That is, if you think Jim could be got out of the way first."

"We've really only the diary to go on," the girl rejoined. "I wonder if it's enough."

"Marriage certificates don't lie. Oh, you'll find we have plenty to settle Simpson."

"It would be worse for him if he had to pay back all, or all he has, than only these last eighteen months' money, wouldn't it? And it could be managed more quietly, too. Not that I want to spare him publicity, only that I don't want our name to be in every paper coupled with his."

"It'll be the best way, and the quietest, too, you mind me," Mrs. Simpson said, jubilantly; but suddenly her face fell. "I'll be rid of Simpson and the fear of his doing for me some day, if we drive him out of England," she remarked with doleful emphasis; "but how am I going to live? I'll never get a penny more from him."

"I'll look after you, and in a better way than this. I owe you more than that for your giving me that key."

"I wouldn't want much—I wouldn't, indeed. And perhaps you might let me live in some little cottage near you, and you'd come and see me sometimes. That is," humbly, "if you'd let me leave here."

"I would let you indeed, my poor soul."

"I'd live on almost anything if you'd do that. I wouldn't be much of an expense to you—I wouldn't, truly," she added, with the dog-like gratitude which always touched the girl.

"Tell me," Nerine suddenly asked, "didn't you really know me till I showed you my skirt?"

Mrs. Simpson shuddered.

"No more than the dead," she solemnly replied. "But when I did remember you, I was frightened to death that you had come to track me down about that silver business, and afterward, when I learned that you were Simpson's niece, I believed that he had sent you."

"I knew you for certain as soon as I saw my skirt. Tell me, what put it into your head to chloroform me?"

"For fear you'd rouse the house. I used to see Simpson take chloroform for his asthma, years ago, and when I saw it on his washstand, and you standing over the bag, it just come into my head that it would keep you quiet while I got away. If I'd known all I do now, I'd have died rather than done it—you know I would!"

The girl assented, looking straight at her.

"Tell me," she said softly, "you don't do things like that often, do you? At least, you won't when you don't need to."

Mrs. Simpson turned very red, but she spoke up honestly.

"I never stole from any one but Simpson," she said, truthfully. "And whenever he kept me short, I'd go and take whatever I could get. Not at your place; he'd a cottage near London for years he used to go to."

So that was where their stepfather betook himself on those mysterious absences of his; doubtless he enjoyed many things in that cottage near London which would have been looked upon coldly by his friends in the Plymouth Brethren.

"Then you never were at our house before?"

"Never before; and the next time I'll go with you, and we will get rid of Simpson forever."

Nerine hesitated.

"I must see Lord Satterlee first, and find out about Jones; or, I don't know—perhaps we could get Jones away somewhere safe ourselves, and let sleeping dogs lie at Satterlee. I must take a day or two to think."

"I wish we could go tomorrow. But we must look after Jim first. That's a pretty skirt of yours," irrelevantly, pointing to the black-and-purple brocade, "but I wish you'd take it away from here; it reminds me of that day when I might have killed you."

Nerine nodded absently. She was thinking of Jones. There might be other people to settle with, as well as Satterlee. How had Maurice managed Jones that morning when they went to the football match, if he had not held his secret over his head? She must see Maurice; she would send for him tomorrow. But she would have liked to settle with Mr. Mayne with no aid but Mrs. Simpson. Half wild with worry and wonder as to what should be done first, she got up and began to pace the room restlessly.

Snap had risen, too, from his seat beside the fire, and stood staring, a mass of rising bristles.

"What's the matter, Snap? You're not going to fly at me, are you?"

The dog growled furiously.

"Hush! He hears some one, and so do I! Oh, what shall we do if it's Simpson?"

Mrs. Simpson flew to the bedroom door and locked it, utterly forgetful of her foot.

"Lock the other door, quick!" she cried. "He might murder us in this lonely place and no one be any the wiser."

But Nerine stood in the middle of the room, turned to stone. If it were Simpson, and Simpson were Mr. Mayne, she could face him now as she could never perhaps face him again.

Snap tore to the door, growling viciously; some one was coming in the front way, and the girl turned white at the footstep—white, not with fear, but with fury.

She seized her mother's book, jammed in the loose papers, and locked it; then she moved out of sight of any one who should come in the door.

"Oh, why didn't you lock the door?" Mrs. Simpson hurled the words at her as she hobbled across to do it herself. But she was too late.

Snap, in the passage, gave a vicious yelp of pain, and Mr. Mayne, cool, elegant and self-possessed, walked into the room.

CHAPTER XXVI.

"MY PART IN THE PLAY IS DONE!"

"You were going to close your door, were you not?" Mayne said politely to Mrs. Simpson, who confronted him, redder than her satin tea-gown. "And with me outside! Permit me to do it—and remain in! Also, call your dog, or I will knock his brains out."

"Don't you dare to touch him!" threateningly.

"Dare, my dear Mary, is not a word to use to me." Mr. Mayne, not without a glance at Snap, turned to close the door; and confronted his stepdaughter.

Deadly white, her eyes black and narrow with rage, two heavy lines on her forehead, not one of the "black Lispenards" had ever looked more dangerous.

Mr. Mayne gave an unpremeditated start.

"You here!" he said sharply. "Well, I suppose I might have known you would find out who stole your silver. You were always excellent at taking care of your property," with uncomplimentary emphasis.

"I always was, and I always mean to be," she replied, haughtily. "But I suppose, with all your cleverness, you did not imagine that I should come here and find you out."

That was first blood for Nerine, and her nostrils dilated.

"Find me out?" Mr. Mayne was a little staggered. "It is no crime, my dear Nerine, for a man to be found out in helping his poorer—friends," with a glance at Mrs. Simpson to bid her mind what she said.

Nerine advanced a step, and put her back against the door.

"Do not call me dear, and do not add any more lies to your many by talking about your poor friends," she said, icily. "As for the silver, it was the luckiest thing in the world; if Mrs. Simpson had not tried to take it, I would never have found out all about you. How did you dare"—her eyes flashed green as the light caught them—"make out that we were all two years younger than our age? Do you see this book?" pointing to it as she held it clasped to her breast. "I found that in your room while you were away—and I found the key here! Our baptismal certificates and the certificate of our mother's marriage to you are in it. You should have destroyed them before you came to our house—a thief!"

"It seems to me that that word might also be applied to other people." His mincing manner was more pronounced than before, for he never imagined for an instant that he should not get the better of the girl, as he had so many a time. "According to your own words, you saw fit to steal a book which was mine; and, of course, having stolen it, you could insert quite easily any alterations in the dates of those certificates which you might consider necessary. I fear," airily, "that in a court of law your book would be worth very little."

"And I know," she quietly responded, "that it would be worth a good deal—backed up by other things."

Something in her tone staggered Mayne a little.

"What other things?" he asked, defiantly.

"What other things?" Mrs. Simpson, with her hand on Snap's collar, for Mayne carried a loaded stick, burst in furiously—"what other things? Why, me! Wasn't I married to you two years before ever you saw that girl's mother, who never was your wife at all? And haven't you deceived me all these years with stories about your nieces? You'll give up all that money you've stole from those poor children, or she"—pointing at Nerine—"will prosecute you for all you've done, and I will be a witness against you!"

Mayne turned on her with a snarl.

"You'll keep a quiet tongue in your head, or it'll be the worse for you," he exclaimed. "I suppose she's going to pay you well for your lying stories about your marriage; but how are you going to settle that little story about Jim Lister?"

"Do you suppose that Lord Satterlee, who hates you, is going to play into your hands by prosecuting Lister?" Nerine cried, derisively.

It makes no difference whether he does or not. I'll give information to the police about him, and then where will he be?"

"Out of the country before you can do it," answered Nerine, composedly. "I will see to that, Mr. Simpson! Look here!" she continued, with her black brows bent uncompromisingly on him, "your part in the play is done. Unless you sign what I am going to write now, confessing that my mother was never your wife, and your other fraud about our ages, and promising to give back all you have stolen from us, and leave the country, I will have it all out in court. You would never be able to show your face in England again if everything came out."

Mayne gave a snickering laugh.

"You talk very big, my girl," he said. "I might sign anything (which I'm not going to do), and afterward, what's to prevent my going home and going off with everything you've got—eh?"

"Even then"—haughtily—"it would be cheap to us, for we would be rid of you. And do you think"—playing her last card boldly—"that Maurice and Agatha are not acting in other quarters as I am here? I think that we are too strong for you at last—thief, impostor that you are!"

"You're a nice pair, with your lies and your book!" he cried. "What is your precious book any how?"

"My mother's diary, with those certificates I spoke of inside it."

Mayne laughed.

"I told you before what I thought of them! And is that all the evidence you've got? A book you might have written yourself!" As he spoke, he cursed himself inwardly that he had not suspected its existence and destroyed it long ago.

"It's enough for you," Nerine retorted. "Ah!" She jumped back quickly, having fortunately been looking straight at his eyes.

Mayne's spring on her had just missed the book, but he had her by the wrist; he was wonderfully strong, considering how small and frail he looked!

"Let me go!" she exclaimed. It was no time for nicety; in another moment he would have her by both wrists; she struck him full in the face with the book. He fell back for a second; the next he had her, as she had feared, by both arms, and was twisting them. It was agony, but her fingers as yet were fast on the book.

"Quick! help me!" she screamed to Mrs. Simpson.

There was a sharp clicking sound behind Mayne.

"I tell you I'll kill you if you lay a finger on the girl!"

In an instant Mrs. Simpson was at Mayne's side, with her pistol in her hand.

Mayne knew her too well not to believe her. He dropped Nerine's arms and jumped back, so that she nearly fell over him as the door swung open behind her.

Tall, long-armed, clean-built, not an angel from heaven could have been a more joyful sight to Nerine than Fairfax standing in the doorway.

"You!" she screamed, while Mrs. Simpson, pistol in hand, stood over Mayne. "Do you see that man? He is my stepfather, and this woman is his wife. He was married to her two years before he married my mother," she asserted, pantingly.

Fairfax saw Mayne give a quick look at the open door, then at the window.

"None of that, my man!" he said quickly, and had the door locked, the key in his pocket and his stalwart self between Mayne and the window like a flash. "Now, Miss Lispenard, what is this all about, and what was this gentleman doing to you when I came in?"

"Twisting her arms, the brute, to get the book!" sobbed Mrs. Simpson.

"And you stopped him. It is well you did, for if he had twisted them a minute longer I would have broken his neck. You don't need your pistol now, though," he added calmly, pointing to a distant table, where Mrs. Simpson deposited it without a word.

"Now, Miss Lispenard——"

Nerine briefly told him of all that had just occurred.

As she stopped, Mayne began to bluster; he would have them all taken up for intimidation; the story was all a lie.

"You have to prove that," Fairfax cut him short, "and in the meantime I fancy you had better make the best terms you can with Miss Lispenard. You don't seem to have much of a case against her, so perhaps it would be cheaper for you to settle it out of court. As for your giving information against your wife's brother, or going back to the Lispenards' home and stealing more from them"—sharply—"I will guard against that."

He took a pencil and paper from his pocket and looked at Nerine.

"What I understand from you," he said, significantly, "is that if Mr. Simpson signs a full confession of his fraudulent marriage with your mother, and his lie about your ages, and also promises to leave the country at once and never return, you or his wife will not prosecute him for bigamy or fraud. Considering, of course, that he makes over to you all the stocks and money in the bank in his name, to which he had never any right."

Nerine nodded.

"If he does not sign that and keep to the agreement," she said steadily, "he will be prosecuted on every count there is against him, and we will make him give an account of every penny he has taken from us. If he cannot return the whole amount—why, I suppose it will mean going to prison!"

She spoke to Fairfax, but she kept her eyes on Mayne's face, and saw it change.

"Write it all out, Mr. Fairfax," she went on evenly, "and I think Mr. Simpson will sign it."

"I, Clarence Simpson, sometimes known as Clarence Mayne, do hereby confess——" Fairfax wrote steadily on till the whole tale was down in black and white.

"Now sign it!" he said quietly.

Mayne looked from one to the other like a vicious animal cowed, at bay.

His deeds had not sounded well when read aloud; they would sound less well in open court. He made a quick summary of his worldly goods banked in London under his own name, and a mental calculation as to his best course as he glanced from one face to the other.

"There seems," he said, with his old manner of airy patronage, "to be a good deal of unnecessary ceremony and—ah—coercion about this paper; but if you insist"—Mr. Mayne took up the pencil handed to him—"of course, my dear Nerine, I must oblige you."

He wrote his name with a steady hand. Then he smoothed his necktie and took up his hat.

"You have been very fortunate, and luck has played into your hands," he said dryly to his stepdaughter. "I suppose you hardly realize that. If circumstances had not aided you, I should not be leaving Lispenard House as I am. By the way, I may as well tell you that I have no intention of ever returning there. Jones will pack up my things and forward them to me."

Mrs. Simpson gave a shriek.

"You'll never go now, and inform against Jim!"

She almost flung herself at Mayne's feet, and he drew back distastefully.

"My good woman, I never meant to," he returned, politely. "It was only a little threat to keep you in calm solitude and away from me. Now that Miss Lispenard has discovered you, my part in the play, as she so pithily says, is done."

He stood smoothing his hat almost absently.

Nerine stepped forward.

"Mr. Mayne," she said, impulsively, "will you give me your word of honor about that? If we are not to believe you, I would like to know it now."

Mayne looked at her.

"For a change," he said, quietly, "I am telling you the absolute truth. I shall go to London, and then abroad. I am making my last exit."

Then, with a bow of the utmost politeness, he turned to the door, and was gone. He had never bestowed a parting word or glance on Mrs. Simpson.

Nerine drew a long breath.

She began to put on her hat and jacket.

"He is going to do something dreadful! I saw it in his face. Quick! Come with me to Combe station. I am going to catch the express that doesn't stop here; I must get home before he does!"

"But you can't go and wait for a man like that all alone in an empty house!" Fairfax said sharply. "Besides, what can he do? He said he was not going there."

"All the more reason for him to go. I know he means mischief. He is going to steal something—or burn the house down!"

She ran over to Mrs. Simpson and kissed her.

"You've done so much for me! You shall never be sorry if I can help it," she said gratefully. "I will write to you as soon as I can."

Then she touched Fairfax sharply on the arm.

"Come with me to the station," she said; "I will just catch that train, and Mr. Mayne has not thought of it. When I am gone, you must telegraph to Maurice to meet me at Lispenard at once. And you must keep on sending messages till you get an answer. Then, if you will, you must send a message to nurse at the farm that I had to go home."

She nodded once more at Mrs. Simpson, and went out into the welcome night, Fairfax at her heels.

CHAPTER XXVII.

MAYNE'S LAST APPEARANCE.

Lispenard House stood dark, and, to all appearances, untenanted, that night when Nerine reached it. She had just caught the train, and must have passed the slow one which carried the unconscious Mr. Mayne somewhere on the road. He could not reach Lispenard House for two hours more, yet the girl grudged every minute that passed. Oh, if Maurice would only get there before him!

She rang the bell loudly; rang it again; and knocked till the dark garden seemed to echo. She had not counted on being unable to get in, and it seemed a much more terrible undertaking alone in the dark than it had with Fairfax beside her in the sunshine—this holding the house fortified against her stepfather.

Where could Jane be? Out, of course—impatiently—and gallivanting.

Afraid to knock again, she tried the door softly, and, to her great delight, it was not locked. She swung it open, and was inside in pitchy darkness. Thank goodness, her stupid knocking had not roused Jones in the stable!

She locked and bolted the heavy door, and began to make her way in the dark through the familiar passages, to the morning-room. How ghostly it was, and how her steps echoed on the stone floor! For the first time in her life she was frightened. She dared not look before her lest she might see some dreadful face peering at her through the dark. With shut eyes she felt her trembling way to the morning-room door; once there, she would have a light in no time.

It was with a relief that was almost sickening that she struck a match and lighted the lamp in the familiar room. Cold and dismal as it looked, it was a heavenly refuge after those dark, whispering passages. There was material for a fire built in the grate, and she set a match to it. The flickering warmth lighted up the silent room, and brought back her courage—which was as well—for, courage or none, those passages must be faced, and Jane's whereabout discovered. Lamp in hand, Nerine made her way to the kitchen, but it was cold and dark; there was no sign of Jane. She made sure that the back door was fast, and the windows; though of course there would be no keeping Mr. Mayne out when once he arrived, since she knew he always carried the key which let him in to his own part of the house.

The kitchen reminded her that she was hungry, for it was ten o'clock. She found cold meat and bread and butter, and carried it back to her fire-lit citadel, and then climbed to Jane's bedroom. But the room was empty, Jane's belongings were gone.

Standing in the little bedroom, the girl's heart sank. Fairfax had been right—there was not a soul in the house; Clarence had either missed Jane or let her go off on a holiday. Soon he would be here, and she must meet him alone.

"Maurice must get here first," she said to herself bravely, and turned with trembling knees and went down-stairs again.

If she had known just what purpose was in Mr. Mayne's mind, she would have been afraid, no matter how diabolical it might be. She had read "revenge" in those pale eyes, seen it on the unscrupulous, thin mouth. And he had said it once, when Mrs. Simpson had said she was afraid of him.

Her heart was not beating steadily when she reached the down-stairs hall where once she had routed Mr. Mayne, and her own weakness angered her.

"You idiot!" she said to herself roughly, "it is because you are tired and hungry, you are afraid of being murdered by a little wretch like that!" But oh! how strong his grip had been that afternoon!

Nerine turned resolutely from the long passages, where her lamp seemed only to show the darkness, into the morning-room, warm and comfortable now. She sat down at the table and ate some meat and bread, with faint appetite in spite of her long fast.

"Maurice would say 'have a drink,'" she reflected; and with a tread that was very weary she went over to the cupboard to get the brandy. She must have some tea, even though she did not relish descending to the kitchen again for water.

Oh, hurrah! Here was better than tea—a decanter of sherry. She remembered thankfully it one night when Kit had felt faint, and by some luck it had not been put away. She drank a mouthful out of a teacup; the taste revened her, but the wine did her good. The nervously fatigue which had lain on her vanished; she rose from her knees beside her cupboard refreshed. After all, there was nothing like eating and drinking.

She looked at the clock, but it was not going, of course; and she went, lamp in hand, into the dining-room and stood surprised as she saw the time. Eleven o'clock, and no sign of Mayne. Mayne would be here at twelve, for she knew by his face that he lied when he said he did not.

Corns and How to Treat Them

SOMETIMES I wonder about our grandmothers' and our great-grandmothers' feet. Think of the work they did! They spun and wove and dipped candles, and plaited straw bonnets, and baked and brewed and did a million other things. They must have been on their feet the bigger part of every day. And then I look at the picture of Great-great-grandmother and see the tiny slippered toes peeping from beneath the hem of her gown—and wonder, and wonder and wonder if Great-great-grandmother did not wear slippers just a wee bit too small for her, and if, after all, she may not have had as much trouble with puffy, aching feet, and corns and ingrowing toenails and all the other uncomfortable things as we do.

If so, she kept very still about it, whereas we frankly exchange experiences with our neighbors and buy bunion protectors and corn plasters and powders for tired feet, at any drug-store counter!

And speaking of corns, is there anything more nerve-racking? Let me tell you how one physician advises us to get rid of them.

First, go to the drug-store and buy a bottle of corn remover. There are several good ones on the market that are widely advertised. These are reliable, so don't accept a substitute. Instead, ask your druggist to send and get you some when he places his next order for drugs, or write yourself direct to the manufacturer who advertises the corn remedy.

The necessary brush or glass rod for applying it and full directions for use will come in each package.

When you are all ready for bed, soak your feet thoroughly, dry, and then, with the camel's-hair brush or glass rod carefully paint the corn with the liquid. Do not get the liquid on the rest of the toe, for its object is to loosen the corn, and you do not want to skin your entire toe! The next night repeat the process, and do so again on the third night. Usually the third application will take the corn off. If it is a corn of very long standing, and an obstinate one, you may repeat for a fourth and fifth night.

On the next night, soak the foot for ten or fifteen minutes in hot water, then with the blunt edge of a knife-blade (thoroughly scrubbed with soap and hot water, rinsed in hot water and dried on a perfectly clean towel), gently lift the edge of the patch, all the way around, working it up carefully, and the corn, which will have been loosened will peel off, without the slightest pain and leave no soreness.

Rub the toe with a little vaseline or zinc oxide ointment, and go peacefully to bed, and thereafter be careful that you do not wear shoes too tight or too short, or ones which rub the toes. If your shoes are wrong so that they rub or press the toes the corn will come again in time, as that is what causes corns.

There is another thing you should be especially careful about if you wish not only cornless but acheless feet, and that is never to wear a shoe with a run-over heel. The moment the heel is worn unevenly, even though only very slightly, take your shoes to the cobbler and have the heels straightened. You will save yourself many aches and pains by so doing, besides keeping corns and bunions at bay and improving your appearance. If you run your shoes over very badly, you would better have heel plates put in the heel on the side you wear out. The metal resists wear and your heels will stay straight much longer.

Keep a lemon on your dresser with one end cut, and before dressing your feet rub them with the freshly cut surface of the lemon, letting the juice dry on. Each time, before using, cut off a thin slice of the lemon so you will always have a fresh place to use. This is an excellent treatment for tired feet.

Some druggists will try to sell you a preparation of their own make, telling you that it is "just as good" as the advertised one you ask for. Perhaps it may be, but then it may not, and it may make your toe sore. If you insist on having the standard advertised trade-mark article you get a safe and sure remedy.

Answers to Questions

Ethel E.—No, indeed, my dear, there is no medicine you can take to prevent your getting any taller! If you are only five feet now, and are thirteen years old, you will probably grow four or five more inches. Indeed, you should hope to, for five feet four or five is not at all too tall, and when you are eighteen or twenty I shall be receiving mournful letters from you if you remain only five feet tall. Your weight is very good, at present. You should wear your dresses about an inch above your shoe-tops. The most fashionable way for a girl of thirteen to wear her hair, is braided and hanging down her back—in one braid, left loose at the ends. It should be parted in the middle in front, and rolled away from the face above the ears. To do this, part the hair from one side of the head to the other, as well as from front to back. Take one half of the front hair and roll it gently back on itself, putting the ends with the back hair; do the same with the other half, then braid all together. If your hair is not very long, part it down the middle from the forehead to nape of neck. Braid in two braids; then tie the end of one braid to the beginning of the other, and the end of that braid to the beginning of the first, using large bows of ribbon. This will make short braided loops across the back of your head. As to the pimples, girls of your age are apt to have pimples, which clear up as they get a little older, but you can help to get rid of them by seeing that the bowels are in perfect order once or twice daily, by drinking lots of water, by not eating between meals, and by not eating too many sweet or greasy things—candy, pie, cake, doughnuts, fried foods. Don't cut them all out, but be careful to eat very moderately.

Mrs. N. Y.—I am sorry it is against the rules of this department to answer letters by mail. I do not think the treatment you suggest as preceding peroxide and ammonia, to remove superfluous hair, will keep the hair from coming back. If you have only a fuzzy growth, it is more than probable it is not nearly so noticeable as you think. You would far better stick to the peroxide and ammonia if you want to remove the hair permanently. Keep the skin clear and healthy in appearance and the hair will scarcely be noticed while it is being got rid of.

Blondy.—I do not know what causes your large knuckles. You do not tell me your age, what you do, or anything about yourself. If you are a young girl, you may be very thin, so that your knuckles look prominent; if you are older, your knuckles may be receiving certain deposits from the blood which are enlarging them. In either case, drink plenty of water to keep the body cleansed and purified and the blood free from impurities. Be careful what you eat, and see that your stomach does not get acid. If it does, your diet needs regulating, and you should cut out acid fruits and tomatoes, and not eat a great deal of meat, and be sure to avoid fried foods, and take care to chew every mouthful until it is liquid before swallowing. Your bowels must be kept in perfect order. Too much sugar will cause acid, also. Eat simple things. Cut out tea and coffee. In the mean time, massage your knuckles with a pulling motion (pulling toward your finger tips gently) several times a day. In fact, when you are sitting idle, you can easily begin to work at one knuckle or another gently, and see that they are kept well massaged. This helps to prevent the accretion of deposits.

Madge.—"The next COMFORT" always means about four or five months after the receipt of a letter, because when this letter of yours was received, July 2, the July issue was mailed, the August issue was printed, the September issue was being set up. Big magazines with their circulation in millions, have to work a long time ahead. I am doing just as you ask and answering "in the next COMFORT," but I am afraid it won't be the issue you will expect to see the answer in. As to the moles, they are rather dangerous things to meddle with, a cancer sometimes being produced. If there is a large fleshy mole, tying a silk thread about the base and letting it stay will cause the mole to turn black, dry up and finally drop off; but if the mole is merely a discoloration a little above the surface of the skin, and not a protruding fleshy mole, you cannot use this method. You can touch the mole with salicylic acid moistened with alcohol or glycerine, leaving it on for half an hour, then washing off. This should be done for three days in succession. Only touch the mole and not the skin surrounding it. If the mole gets irritated, leave it alone, or put on some healing cream or vaseline. Peroxide can be applied to moles and sometimes bleaches them.

M. B. B.—See answer to "Madge." For your freckles, try using a lotion made from four tablespoonfuls of lemon juice and four of glycerine. Every night, after washing and rinsing the face and drying, dampen the face with this lotion and let it dry on. The freckles will not disappear unless the outer layer of the skin peels, as they are under the skin.

Miss Luella.—See answer to "Ethel" for suggestions as to diet, where pimples are in evidence. The sunburning of your nose would not produce pimples—they come only from impurities in the blood which are not being carried off through their proper channels, either because those channels are sluggish and do not do their work, or, through faulty diet, are overloaded with impurities and cannot take care of all of them, the blood then seeking to rid itself of them in this other and more conspicuous manner. In taking your daily body bath give the skin a good frictioning. A bath mitten of Turkish toweling, that will slip over the hand and enable you to give yourself a good rub, is an excellent thing to use, but any more or less rough towel will serve the purpose. Flush the bowels by drinking large quantities of water—never less than eight glasses a day. Eight glasses is just the normal amount required by the body, in order that the blood may be pure. Exercise, indoors and out. Keep plenty of fresh air in your house, and always sleep with the windows open. All of this will purify your blood, for of course the air that enters your lungs has that task to perform and if you see that pure air is breathed, the work will be well done. In the mean time, here is a good lotion to use on your nose:

A Lotion for Pimples

Rose-water, two ounces; tincture of camphor, one half dram; glycerine, one half dram; precipitate of sulphur, one half dram.

Old Subscriber.—Always be careful in handling anything which began with a bruise. You speak of the place on your face as a scar, but if it is sore at all after five years, it is more than a scar of course. I mention this merely to call your attention to it. If it is just a scar, about all you can do is to massage it gently, and regularly.

WATCH YOUR SHOES TO SEE THAT THE HEELS ARE NOT RUN OVER.

Blue Eyes.—The peroxide and ammonia are applied, to remove superfluous hair, one one day, the other the next, the hairy spots being dampened, in each case, with the liquid which is allowed to dry on. It takes quite a long time to dispose of the hair by this method. Once the root is killed, the hair will not come back.

L. H.—The best way to reduce the bust is by exercise and by inducing perspiration. A good exercise is as follows:

To Reduce the Bust

Standing erect, with your chest held well out, stretch the arms out sideways on a level with the shoulders, keeping the elbows stiff. Now throw the arms forward forcibly, letting the hands meet, still on a level with the shoulders. Again throw them back as far as they will go, remembering to keep the shoulder level—make this movement as if you were trying to make them meet in the middle of the back; throw them forward; throw them back, and so continue, being careful that the elbows are kept entirely stiff. Breathe in deeply as you throw the arms back, exhale slowly as you bring them forward. To induce perspiration, buy a strip of rubber sheeting wide enough to extend above and below bust and long enough to wrap around the body. Draw this firmly and snugly with strips of adhesive plaster. This will make the body perspire, and with every drop of perspiration you are reducing. In the mean time, cut out fat-building foods.

F. F.—If you use barium to remove superfluous hair, the hair will come back, and usually heavier and darker. Better stick to the other treatment. Remember that the peroxide bleaches the hair, so that it gets less and less noticeable.

Charlotte.—See answer to "Blue Eyes." If your skin is too oily, be more careful as to diet, and drink quantities of water. Also, when you take your daily tub, and indeed whenever you wash your face in the daytime, friction it with the palms of the hands, and always end by dashing cold water on it. Look after your bowels, and eat plenty of fruits and green vegetables. Drink lemon juice in water half an hour before breakfast (no sugar), and eat oranges whenever you can.

Mabyl.—You do not give the size of your bust. It may be, if you are only sixteen, that it seems large now, but as you get a little older will be just right. However, practise the exercise given to "L. H." but not the rubber sheeting idea. Use this exercise also:

For the Too Large Bust

Standing erect, close each hand to form a fist, and bring the arms out sideways on a level with the shoulders. Do not bend elbows, but, holding arms stiff, move each in a circle at arm's length, on a line with the shoulder, to start with, but widening, so that you are describing with each closed fist a large circle at arm's length sideways from the body. Do this very rapidly, over and over again. Breathe in as you start, and keep the mouth closed while making the circle. Rest and breathe when necessary.

Violet.—If your fingers get hard at the corners of the nails, soak your hands thoroughly in warm soapy water for about five minutes; then carefully clean nails with an orange-wood stick (never a steel nail-cleaner, because it hardens the nails), cleaning well down at the sides of the nail; then use your scissors (manicure scissors, for the other scissors are too thick-bladed to do any good) to clip any hard bits of cuticle at the sides of the nails. Next, rub the finger-nail and edge of cuticle all around nail, with vaseline. Rub it well in. Do this vaseline-rub every night to keep your cuticle soft, and I think you will find that soon the hard and rough spots will go away. Do not cut the skin at the sides of the nails except when absolutely necessary, as constant cutting will make it hard, and that may be what is the matter now. To get rid of hair on your arms, you can use the peroxide and ammonia treatment—which is the best—or you can use a depilatory, as follows, but, if you do, remember that the hair will come back darker and stronger than ever:

Depilatory for Superfluous Hair

To one ounce of sulphuret of barium add four ounces of water—or, in simpler terms, use four times as much water as you do barium. Add enough corn-starch to this to make a paste and spread it on the hairy spot. When it is dry, scrape off with the back of a silver knife or paper-cutter, or something similar, and the hairs will come with the paste. Do not leave on until it burns—as it will—but take off as soon as dry and there is a very slight tingling sensation. If the skin is irritated, use some cold cream or zinc ointment.

V. G.—See answer to "Mabyl."

Discouraged.—I'm mighty sorry about those too, too solid pounds of flesh. You do weigh about twenty-four pounds too much. And the only way to really get rid of this flesh and to stay rid of it is to cut out fat-producing foods. Exercise will help, and you can practise any and all of the exercises given in COMFORT. Any one of them will be of help to you, but your main effort must be in the line of diet. I expect you are very fond of sweet things, and potatoes, and all the other foods which make nice fat pounds! How is it? Here, then, is what you should do for a time. For breakfast, eat fruit without sugar, preferably oranges or some fruit like that. A glass of orange juice would be a good thing. You can eat poached eggs. Eat scarcely any bread and no white bread. Eat it for a while toasted without butter. Don't eat cereals and don't eat cream or milk on anything, or sugar. Can you do that? I know it sounds heroic, but those are the foods which make fat, and you have too much already. These foods do not make fat, and you can eat any you want, but be careful to cut down, also, the amount you eat. Chicken, turkey, lean beef, fish, lean mutton or lamb (although our government is asking us not to eat these latter, so I hope you won't). You can eat spinach, onions, lettuce, string beans, turnips, celery, radishes, tomatoes,—in fact most of the vegetables except potatoes. Avoid rice and macaroni. Do not eat sweet desserts. You can eat a baked apple without sugar or cream, some sliced oranges without sugar, any fresh fruit without sugar, but otherwise cut out the desserts for the time being, and cut out the bread and cereals. Do not drink coffee or tea with your meals. Drink lemonade occasionally—not at meals, but between them. With these precautions, you should lose many pounds quite rapidly. Don't you think it worth while?

Theress.—There is no royal road to dimples. Cultivate a pleasant smile, and, if you are thin, try to put on a little more flesh—dimples will be much more apt to come. The only artificial way of acquiring an imitation dimple, is to use the blunt end of a small lead pencil or an orange-wood stick and press steadily but not too roughly into the cheek at the point where a dimple is desired, for about fifteen minutes. When the pencil is removed, there will be a depression. Have melted gum arabic ready and apply quickly to the depression. This acts like a mucilage and holds the skin in the position of the dimple. You can then powder over the spot when the gum arabic is dried. The best way to get dimples, however, is to cultivate a laugh-loving disposition, one that always sees the bright side of things, always thinks kindly of people, is always thinking pleasant thoughts. Then the face gradually takes on the expression which precedes a smile, and dimples are apt to form. This has to be an inside reform, as well as an outside, or the face will look stiff and unnatural instead of pleasant and natural.

hundred and twenty pounds. Am five feet, three inches tall. Have brown hair and eyes and am rather dark. I can wear black hair beautifully and do while at work, as I do not care to ruin my own hair by curling it. I am very old maidish about makeup and never use it anywhere but on the stage. That is another thing we do to please the people and not ourselves, for it isn't very pleasant to go to your room about twelve o'clock and then take half an hour to get the makeup off and then your complexion is ruined if you are not very careful. That is why so many of us girls use it on the street as our skin is ruined by using it so much while at work. I was visiting in a home not long ago and my friend was dressing for a dance. After she had used her lip stick and other toilet preparations she turned to her mother and asked how she looked. Her mother replied, "You look like a show girl," then, remembering me, became very embarrassed. She explained she didn't mean me, but those on the stage, the regular ones. Please remember we are all some mother's girl.

Love to every one,
PAT.

Pat. Terpsichore evidently frowned on me for I never was able to execute a graceful pirouette myself, whirling daintily on one toe with the other pointing at a quarter of twelve, but I've always envied anyone who could, so I don't blame you for loving dancing, music, bright lights and flowers only girlie, don't lose sight of the fact that there are other things in life that some day will mean more to you—a husband, home and babies. Come again and tell us more of life behind the scenes.—Ed.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

Over one year has passed since the Uncle Charlie Home Fund work was begun. Do you think the amount to date is what it should be? Great-hearted Sister Sanderly thinks it should be fifty thousand before his next birthday—she says she wants to help him because he will help others. Surely we all agree with her, but let me add a selfish motive: Let's help him so he can continue to help us! Care and worry are deadly, especially to one already an invalid, as Uncle Charlie is; they shorten life. (Have you ever wondered how it would be, without Uncle Charlie?) We cannot give him health or free him from his continuous physical torture, but we can save him from the killing care and worry attendant on the visits of the rent collector. And he can keep on helping us—and others—for many years to come, we hope. We can make sure of this if each one does his bit toward getting that home for him. Don't put it off, and don't forget it—now's the time! All of us know how we can help the plan, so let's give "a long pull, a strong pull, and a pull all together," and make our Home Fund offering for his birthday, Sept. 25, break the record. Let's try for the mark set by Sister Sanderly!

Yours for success in all good undertakings.
EMMA STOCKINGER.

CORNERSVILLE, MD.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

"Alas for the rarity
Of Christian charity
Under the sun!"

I never liked this quotation because I do not believe that Christian charity is rare. By charity I mean kindness and sympathy. There is so much to claim our time and interest, we have so many concerns and pressing duties, that unless the case of a needy or distressed fellow creature comes right under our notice, we pay little heed. And who can blame us? No one individual could hope to relieve all the distress in life, but it should be his concern always to lend a hand when it is possible.

When Uncle Charlie's Home Fund was started, I expected each of the million subscribers would contribute a little. Even a dime from each of so many, would amount to a wondrous sum. I can hear you say, "He earns a good living." Very true, but this living is earned by the superhuman effort of an indomitable will and when the break comes (which is likely to happen at any time) the living cannot be made.

COMFORT readers, fellow humans, you who are well and able to do a day's work, I know there is not one

MATERIALS required. Four skeins cream-white threefold Saxony, one large ball baby-blue pearl cotton, two skeins pink rope silk and one steel and one bone crochet hook of suitable size.

The garments will fit a baby from six months to one year old.

Directions for Jacket

The yoke is first made with wool. Begin with chain 57 stitches, turn.

1st row.—Skip first st., 56 s. c., in 56 sts., ch. 1, turn.

2nd row.—Working through both loops of each st., make 10 s. c. in first 10 sts., 2 s. c. in next st., 1 s. c. in each of the next 4 sts., 2 s. c. in next st., 24 s. c., 2 s. c. in next st., 4 s. c., 2 s. c. in next st., 10 s. c. in last 10 sts., ch. 1, turn.

3rd row.—In this and each succeeding row in yoke, always work through only the back loop of each st., thus giving the ribbed effect.

Make 1 s. c. in each st., ch. 1, turn.

4th row.—10 s. c., 3 s. c., in next st., 4 s. c., 3 s. c. in next st., 24 s. c., 3 s. c. in next st., 4 s. c., 3 s. c. in next st., 10 s. c., ch. 1, turn.

5th row.—1 s. c. in each st., ch. 1, turn.

6th row.—Same as 4th row. Repeat these two rows until there are 9 ribs in yoke.

Body of Jacket

Make 1 d. c. in first st. of left side of yoke. Make 9 groups or shells by working 4 d. c. in a st. along the front edge, 1 d. c. in last st. Break thread, 1 d. c. in first st. of back of yoke.

14 groups of 4 d. c. each 1 d. c. in last st. Break thread. Working other front to match left side, ch. 3, turn.

2nd row.—4 d. c. or 1 shell between the 2nd and 3rd double of first group. Repeat making a shell on each group or 9 shells in all, 1 d. c. on end d. c. Break thread, work across back and other front in the same way, turn with ch. 3.

3rd row.—1 shell on each shell ch. 2, between the shells on fronts and the back to form armsize, 10 rows more of shells, turning with a ch. 3 at end of each row and working back and forth, next make 3 s. c. under each ch. 3 on the fronts. Break thread.

With blue mercerized cotton which should be about the size of ordinary white cord, using steel needle, begin at neck and move one or more single sts. in the end of each row of yoke and 1 s. c. in each st. down fronts and around bottom with 3 s. c. in each corner st., ch. 1, turn. Next round, 1 st. in each st., working through both loops, ch. 1, turn.

In third round work down front, 3 s. c. in corner st., work across bottom only, then ch. 1 and turn. 1 s. c. in each st. across bottom, turn work back across bottom, 3 s. c. in corner st. and 1 s. c. in each st. up front, ch. 1, turn 1 s. c. in each st., 3 s. c. in corners, finish at opposite end of the neck and break thread. This makes a band having 4 rows on each front and 6 rows across the bottom.

To make the shell border below this band, join in wool and make 1 s. c. in first st., ch. 2, shell 4 d. c. in 2nd st., 1 d. c. in 4th st., shell in 6th st., repeat across the bottom.

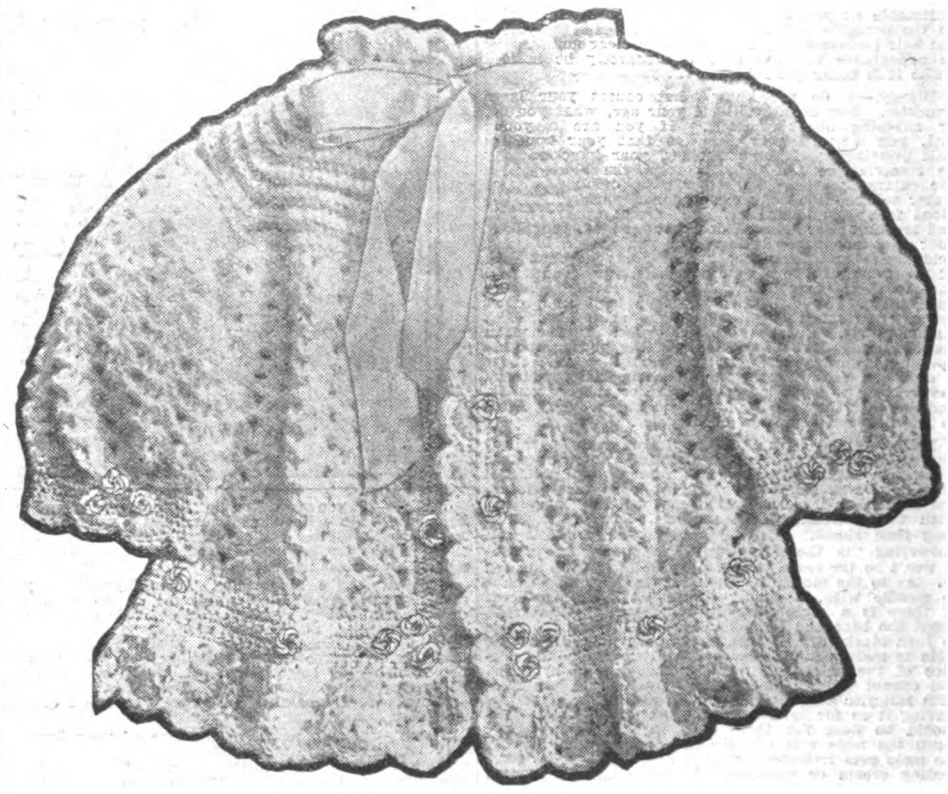
Try to make shells in this row as nearly opposite those on the upper side of the band as possible, with an extra shell at each end under the rows of blue on each front.

Make 3 more rows of shells on shells.

For the next and last row begin at the neck and work shells of 5 d. c. on each front and across the bottom. Around the neck make ch. 2, 1 d. c., ch. 2, 1 d. c., skipping every other st., turn, make shell of 5 d. c. under ch. 2, 1 s. c. under next ch. 2 and repeat.

Join in blue and slip st. down front edge on shells, on bottom slip st. up between the first and second groups of shells, turn and slip st. down and across the bottom edge of the next group of shells. Repeat and finish the opposite front to match the first.

For the sleeves join in wool and make 1 d. c. under ch. 2 at bottom of armsize, 1 shell under ch. in end of each row and 6 shells along edge of shoulder of the yoke, making 12 shells in all for sleeve. Join by slip st. to first d. c., ch. 3.



Complete sleeve by making one shell on each shell for 13 rounds. Finish with cuff of 5 rows of blue s. c. to match band, then one row of shells edged with blue. Then decorate cuffs and bands on front with scattered pink silk roses as shown in illustration.

Crocheted Bootees

The square which forms the front of the foot of these boots is made first. Ch. 11, turn, 10 s. c., ch. 1, 10 s. c., working through both loops of each stitch. Repeat, making 12 rows in all.

Chain 22 sts. Join to opposite end from which ch. starts, 1 s. c. in the end of each row, 10 s. c. across end, 1 s. c. in each st. of ch. Continue thus working 3 more rows of 1 s. c. in each s. c.

4th row.—The same, but skip 1 st. in center of the toe.

INFANT'S CROCHETED JACKET.

5th row.—The same, but skip 2 sts., one on either side of the center of the toe, also 1 st. in the center of the heel.

Make 5 more rows, skipping sts. in toe and heel as necessary to draw the work in a little to form the foot of the boot.

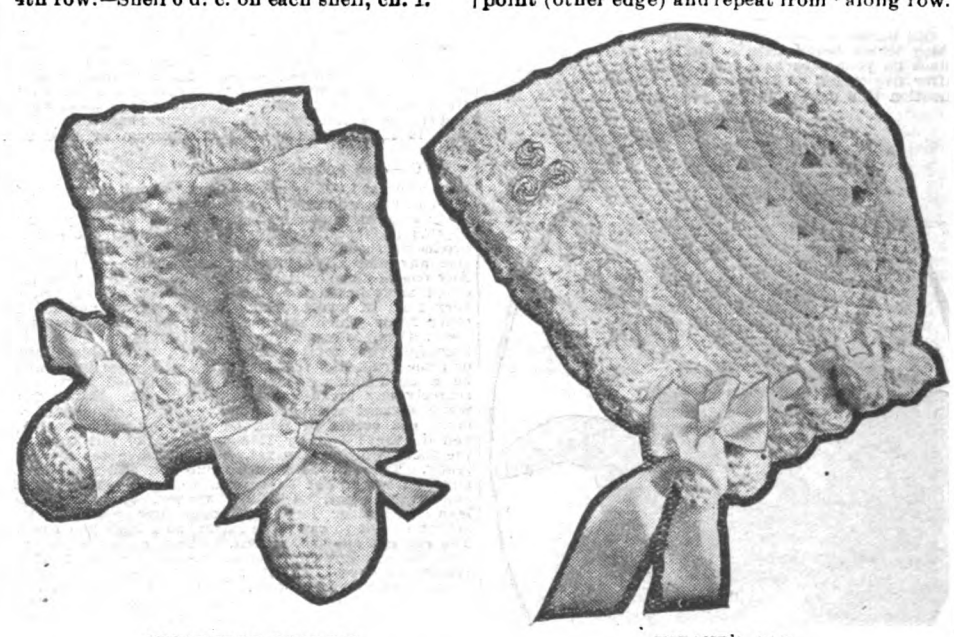
Leave a thread long enough to use in sewing up the last 2 rows.

Now join wool in the center of the back, ch. 5, 1 d. c. in 2nd. st., ch. 2, skip 2, 1 d. c. in next. Repeat for running ribbon in about the ankle.

2nd round for top of bootee.—Shell of 4 d. c. on first double, 1 s. c. on second double, repeat, join, ch. 3.

3rd round.—Shell on shell, join, ch. 3, 5 more rounds of shells, then 4 of shells with a ch. 1 between each.

Finish the last 4 rows with blue silk to match the bottom of jacket and add a rose to each toe.



Infant's Cap

The work is begun in the center of the crown by ch. 4, join, ch. 1, 8 s. c. in ring.

2nd row.—2 s. c. in each st., ch. 2.

3rd row.—Shell of 4 d. c. in every other st., making 8 shells in all, join, ch. 3.

4th row.—Shell 6 d. c. on each shell, ch. 1.

CROCHETED BOOTEES.

INFANT'S CAP.

5th row.—1 s. c. in each st., join 3 more rows of singles in each row making 2 s. c. in three different places, ch. 3 after last row.

9th row.—Shell of 5 d. c. in 3rd st., repeat making shells in every 3rd st., join, ch. 1.

10th row.—1 s. c. in each st., join. Turn and work through both loops in the next row making 1 s. c. in each st. Work back over the stitches last made instead of round and round. Make 3 more rows in this way, join each row with slip st. Break thread.

Next join in 8th st. from center back and make 1 s. c. in each st. to within 8 sts. of the center on the other side. Turn, slip st. over 4 sts. last made, ch. 1, 1 s. c. to within 4 sts. of end of last row, turn. Make 18 more rows of singles for front.

Finish neck with one row of singles, ch. 6, turn, 1 d. c. in 3rd st., ch. 2. 1 d. c. Repeat across for running ribbon. Ch. 3, shell on first d. c., 1 s. c. on second d. c. Repeat across neck, turn, ch. 3, shell on shell s. c. on s. c.

For the front turn back make 4 rows, of shells of 5 d. c., with 1 d. c. between each.

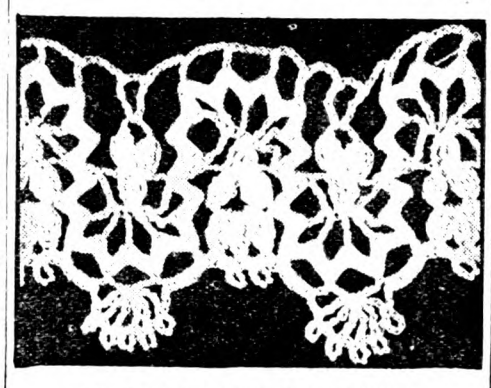
Edge with silk to match the bottom of jacket, work groups of 3 roses on left side front and inside add a ruche of lace.

Directions for Roses

These little raised or Rambler roses as they are sometimes called are very pretty, especially on infants' or toddlers' crocheted garments.

They are very easily worked and should be added to each garment only after it is completed, then the silk is not frayed by handling.

Rope embroidery silk in two shades of pink will be needed. Use the deeper shade for the centers, and making the stitches about one quarter inch in length. First take three stitches closely together in one direction and then cross these at a right angle with three stitches.



Next with the same shade work around this center with a long outline stitch, making about two rounds, then with the lighter pink add to the rose until it measures from one fourth to three eighths inch in diameter. The work should be done loosely and closely enough so that the rose will stand out like a little button. The last couple of stitches can be drawn in somewhat under the rose and then fasten off on the wrong side.

Variety can be gained by reversing the shades in some of the roses and also by varying their size.

An Unusual and Dainty Edge in Rickrack and Crochet

One-Profit Prices

It's reasonable to believe that we will save you money. Consider our enormous business with our millions of customers. Buying a thousand things of a kind enables us to buy much cheaper than the dealer who simply takes a half-dozen or so at a time.

But we buy bigger even than that. We take entire factory outputs. We buy huge surplus lots. We contract for manufacturers' dull-time periods. When machinery and hands are idle, we have our designs made up. In cases like this, we buy practically at cost.

We have no salesmen. We employ no collectors. We use no display rooms. We have no end-of-the-season left-overs.

So the price you pay us, in most cases, is the maker's price plus just our own profit. Usually it means a saving of one-fourth or even more.

Bonded Guarantee

These are not mere promises. They are agreements that we legally guarantee. On the back cover of our Bargain Book you will find such a guarantee, bonded by a national security company. Send for this Book now.

Home Dressmaking Hints

Forecasts for Early Fall Fashions

By Geneva Gladding

MIDDY styles are always nice for growing girls. They are easy to make, easy to launder and comfortable to wear. In Pattern 2143, we have a very attractive style, displaying the latest feature — pockets — one finds pockets now everywhere—though some may be empty,—but it is indeed a practical feature. In the pocket, the little school girl has a place for her handkerchief, for her eraser, and perhaps for a pencil and a piece of candy.

Other seasonable styles run on one-piece lines, some in Moyenage effects, and others with box plaits.

Pattern Descriptions

ALL PATTERNS 10c. EACH
Unless Other Price Is Stated

1696—Boys' Blouse Suit with Shield. This design is especially adapted for wash fabrics, but may also be used for serge, cheviot, velvet and corduroy. The shield may be omitted.

WHAT is more interesting to the mother of children at the end of vacation and beginning of school-days, than to plan for school dresses. Surely little tots and growing girls are equally interested and ready to help select patterns.

Having the needs of the family in mind, we decided to devote COMFORT's entire front page to fashions, in addition to the regular article on this page, and we trust you will be pleased with the arrangement we have had our artist make, showing the costumes in their proper setting, indoors and out, at school and at home.

The variety of styles is large—every taste may be gratified. One little girl will be charming in a dress like 1903, which has an Empire waist, while the little girl who is round and plump had better wear something like Pattern 1797 or 1800. If your little daughter likes pockets, in which to stow away things (as the boys did when we went to school), make a dress of gingham or percale like 1053.

But we must not forget "our boy"—and his usual new blouse suit, for which you may select Pattern 1034.

For the girl in her teens, or if she goes to high school, try Pattern 1097. It is simple, but attractive. If you want a pretty "special" dress, look at Pattern 2142. It is fine for crepe, organdie, silk or satin.

1600—Child's Envelope Night Dress in high, round or square neck edge, and with sleeve in either of two lengths. This style will prove a comfort to both mother and child, for with the envelope lap or extension the gown will be kept in place and not "crowd up" as is often the case with the loose models. For warmth it could be made of domet or canton flannel, flannelette or duckling fleece. It is also suitable for muslin, nainsook or cambric.

Cut in five sizes; six months, one, two, four and six years. Size two will require two and one half yards of 36-inch material.

1653—Girls' Dress, with or without pockets, and with sleeve in either of two lengths. Gingham, percale, galatea, rep, poplin, linen or linene are nice for this model. The dress is closed above the belt, but the closing may be finished to the hem.

Cut in four sizes; two, four, six and eight years. It requires two and one quarter yards of 44-inch material for a four-year size.

1697—Ladies' Dress with sleeve in either of two lengths. This model is fine for combinations of materials, for serge and satin, broadcloth and suede or silk, for chambray and gingham. This style is easy to develop, and very attractive. If linen is chosen the panel and vest may be embroidered.

Cut in seven sizes; 34, 36, 38, 40, 42, 44 and 46 inches bust measure. It requires six and one eighth yards of 44-inch material for a 36-inch size.

1797—A Simple Dress for Mother's Girl. All wash fabrics are nice for this, for the dress is easy to launder, and easy to make. The sleeve may be finished with a band cuff in wrist length, or with a smart cuff turned back on the sleeve at elbow length. The dress may be developed in serge, cashmere, poplin or rep. It is nice for check or plaid suiting.

Cut in four sizes; four, six, eight and 10 years. It requires two and three quarters yards of 36-inch material for a six-year size.

1860—Girls' Dress, with yoke and sleeve in either of two lengths. This style is nice for wool, cloth or wash fabrics. The dress is made with plaits over back and front.

Cut in four sizes; two, four six and eight years. It requires two and three quarters yards of 44-inch material for a six-year size.

1875—A Popular Coat Suit for the growing girl. Cheviot, tweed, serge, broadcloth, velvet, corduroy, shepherd check and novelty weaves are all appropriate for this style. The coat is cut with simple front closing and has a broad sailor collar. The skirt has ample fullness.

Cut in four sizes; eight, 10, 12 and 14 years, and requires four and one quarter yards of 44-inch material for a 12-year size.

1903—Child's Dress, with or without pockets and belt, and with sleeve in either of two styles. poplin, rep, serge, gabardine, gingham, percale, galatea, chambray, crepe, velvet or taffeta could be used for this style. It is also nice for challie and cashmere. The fullness of the dress may be gathered or smocked between the belt sections.

Cut in four sizes; two, four, six and eight years. It requires two and five eighths yards of 36-inch material for a four-year size.

1934—A Natty Suit for Mother's Boy. Blouse styles are always nice and practical for little boys. The model here shown is nice for serge, cheviot and velvet, as well as for wash goods such as galatea, linen, seersucker, and gingham.

Cut in four sizes; three, four, five and six years. It requires three and one eighth yards of 36-inch material for a five-year size.

2013—Ladies' Apron Dress. This model may serve as a house dress. It is comfortable and easy to develop, easy to wear and easy to launder. Percale, gingham, seersucker, crepe, lawn and alpaca are good for its development.

Cut in four sizes; 34, 38, 42 and 46 inches bust measure. It requires five yards of 36-inch material for a 34-inch size.

2142—A Simple Summer Gown. Foulard, combined with organdy, lawn or dimity would be nice for this style. The skirt may be made without the ruffle heading. The sleeve is new and novel. This style is also nice for shantung, crepe, novelty silk, challie, batiste, voile, bordered and embroidered materials.

Cut in three sizes; 16, 18 and 20 years. It requires for an 18-year size six and three eighths yards of 36-inch material.

THE YOUNGEST PREACHER.—The youngest preacher in the country lives in Baltimore, Md. His name is Rufus Holder and he is twelve years old. During a series of revival meetings recently he asked permission of his father, who is an ordained minister, to address the congregation. His efforts met with such success that he now frequently delivers a short sermon from a chosen text.

A $5,000 Cow.—At an auction sale of registered Holstein-Friesian cattle held recently in Rome, N. Y., Cremelle Topsy Ormsby Tobe, reputed to be the world's champion milk producer under four years, was sold for $5,000. Twenty-five other thoroughbred Holsteins were sold at an average price of $400 each.

ARMEL, COLO.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:
I am a girl sixteen years old, five feet and six inches tall and weigh one hundred and seven pounds. I had to quit school quite a while ago on account of my eyes. I was in the eighth grade when I quit. I take music lessons on the piano and have to go twenty miles to take them. I have a fine teacher.

I have joined a girls' Camp Fire Team and am writing to ask you to suggest some names. I had thought of "Mohee" as a name and having "Mothers' Help" as the symbol. I want you to suggest some more names so that I can take my choice. One girl took the words needed and cheerful (two things which she wished to be) and made the word Neachee. I like that and as you are such a good hand at anything like that I thought I would ask you. I will send you a picture of our Camp Fire Girls when we have them taken. Please answer soon.

FLORENCE COTTERELL.

So Florence, you have to go twenty miles to take your piano lesson. You are the most considerate young lady I know. There is a young lady who lives in the flat beneath me taking a lesson right now, and every plunk, plunk she makes, vibrates everything in our chicken coop. I can't get that young lady to go twenty inches away, let alone twenty miles. The people in Colorado evidently must be less patient and resigned than I am, or you must be more considerate and obliging. Which is it? Anyway I congratulate you on your determination, for it is mighty few people who would go twenty miles to take a lesson at anything. When I took music lessons I had to go thirty miles, and then lots of mean people said that wasn't half far enough. If you have neighbors you don't like and want to get rid of them, cut out the piano and start practising on a cornet. That will fix them. I know a lady who has to go completely out of the state every time she wants to play the Star Spangled Banner. She lives in Milwaukee. That is not the only section of the country where it is not safe to play our national anthem. Ask Senators La Follette and Gronna. You boys and girls who have pianos and organs in your houses try and learn to master these instruments. Don't let that hurdy gurdy they call a piano player with all its torturing rag time racket deter you from being a real musician. We do not want a mechanical world, we want an artistic world, and art is not mechanical. The piano player is all right in its way—fine, but it does not satisfy those who want to produce music from the depths of their own individual souls. Sorry but I can't torture my brain finding a name for your camp in the way you want it done. Any Indian name will do. Why not call it Camp Joffre after the gallant general who saved Paris and in so doing saved New York and the United States. As regards those eyes. I'm dropping you a card telling you what to do for them. I would tell you what to do right here, but if I did I would be deluged with a thousand inquiries as to whether the stuff was to be taken standing on your head, or sitting on your ear, taken on the roof or in the cellar, by the drop or the bucket. People always misunderstand or forget directions, or else lose the particular paper in which the directions appeared. The desire to be helpful is usually thwarted by lack of thought on the part of those we want to help, and who need help.

STUART, VA.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:
As you are in favor of woman suffrage, I want to ask you if you would mind giving a few points on that subject. I want to make a speech on that subject so I thought I would ask you if you had time to help me and if not it is all right. So thanking you in advance I remain Yours truly, ROY WEST.

Roy, you needn't bother to do so much campaigning for woman suffrage just now. Just as soon as this war is ended and probably before, all women the country o'er will have the privilege of selecting those they deem most suitable to make their laws. A few months ago, not even the wildest dreamer would have believed it possible that in dark benighted, imperial Russia, in a few circles of the clock, the women would have a vote, but they have got it. It only took one swift kick from the democratic boot of the Russian people and off went Nicky Romanoff, and in came votes for women, and in fact votes for everybody. Even the dog, the cat and the canary would be allowed to vote in Russia today if they could scratch a ballot slip. The war has also brought woman suffrage in Great Britain. At present only women of thirty and over are to be allowed to vote. This will seem unfair to the hundreds of thousands of women below that age who have given their lives and every atom of their strength and devotion to Britain's holy cause against the common enemy, but there is a reason. At present there are a million more women than men in Great Britain, and the powers that be do not want the woman vote to so greatly preponderate that it will decide the policies of the Empire—not at least during wartime. The war will bring the vote to the women of America, just as it will bring a lot of other sadly needed measures of reform. War, bloody and awful as it is, alas, too often affords the only way by which men can be induced to rise to higher things. The Russian revolutionists thought they would be getting off at bargain rates if by the expenditure of a few million lives, they could get rid of the Czar. The war however, gave them an opportunity to dispose of their little tin pot kink, at the expenditure of less life than we sacrifice here at a Fourth of July celebration. Equal suffrage is coming to the women of the South, Roy, and coming rapidly. It will be an awful jolt to those chivalrous gentlemen who want to deprive their women of the precious privilege of occasionally using their brains for the national good, but it is coming all the same.

FYFFE, ALA.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:
I am a little girl, fourteen years of age, five feet tall, weigh one hundred and sixteen pounds, dark complexion, blue eyes. I have a brother sixteen years old and a baby sister one year and a half old, her name is Elliepair, she never has walked any yet without holding to something. We live about half mile from school. I am studing for the seventh grade. I live in the tempest zone. I haven't seen any letters from this place. It sure is a fine country. I live on a farm. I can cook, wash dishes, do all kinds of housework. Come Uncle Charlie and we will go fishing. Do you like to fish? I sure do when I have good luck. We live about half a mile from a creek. Come down and we will eat apples. They sure are fine.

We have nine mules and a cow. If I see this in print I will write again. I like music and flowers. I think pinks the prettiest flowers I ever saw. I love little birds. I think the wren the prettiest of all birds.

Best wishes to all. U. L. V. ABSHER.

Young ladies should write their names in full and not their initials when writing for publication. So you are "studing" for the seventh grade are you? Studing is a carpenter's work, and has nothing to do with your present schoolwork. Make it studying next time. We are all doing a lot of studying these days, studying how to make a one dollar bill do the work of ten. War makes people do more thinking in a minute than they do in peace times in fifty years. Sorry to have to admit it, but only under the stimulus of war and bloodshed, strife and plunder, will the majority of brains function at all. If people would do as much thinking in peace time as they do in war time, there would not be any war. Write that in your hats some of you never thinks. So you live in the "tempert" zone do you? I was going to correct you and say temperate zone, but I suddenly remembered there are no temperate zones any longer. The hot coals of war have set the world on fire. Everybody is pro-Ally or pro-German. We are all in the war zone. There was only one man who wanted to be "neutral" but his wife would not let him. That was the late King of Greece. If all these kings, princes and royal bone heads the world over had married American girls instead of German princesses, they might have got some sense into their royal noodles and today we might be living in the "tempert," I mean temperate zone, in peace and happiness, instead of the war zone of frightfulness. Germany has supplied wives for all the royal houses of Europe, and if there were any sections of the old world that needed a kink they got one made in Germany. The present British royal house which has been doing business for two hundred years at the same old stand, has never had one single drop of British blood in its veins. The first representative of the House of Hanover, George the First, couldn't speak a word of English, and his ministers could not speak a word of German, and King George the Third, pig headed and hot headed, he who once ruled over us and who got the same kind of boot from the British colonists that Nicky of Russia got, was, in the language of the street, just a "crazy old Dutchman." The monarchy business is the greatest business in the world, and it would have lasted for a good many years yet, but the kinks just had to go and start quarreling with one another—hence the present war. When thieves fall out honest men come by their own, and kinks are the biggest thieves the world has ever had. We are fighting now to put a kink in the kink business. The job had to be done and the world will be a different world, a place worth living in when we get through with the task. That is the only way we can have the tempert or temperate zone restored to us. Miss Absher informs us that she has nine mules and one cow. How lonesome that poor cow must be among all those mules, and not a lady of her own species to associate with.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:
This is my first letter I am 12 yrs old weigh 90 pounds I will be in the seventh grade when school begins it will begin in August I have to pet a dog and a cat my dogs name is Rounder my cats name is Jim I can crochet and embroidery my papa he takes the COMFORT I like to read it we live on a farm in the country I go to Sunday School every Sunday at the Christen church I live half of a mile from my school house I havent got any sister have one brother in Heaven

My eyes are weak and I wear glasses I hope to see this letter in print so don't let Billy the Goat get it

Yours truly MISS WILLYE HALL

Willye, your letter is remarkable in that it does not contain a single period, comma or anything else remotely suggesting punctuation. Like many others I assume you have decided that punctuation is punk. Willye says: "I have to pet a dog and a cat." You have my sympathy Willye, for if you don't like dogs and cats it must be tough to have to pet them. I am inclined to believe that you have two pets, a dog and a cat. Two is a word expressing number, to is a preposition denoting motion. On these two simple words, having the same sound but with totally different meanings, millions of children fall down, and will continue to fall down and make themselves ridiculous in their correspondence all through life, because bone-headed teachers won't by a few exampls and illustrations, remove this grammatical pitfall, from the path of the young. Willye, tell your teacher I have fined her a month's salary and she ought to be made to pay it. Willye further informs us that she can crochet and embroidery her papa. Willye, please send us a picture of papa after you have him nicely crocheted and embroidered. I have no doubt a little artistic embellishing would improve a good many papas, though nature has put enough hay and Alfalfa round the faces of most of them to make further adornment unnecessary. Anyhow we won't criticize papas who subscribe to COMFORT for by that act they demonstrate they know a good thing when they see it, and and have more horse sense than most of the papa fraternity. Willye goes to the "Christen" church. I suppose that's another new religious sect. Well, we have a million or two already and a million or two more won't hurt. Variety is the spice of life and I suppose that aphorism is as applicable to religion as to anything else.

MUNCIE, R. R. 11, Care H. Goodman, IND.

DEAR SIR.—I am a young orphan girl of twenty-two. I am writing a love story, would like to have you print it every month. That is, me write it for your paper. The title is "Her Second Love."

Please answer and tell me how much you'll pay. I will also assign for your paper when you answer

Yours truly, BERTHA WELBORN.

P. S. Please do not print this.

Bertha, when we ask young people if they can cook they throw up their hands and say: "I know nothing about it, that's mother's job." If you ask them if they can dust a chair or even clean a window on the inside (we won't mention the outside) they throw a fit and have to be taken to the hospital. In fact if you ask a girl to do anything today, with the exception of painting her face and going to a cabaret or the movies, or joy riding with a gentleman friend, she will size you up and ask you if you think she is crazy. But ask her if she can write a three-volume novel or a sixty-four reel movidrama (they don't write songs or pomes any more—that's too easy) she will say: "Gee I can do that in my sleep!" One of these days, just for fun, COMFORT should devote a whole edition to stories contributed by aspiring would-be authors. Then after its six million readers were all buried it could start to work and get a whole new bunch of subscribers. I read the other day of a man in a big publishing house who examined about a thousand book manuscripts a week and of these he found not more than one that was worth laying aside for the publisher to glance over. It is always the people who can't spell simple words who want to write novels at a thousand dollars a page. A would-be authoress sent me a manuscript the other day that contained several hundred badly scrawled pages, and she actually told me she would give me fifty cents if I would go all over the manuscript, correct it and find a market for it. In describing a proposal of marriage the "authoress" said: "The herroine trembelt in every fibber of her bean," and there were piles more just as excruciating as that. Bertha I've no doubt yours is a very wonderful story, but the title is bad, very bad. No one is interested in a girl who has only had a second love. If you had made it her hundred and forty-second love, you might have got people mildly excited. The modern girl wants a beau every day or two, and she simply has to have them. Before trying to write for publication, Bertha, you must know that "writeing" does not spell "writing," that "ever month" is not the right way to write "every month," and that "assign" is a poor way to spell "sign." It would hardly be a good business proposition Bertha, for COMFORT to give you a big check for a story in exchange for a twenty-five cent one-year subscription. Mr. Gannett is a very good-natured soul, but he would soon go broke on a proposition like that, and if he goes broke I go broke, so I'm going to watch day and night to see that you would-be authoresses don't put the poor man on the financial rocks.

ALBERTVILLE, rot 1, ALA.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:
I will write you a gain. Why is it that you have forgot me i sent you money for my paper you sent me the card of member and the botton of your society and Why is it you don't write me i wint to know i hant herd from you, I wood be glad to be remember I wood be glad to her from you. Write soon from LOOILER TOWNSELL. No. 42,326, Augsta, Mine.

Luilla, I greatly enjoyed your letter after I had unraveled and deciphered it, and believe me it took some unraveling. I suppose I am correct in assuming that looiler is your highly original way of spelling Luilla, and that mine, which we usually regard as meaning a hole in the ground in which are found metals more or less precious is your highly original way of spelling Maine and that rot 1 doubtless means Route 1. A great many experts, Luilla, or looiler as you prefer it, go astray on the use of capital letters, but I think my dear, you are the first one I ever met, who was addicted to the extraordinary habit of placing capitals in the middle of words. But I did: 't publish your letter Luilla, to criticize its construction. This is a free country, free at least for those who have the price, and if people want to adopt highly original methods of making themselves understood, or more often misunderstood, that of course is their business. My object in publishing your letter, Luilla, is to let you and others who write in a similar strain, know that it is impossible for me to carry on a personal correspondence with those who join our League. To every new League member including yourself is sent a long printed letter, which covers nearly every point I could possibly make if I were writing to you personally. If I were a wealthy man, and there were a million hours a day and a million days a week I would just love to correspond with the whole of COMFORT'S family. But life is so short and there is so much of importance that must be done, and there is so little time to do it in, and such pitifully little physical strength to do it with, that you must not feel disappointed if you fail to hear from me. I have more than a family to look after, I have a nation. And Maria and myself are almost complete physical wrecks from trying to crowd a month's work into every sixteen or eighteen hours. My bed is smothered with books, papers, magazines, pamphlets and boxes loaded and brimming o'er with letters. Sooner or later everything that concerns the wel-

A New Vision

AI BENTON'S bushy eyebrows crept upward toward his thick gray hair. He glanced from the letter in his hand across the breakfast table at his wife, and his voice bristled with wrath.

"Here's just what I expected, Jane. Here's a letter from Cousin Bert, an' he says he's been to call on May, an's he's learned that she's in love with one of them artist chaps. I knew something like that would happen—some ornery pale-livered, long-haired paint-dauber! I tol' you when she wanted to go to the city that that was what would happen." His jaws came together in white lines. "One thing is dead certain—she don't marry him!"

Ai Benton's word once spoken was final and subject to no change though the heavens fall. Mrs. Benton, mild of manner and gentle of heart, knew better than to seek to temper the steel of his decision.

With much muttered comment and much heavy scratching of a stub pen, Mr. Benton wrote a letter to the girl in the city whose love had fallen in forbidden places.

In answer to his epistle came a letter which spoiled another meal for Mr. Benton, for the dark-haired girl who was his daughter was made of the same fiery stuff as himself. The letter informed him that she loved Waitt Leighton, and would continue to do so.

Uncle Sam, a mild and impartial messenger on so many errands of love and hate, next carried word to the girl in the city that she was to come home or forfeit the love of her parents.

That message brought her.

Her eyes a little weary, her face sober, she tried to move the will of her father. His answer had been final, and he refused to argue with her.

"My people have been for generations honest and God-fearing; they paid their bills and earned their living by the sweat of their brows, and I won't have in my family a man who splashes paint on little chunks of canvas. That's settled. If he was a honest painter, earning his daily wage, painting houses, or doing something that was a man's business, I'd be satisfied. Housepainters get good money; Dan White stuck me five hundred dollars for painting this house—five hundred dollars! It pays to be a real painter but them toy fellows——!"

He expected his daughter would have more to say, but she did not. She took up her duties around the home without comment, without showing any ill will; but the music had gone out of her life, the rainbow had vanished over the hills.

One day, fat Dan White drove into the yard. "Say, Mr. Benton, I'm going to send a feller over to paint that sign you wanted. I've been so busy I hain't had the time. He's as good as I am."

In the afternoon Mr. Arkley appeared, and busied himself the rest of the afternoon painting a sign that read: "Maplewood Farms." It was a splendid sign. Mr. Benton went out to see it, then he called his daughter.

"Here's what I call paintin', May, the real article. I didn't tell that fellow so while he was here to hear me; but just look at it! People goin' by won't miss that sign; it's the finest sign I ever see, I tell you; an' if I can beat Dan White down a few dollars, I'll be a mighty lucky man. Now if that chap you're gone on could do this kind of man's work, I wouldn't kick against him. That's a man's job! An I'll bet I'll have to pay ten dollars for that sign, too."

In fact, Mr. Benton was so pleased with the sign—and the fact that White agreed to discount the bill for it ten per cent—that he had two more painted and placed on other roads of the farm.

Much to her father's pleasure May became interested in the signs and went to see the painter work.

"Mother," Mr. Benton said thoughtfully, "I'm thinkin' there's somethin' on. I hope the girl does get interested in that young chap—seems to be quite a nice fellow. He's a real painter."

One afternoon, Mr. Benton came in the house, and stopped in the hallway as if stunned.

On a chair lay a painting of his boyhood home. He rubbed his eyes, closed them, but the picture remained. He bent over it and studied it; slowly he sank into a chair before it. He forgot the men in the field waiting for him; he forgot the passing of the precious hours of the working day; he forgot everything of the present; he was back in the haunts of his boyhood, among scenes that remain precious to a man's soul until his eyes close forever to the light of day.

After a while he leaned back and sighed. Slowly back from the past over the tangled trails of the tangled years his mind came to a sudden awakening.

He sprang to his feet; all thought of picture and its associations vanished. Through the window he saw in the shelter of the shed-door, the young sign-painter kissing his daughter!

He burst upon a startled couple. "What do you mean?" was his beginning—only a beginning.

When his speech ebbed, May, her cheeks flushed with rose, said quietly, "Father, let me introduce Mr. Leighton—to whom I am engaged. The picture in the front hall he brought to you. He has been offered five hundred dollars for it—he didn't want me to tell you, but I knew how interested you would be—but he wants you to accept it as the gift of a friend."

Mr. Benton studied the "sign-painter" for a moment, and he spoke as quietly as May. "Mother Benton says I haven't the knack of seein' through things; but I think I can see through the game you young folks have put up on me. Let me say, young man, before I'd let you take that picture away I'd buy it myself. I thought for a minute I was back on the old place when I stepped in the door. Being as it is, I'm mighty glad to take your gift not as that of a friend but a son-in-law to be. Shake!"

The Doings of The Dapperlings

CHAPTER XII.

THE DAPPERLINGS' CONCERT.

"IN my opinion," remarked Quillikin one day, when the Dapperlings were all together in their assembly hall, and had been talking over various Dapperlin affairs, "in my opinion, it is time we were giving another concert. What I propose is to invite all our friends from far and near, and have a grand concert which shall last all day. I have already written the words of a song," he went on, trying to speak modestly, "and it goes with a tune we all know."

The Dapperlings joyfully fell in with Quillikin's plan. Oh, how Nattie wished she might borrow Pittysing's little piano, and astonish everybody with her playing! However, that was not to be thought of.

All the old musical instruments were brought out and examined, but few were any good. All their little banjoes and violins were found to lack strings, and a party of lively young Dapperlings were sent up to the pasture to get a supply of horsehairs to make new strings. It was likely to be dangerous work, but, luckily, they found some of the horses lying down, and snipped off a quantity of long hairs from their manes, without fear of being kicked.

With these, the banjoes and violins were put into good condition, and several old harps restrung. Pieces of the stems of late-blooming dandelions were made into beautiful flutes by skillful Skippywink. Blades of grass held between the thumbs and blown upon produced shrill, stirring bugle calls for the band music. Countless whistles were made from aldre twigs, which ran from low to high notes. Niddy-Nod and Pertwee found a discarded skin which a snake had shed, and with that and some thick pieces of white birch-bark made some beautiful drums of various sizes. Pieces of hollow pumpkin vines, fitted with small mouthpieces, made deep bass horns.

With all the instruments ready for use, there followed hours of practising every day. Dapperlings sang, whistled, and mimicked the notes of all the forest birds. Quillikin's new song was learned, and old ones rehearsed.

Large posters were made and sent to every Dapperling village. Quillikin wrote them, looking very wise, while a crowd of Dapperlings stood around, trying to help, though he wished they would leave him alone.

"Announcement!" wrote Quillikin. "Band—Concert — Dapperlings — Everybody —" here he paused to think.

"Well, why don't you go on?" asked Zipzang, after they had waited a while. "Everybody what?"

"Perhaps you can't understand," said Quillikin, but I will try to explain. I wanted just twenty-six words in it—one for every letter in the alphabet. Begin the first with A, the next with B, and so on. A—Announcement! B—Band! C—Concert! Something new, see? No such poster ever written before. But I don't quite know what to put next. E, f, g, I might say, 'Everybody Feels Gay,' but I don't like it."

"How would 'Everybody Finds Gold,' do?" asked Niddy-Nod, sleepily.

"Because they don't!" snapped Quillikin, who wanted to think in peace. "I'll put, 'Everybody Fancifully Gowned.' Of course the men don't wear gowns, but it's the best I think of."

So he went on, "Everybody Fancifully Gowned. Have Ices, Jellies, Kake."

"I may not know much," ventured Lulie Wye. "but at least I'd never spell cake, 'k-a-k-e.'"

"You would, too, if you were writing this," said Quillikin, "because that's what we're going to have, and K comes next. I shall never get this done if you don't stop interrupting. Now, then! 'Lovely Music. Niddy-Nod's Odd Performances.'"

"I don't like that!" objected Niddy-Nod. "Put 'Operatic Playing,' instead."

"All right." Then he wrote very fast for a few minutes, and proudly read the announcement aloud, beginning at the first.

If you read it carefully through, you will see that the first letters of all the words came just as he wanted them, from A to Z.

"ANNOUNCEMENT!

Band Concert—Dapperlings.
Everybody Fancifully Gowned.
Have Ices, Jellies, Kake.
Lovely Music!
Niddy-Nod's Operatic Playing.
Quillikin's Readings.
Shandle-Spinx Truly Understands Violins!
We X-pect You.
Zipzang."

"Of course," Quillikin explained, "except really begins with e, but it can't be helped. And there was no reason why Zipzang's name should be signed, but I had to get a z in somehow."

It was a beautiful September day that the concert came off. Much too fine, they decided, to have the concert in the assembly hall. The "Ices Jellies, Kake," served at one o'clock, would be there—they wouldn't run the risk of having another feast spoiled by Cattie-Puss and Gyp—but the concert would be in the open air.

Early in the morning the visiting Dapperlings began to come.

Skippywink and Zipzang were tuning their banjoes, when Nattie ran up to them in great excitement.

"That little piano I told you about!" she cried, "It's down by the Mill Brook this minute! The children were playing down there this morning, and left it there when they went home. We can borrow it for a little while. I'll play on it in the concert, and then it can be carried back before the children miss it. Oh, move it for me, please, please!"

They were glad to go. A fine thing, indeed, it would be, to have a piano for their concert! So, with the help of four other Dapperlings, they carried Pittysing's piano to the foot of the hill, where the concert was to take place.

By ten o'clock the place was swarming with Dapperlings, and the grand concert began.

Niddy-Nod was on guard to warn them if anyone came near.

"When your turn comes to take part in the concert, Skippywink will take your place," they promised.

Niddy-Nod grumbled, but of course someone had to watch. Niddy-Nod was fond of napping—that's how he got his name—but one would think a fine concert close by would keep him wide awake, certainly. Still, Niddy-Nod had been out late the night before, learning the call of a night bird, which he wanted to use in the concert. So you mustn't blame him too much when you hear what happened.

"MY—GRACIOUS—GOODNESS! OH, MY GOODNESS—GRACIOUS!" GASPED PITTYSING.

I have said that the day of the concert came in September, and in September, as you all know, the long summer vacation ends, and school begins.

Pittysing was going to school, but Simmie-Sammie would have to wait another year, for he was only five years old.

Pittysing felt very important, I can tell you, when, wearing the cleanest of dresses and freshest of hair ribbons, she kissed her mother and Simmie-Sammie good by and started off every morning.

If it hadn't been for Gyp, I don't know what Simmie-Sammie would have done, he was so lonely.

The morning of the Dapperlings' concert, the children had taken the little piano and Teddy Bear down by the Mill Brook, and the bear, with a little help from Simmie-Sammie, had danced and climbed trees, while Pittysing played the piano.

When she had been called to get ready for school, she ran at once, for fear she might be late and get a tardy mark, asking Simmie-Sammie to carry the playthings home.

I'm afraid Simmie-Sammie was a little lazy; he didn't like to help very well. So he only took Teddy Bear home, leaving the piano. And, as you know, Nattie found it.

At noon, Simmie-Sammie said: "Maybe you better bring home your piano, Pittsy."

"Well, there, now!" flashed Pittysing. "If you couldn't even do that much for me! Oh, well, I s'pose I'll have to go after it!" And off she started.

Simmie-Sammie followed. When they got to the Mill Brook, the piano wasn't there.

"Now you've been and gone and hid it somewhere, Samuel Simmie-Sammie Smith!"

Simmie-Sammie looked a little frightened.

"I never!" he answered. If he had been the means of losing Pittysing's cherished piano, the dearest of all her belongings, he would probably have to give her the other half of his hen, and carry the milk and wipe the breakfast dishes for years.

"Honest Injun, I didn't hide it," he told her so earnestly she had to believe him. "An' I'll help you find it."

"If I hunt long, I'll have to go without my dinner," sighed Pittysing, "for I can't be late to school! I'm sure I don't know where to look—like as not somebody's run off with it. You go down along this side o' the brook, Simmie-Sammie, and I'll go up the other side. But I don't s'pose t'll be any use, for it couldn't walk off its own self!"

So they separated, and began the search, Simmie-Sammie looking under bushes and peering up into tree-tops.

Pittysing crossed the brook, and started slowly in the direction of the hill where she and Simmie-Sammie had raced the day her doll was lost.

A sound of music came to her ears, and she stopped to listen.

I wish I could describe it. Better still, I wish you might have heard it. A wild, gay little strain from a medley of tiny instruments—violin, fife, banjo, flute, harp, cymbal, drum—and through it all the tinkle of the toy piano. But this was only a prelude.

From dozens of little Dapperling throats came the Forest Chorus, brisk pipings, long-drawn, tender calls, notes of gladness, joyous thrills, such a burst of melody it seems that all the birds of all the forests were uniting in one grand chorus.

"Fairies!" breathed Pittysing. "Sakes alive! why didn't I think of it before—that place in the side hill where I found my doll! I'll get my piano if I have to fall through the thistles again!"

Cautiously she tiptoed along, and soon came in sight of the hill.

Oh, where was Niddy-Nod, who should have given warning of her coming?

Asleep at his post! Sound asleep as Little Boy Blue when the sheep wandered in the meadow and the cows spoiled the corn!

There was the Dapperlings' hill, every Dapperling house showing, doors and windows standing open.

There were the crowds of visiting Dapperlings all around, listening to the concert.

There were the musicians, our Dapperlings, all together at the foot of the hill, all their thoughts on that wonderful Forest Chorus. Gay little garments in rainbow colors, September sunshine, music and happiness!

And there stood Pittysing, in open-mouthed wonder, hardly believing her own eyes!

A strange and startling sight to come upon, on a pasture hillside, in broad daylight! Like a bewildering dream, or a story by Iagoo, the great story-teller in Hiawatha.

There came a lull in the music.

"My—gracious—goodness! Oh, my goodness—gracious!" gasped Pittysing.

Every Dapperling looked up—every one but Niddy-Nod, who still slept.

Oh, then there was a grand rush for the houses. They didn't stop to take their musical instruments with them, but dropped everything and ran.

In less time than you would have thought it possible—almost before Pittysing had stopped speaking—the houses were turned around, inside the hill.

But there were two Dapperlings who hadn't gone with the others. Niddy-Nod, of course. Yes, and Nattie, the Smallest Dapperling of all.

Nattie had been thinking quickly. Pittysing had seen her—had seen them all. And why should she run? Hadn't she been longing, all summer, for courage to speak to the little girl? Well, at last the time had come.

So she sprang up from the piano, and rushed over the short grass—straight into Pittysing's embrace! For Pittysing had dropped down on the ground, and was holding out eager arms for her.

They clung to each other, their eyes shining. It would be hard to tell which was happier, the little girl or the tiny Dapperling.

"Oh, I did see you—I did—that time when I was sick!" cried Pittysing!

"Yes, yes!" answered Nattie's little silvery voice.

"And you brought me that dear little basket of flowers, and mamma said I'd been dreaming."

"Yes!"

"And 'twas you took my little doll and made her that lovely dress."

"I took her to Lulie Wye, and she made the dress."

"And you played on my little piano that day we had the show!"

"Yes. And—I'm sorry now—but I hid your nice things for Simmie-Sammie's birthday party dinner."

"But you put 'em back. And I b'lieve 'twas your little slipper Gyp was chewing."

"A pink one?"

"Yes."

"I lost it when we had our moonlight party."

"And you made my garden——"

"The others helped."

"Oh, I'm so glad I've found you! Why didn't you ever come and play with me?"

"I wanted to, but the others all said I mustn't."

"Well, anyway, you're here now, and it seems to me, oh, it seems to me I never, never was so happy in all of my born days!"

"Why, look here!" cried Nattie, as an overwhelming thought came to her. "You saw me that night when I took the flowers to you. You really saw me! Why—why! Nothing awful happened after that! I don't believe anything awful ever would happen, if you saw me ever so many times! The other Dapperlings were afraid—that's all! Then why can't I come to play with you? I will! I will!"

Niddy-Nod had wakened, and, scared and trembling, had been creeping toward them. He seized Nattie's hand, urging, "Come, come!" in a queer, strained voice. He was horribly frightened, but he wasn't going off and leave Nattie.

Up the hill, from the clump of thistles, terrified eyes looked down, and little hands beckoned. One Dapperling house turned slowly outward, the door was opened, and Nattie and Niddy-Nod slipped inside.

But, as she went, Nattie looked back and smiled.

Then, from beyond the brook, came Simmie-Sammie's voice.

"Pittsy!" he called. "Your school bell's wung—I heard it! You'll be late to school, an' you ain't had any dinner!"

THE END.

This ends the first series of Dapperling stories. We have a second series that is still more interesting, but we shall not start it just yet.

Next month we shall treat our little folks to a delightful "Cubby Bear" story, by Mrs. Ellingwood. See that your subscription is paid so not to miss the fine "Cubby Bear" story and picture coming in October COMFORT.

mean to come. If Maurice was coming tonight, he must be at the station now.

As she stood thinking, a noise, a very slight noise, reached her. Was it footsteps coming up the flagged walk to the house?

The girl's heart stood still. Then it bounded, for this must be Maurice!

She flew along the passage to the front door, all ready to open it, but there was no sound outside when she reached it. Could she have made a mistake about the trains, and Mayne be due an hour earlier than she had thought? It sounded like his footsteps, going past the house to his own entrance.

"Well, he shan't get into my part without my knowing," she thought, angrily.

As she turned to go to the red-baize door in the corridor she heard those faint steps again; it was, it must be he—Mr. Mayne!

Somehow all her fright was gone as she reached the door that led into Mayne's rooms. She sat quite calmly on a chair by it, having set down her lamp, and waited to confront him. But she heard nothing; no one was stirring in his rooms.

As she sat watching the plain, unbroken surface of the red door, a sudden strange quiet seemed to come over her. She could not take her eyes off it; she had forgotten all about Maurice; her whole soul was possessed with Clarence Mayne. She must keep him out; at all costs, she must keep him out!

She said the words over and over slowly, almost without her own will. And as she did so, the door began to move, swinging inwardly without a sound.

The girl rose to her feet.

"I must keep him out," she said slowly, dreamily.

It swung, as she stared at it, wide on its hinges; and from the dark room behind it came an air so chilly, so death-like, that it chilled her to the bone.

In the dark oblong of the open door Clarence Mayne was standing, looking at her. His eyes glittered in the lamplight, full of malice; she met them bravely with her own.

Why did he not speak? And how had he come by that little cut on his forehead, which had made a streak of blood down his cheek?

She leaned forward, looking him full in those hateful pale eyes of his; something bound her tongue—she could not speak.

He made a step forward; another and he would cross the threshold.

"Keep him out!" The words echoed loud in her ears as though some one else had said them. All her soul rose in repulsion. Mayne should never cross that threshold.

She flung out her hand imperiously to stop him.

It touched nothing, and again that blast of icy cold air made her shiver.

She staggered, and leaned, faint and sick, against the wall.

Clarence Mayne, as she looked at him, had faded into a shadow; had gone, without moving, without a sound! And, slowly as it had opened, the red door swung shut again.

Was it Clarence Mayne who had stood there, or what was it that she had seen, all alone in the great, empty house?

Cold drops of fear came out on her forehead. She dared not try if the red door was fast; dared not turn her back on it, and make her way to her own part of the house, with she knew not what Thing of life or death behind her. If she had to see it again, it must be facing it, with her back against the solid wall.

She stood waiting, each minute expecting she knew not what.

The house was dead and silent; she would have given worlds to hear a dog bark—even a rat stir in the wall.

Where was Maurice? It must be the middle of the night!

There was a ring at the door, then another; but the girl did not hear it, where she stood spellbound.

Suddenly quick steps came down the passage—human, living steps which were the most heavenly sounds she had ever heard. It was Maurice!

Nerine sprang to meet the boy, and clung to him. She began to sob as his strong young arms closed round her.

"I thought you would never come!" she cried.

"What kept you, and how did you get in?"

"Broke a pane in the morning-room window and undid the catch. I rang first. Didn't you hear me?"

She shook her head.

"I was here."

"You gave me an awful fright," the boy said, with a curious huskiness in his voice. "When I got your telegram I thought, of course, you were in the train with Mr. Mayne; I was waiting at the station when they heard about it."

"Heard about what?"

"It's all smashed up—gone down an embankment about five miles from our own station.

Why Canned Goods Are Always Safe

By R. M. Baker

Copyright, 1917, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

FIRST of all, canned goods are always safe because no germ life can exist, nor fermentation begin while the can is sealed; empty the contents into glass or crockery when the cans are opened and you have food that is pure, wholesome and absolutely safe.

The manufacturer of canned goods is a careful shopper,—far more careful than the average housewife. He cannot succeed if his goods are bad. He knows it. The result is that he buys the best, sees that it is put up in purity,—and you get the benefit.

He buys his meat by the ton and his vegetables by the carload, in order to turn out the finished product at perhaps the rate of a hundred thousand pounds a day. Every single piece of meat is inspected, and if imperfect, is not only thrown out, but the whole lot from which the piece came, often a ton or so, is also rejected. By doing this three or four times, and putting the packer to the trouble of carrying that immense quantity of meat back, the buyer seldom finds a poor piece of meat in his consignments.

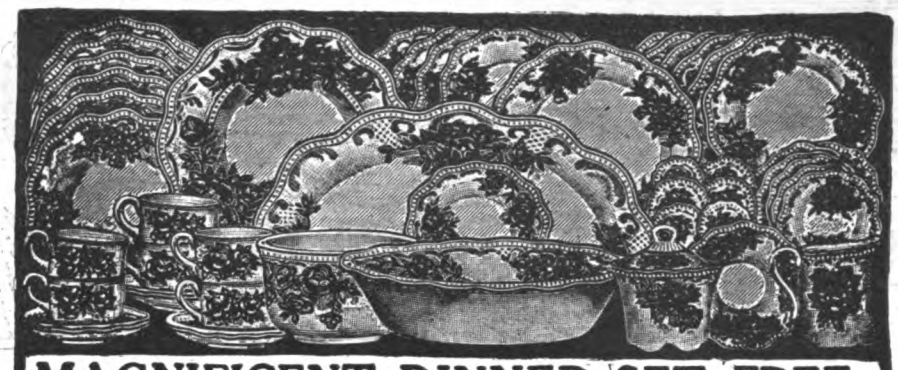
The vegetables undergo minute inspection. All are prepared by neat, wholesome young women who are divided into squads, each of which is under the supervision of an older woman who sees that nothing unworthy of the table of a king is incorporated into the food.

The average canning plant today is of the whitest cement and the utensils of brightest and shiniest of copper. Every labor-saving device, the worth of which has been proven, is there. Tables scoured to a pure whiteness contain rows and rows of shining pans, heaped with celery, chopped vegetables and the white kernels of corn. The hands and finger nails of all the employees receive constant attention. Everyone of them carries an immaculate towel, fastened to the belt, with which the slightest discoloration of their hands is instantly removed. The great vats containing soup, tomatoes, spaghetti and vegetables are absolutely clean. The machinery is clean,—so well cared for, and so efficient looking, that it becomes almost artistic.

There are many machines which cut carrots, turnips, etc., into dice, and then the bright vegetables are swung aloft by machinery in a wire basket, traveling the way cash baskets do in a department-store, until they reach the great, boiling cauldrons and are automatically dumped in. These are copper, lined with tin.

Soup is clarified with beef rather than egg, because the albumen of blood is more strength-giving. Large white cloth strainers cover all open liquids, even if they are to stand only a few moments. Real French chefs prepare the soup according to absolute and accurate recipes.

There are literally thousands of different foods canned commercially nowadays. Many of them save the housekeeper hours of time and infinite trouble. Spinach, for instance, one buys in such great bulk, and finds so dirty, that its cooking is really something of a problem for the thousands of women who do "light housekeeping" in city flats and kitchenette apartments. The preparation of a peck of leaves, including washing them thoroughly and boiling a long time on a small gas burner, is troublesome and expensive. Many other vegetables which require a number of hours for cooking, such as beets and turnips, can be had in a perfect cooked state in tins, requiring merely a moment for heating. When one cooks by gas, it certainly is economical to buy such vegetables already prepared. There are canned sour kraut, delicious little Lima beans; and who would spend hours soaking and baking beans, when such delicious baked beans can be bought so cheaply?



Again, the food manufacturer can buy the fresh vegetables at the height of their season, when they are ripest and cheapest. He, therefore, can put up a better quality, and do it more cheaply for us, than we can buy the emaciated hothouse product, or cold-storage foods.

Everyone knows that the sooner a vegetable is cooked after the picking, the finer the flavor. The dweller of the city is apt to eat, all his life, rather wilted and inferior vegetables, because transportation is complicated, and farm products are handled a great many times by the various wholesalers and commission men, before reaching the city table. Also, these vegetables are apt to be germ-laden, having been fingered by so many persons and exposed to the dirt of streets, and to deliberate handling by various marketers. The housekeeper is fortunate if she can get fresh food, free from dirt and disease germs by careful washing. On the other hand, the products of any first-class factory are bought in great quantities direct from the farm, and scarcely touched by human hands, before their wonderful hot steam baths and perfect sterilization.

The use of canned soup is very extensive, nowadays, because the housekeeper finds it so simple and convenient to open a can of chicken bouillon or tomato, or mock turtle, when she has company drop in upon her suddenly. It is not every woman who knows how to prepare well the fancy soups, such as mulligatawny. Then, too, she does not always have at hand the various ingredients,—the spices, the pearl barley and different attractive accessories.

It is extremely convenient and neat and cleanly to open the bright tin can and pour the steaming contents directly into the pretty china soup plates. Often she is certain that the bouillon is of a better quality, and is "safer" than any she could make from a chicken bought from her neighborhood dealer, whom she suspects of carrying only cold storage products.

No one can doubt that purchasing in large quantities makes materials far cheaper than they are in the individual home; nor that expensive and scientific apparatus, and expert, high-salaried chefs make for efficiency. How can we possibly expect the ignorant maid-of-all work in our little house or flat, to have a knowledge of chemistry, of sterilization, and of food values? Canned foods are always pure and wholesome.

among you who would withhold your small help to keep a home for one stricken down.

It is often difficult for us to put ourselves in the other fellow's place. Had I not cared for Uncle Charlie while he was in the hospital in New York City, I might not appreciate his condition, but it requires little imagination to fancy one sick and unable to work to keep safe and secure that which all of us love and reverence—a home.

These are strenuous times, the times that try men's souls. Let them make us more mindful of the other's need that we may lift where we stand, and apart from the real pleasure we get in helping another, comes the very safe assurance that "The gift is to the giver and comes back, most to him,

It cannot fail."

LYDIA E. LASKOWSKI.

Sisters. Uncle Charlie is exceedingly grateful for the money sent him and receives a ten-cent contribution, from someone unable to send more, with as much appreciation as the one dollar, or more, donation from a richer subscriber, but, judging from the enthusiastic letters received, it would seem that during a year's time it should amount to more than $2000.00 and, to date, I don't think it is much more than that, if any.

There is not space to print all the letters in favor of the project but in one at hand the writer suggests that the men give up cigars, or tobacco in any form, for one week and the women do without candy, gum, ice-cream and movies for the same length of time and donate the money saved to the Home Fund; however, this is merely a suggestion, and from an outsider for Uncle Charlie does not ask for more than can willingly and conveniently be given, but he is, oh, so grateful for any help!—Ed.

WADESBORO, N. C.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

My subscription has expired but I'm renewing it with this letter, for I can't do without COMFORT. I enjoy every page and especially the Poultry Department. I prefer to earn my own pin money and then I feel free to use it as I please.

I keep pure bred Single Comb Rhode Island Red chickens and find a great demand for stock and eggs. I had calls in January and February for day-old chicks but didn't have them to spare that early. I would advise all pure bred poultry dealers to have mating list printed, as it does away with so much writing in the rush of answering inquiries after advertising stock or eggs. I find that it is a time saver.

I exhibited a few pullets and cockerels this last season at Wadesboro and won first and second prizes for both. I also won first prize at the North Carolina State Show.

I am a member of the N. C. Poultry Club and keep a record of my work each year and I know just how I come out. I always make a sum above expenses. I advise all farm women to keep pure bred poultry for they pay, while mongrels didn't pay me.

I am joining the canning club this year and will have a big garden to can from, of tomatoes, okra, corn, beans, etc. I will use vegetables for my chicks and for home use, and I mean to have lots of canned goods for winter use and for sale.

I like to seek opportunities on the farm and keep busy and when I want to buy anything or need money for some special purpose, I don't have to depend on others for it. There are many advantages on the farm if we will only realize them and get busy.

With kindest regards to all,

MISS SADIE COVINGTON.

SPRINGVILLE, TENN.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

Would you mind letting a little Tomato Club Girl say a few words?

I do not wish to arouse the indignation of any of the city sisters but I cannot agree with them when they say city life is better than country life for children.

I am sixteen years old and have lived on a farm all my life. I have been a member of the Girls' Tomato Club for two years and think it the best organization for girls of which I know. Do any of the sisters belong? I have never heard it mentioned.

I think every girl should know how to keep house, cook, can fruit and vegetables, do farm work and raise chickens. Perhaps some rich girls will sneer at this and say they don't have to do such work for a living but suppose you don't now, you don't know how long before you will have to. If we learn now it will be much easier. We should always be prepared for an emergency.

If any of the sisters belong to the Tomato Club I would like to correspond with them.

Cleanliness is next to Godliness and being clean is the most important part of being a Club Girl. Be clean, economical and honest; those three things combined give a girl the right start in life.

I am five feet, eight inches tall, weigh one hundred and fifteen pounds and have dark brown hair and eyes. Lovingly, INEZ PROVON.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

I have been reading the sisters' letters and I want them to give me a little advice. I am only sixteen years old but I have made a sad mistake in my life and now I want you all to tell me how I can make something of myself so as to make my mother and sister feel proud of me some day. I want to be a perfect lady hereafter and I will heed all the advice given me. Hopefully yours, M. B.

M. B.—I am writing a personal letter to you and if the sisters don't respond to your noble appeal I shall be very much disappointed in them. —Ed.

SHEPHERDSVILLE, KY.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

After reading Mrs. Albert Tinkle's letter in the April issue I have mustered up courage enough to send in a piece of poetry that applies to her letter and I hope that the husbands will read it carefully.

Tell Her So

"Amid the cares of married life,
In spite of toil and business strife,
If you value your sweet wife
Tell her so!

"Prove to her you don't forget
The bond to which the seal is set;
She's of life's sweets and the sweetest yet,
Tell her so!

"When days are dark and deeply blue,
She has her troubles, same as you,
Show her that your love is true—
Tell her so!

"There was a time you thought it bliss
To get the favor of one kiss;
A dozen now won't come amiss—
Tell her so!

"Your love for her is no mistake—
You feel it dreaming or awake—
Don't conceal it, for her sake,
Tell her so!

"Don't act, if she has passed her prime,
As though to please her were a crime,
If e'er you loved her, now's the time—
Tell her so!

"She'll return for each caress,
A hundredfold of tenderness.
Hearts like hers were made to bless,
Tell her so!

"You are hers and hers alone,
Well you know she's all your own;
Don't wait to "carve it on a stone,"
Tell her so!

"Never let her heart grow cold—
Richer beauties will unfold;
She is worth her weight in gold!
Tell her so!"

MRS. EDWARD SIMON.

PARADIS, LA.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

Often in these days of the high cost of living have I turned the pages of dear old COMFORT for some recipe to use in making left-overs into attractive dishes, as well as other recipes, and I am never disappointed. I could hardly do without the dear old paper.

The war has taught us a valuable lesson in conserving our food supply and to grow everything we can for the table. It is a lesson that will benefit all and make living more as it was in the past instead of depending on the tin can and the grocer's shelf. It is our duty, dear sisters, to do our bit in every way possible to help our glorious country in its hour of need. No sacrifice is too great. Let every one who can, buy a Liberty Loan Bond, help the Red Cross, or do something in the service of the country that we may bring to a successful termination the war which is raging in Europe. May our country emerge triumphant. We, down South here, who are blessed with a more temperate climate, will do all we can in raising bumper crops of early and late truck as well as everything else we can and I know the same is true of the rest of the country. We were fortunate in having had an early spring and prospects of a late autumn and this enables us to raise and ship vast quantities of all kinds of vegetables to our less fortunate brothers in the North. This place has never looked more like God's country than at the present time. Everything grows wonderfully, corn, cane, cotton, all kinds of grain, and vegetables.

Best Ways of Doing Things Around The Home

Use vaseline to keep the sink free from rust or to remove rust spots.

Use a soft brush when dusting gilt frames, as a cloth dims the polish.

Rub the backs of old paintings with oil of cedar and insects will not trouble them.

Clean brass bedsteads with flannel dipped in kerosene and then polish with chamois.

Traces of mud may be removed from black dresses by rubbing the stains with raw potato.

Mildew can be removed by rubbing green tomatoes and salt on the spot and exposing to the sun's rays.

Rub a curtain pole with kerosene until it is perfectly smooth, using a woolen cloth. The rings will slide easily then.

In washing any delicate material with gasoline, add a little salt and there will not be a stain left at the edges of the washed article.

To remove paint from silk goods, saturate the goods with equal parts of ammonia and turpentine, wash in soapsuds and let dry between blotting paper and under a heavy weight.

If a bowl or pan has any kind of food stuck to it, turn it upside down in a pan of hot water and leave for a few minutes and it will be easier to wash.

MYRTLE JACOBS, Bryan, Texas.

Don't close the registers before shaking the furnace fire. Instead leave them open and cover with a wet cloth, which absorbs the dust and ashes that rise. If they are closed the dust settles underneath but spreads over the rooms when opened.

SOAP THAT WILL FLOAT.—Two tomato cans of grease one can of patent lye dissolved in one quart cold water. Heat the grease and water containing lye separately and when both are lukewarm, pour the lye into the grease, stirring all the time. Add immediately one cup of ammonia and two tablespoons of borax dissolved in one half cup water. Stir until as thick as honey. Put paper in bottom of dripping pan and pour the mixture in. In about five hours mark it off into squares. In a day or two break apart and put in a warm place to dry. If allowed to dry a month it will last much longer but it can be used in a week's time. This soap can be used for the hands as well as for clothes.

Remedies

Mutton tallow and turpentine is fine for a sprain.

Soda, salt and water make an excellent gargle for sore throat.

Hops put in bag and wrung out in hot water will often relieve neuralgia pains.

Apply castor oil to warts and in time it removes them. MRS. OCIE D. EWELL, Post City, Tex.

HIVES.—Cut an onion in halves, put a piece of sulphur the size of a match head in the hollow of the onion and put the halves together and wrap in heavy brown paper. Put in oven and bake till paper is well burned. Remove onion and press the juice from it. For a dose, give a little in a spoon every two or three hours. This will cure the hives in a few days.

RUPTURE CURE. (Requested).—Boil fifteen eggs hard, remove yolks and cut them up and put into spider. Put over a slow fire and stir constantly, gradually increasing the heat. It will soon dissolve into a creamy looking substance which, as the fire grows hotter, turns brown and looks like coffee grounds. Stir rapidly all the time. It will smoke and smell terribly and you will feel sure it is burned up but keep at it patiently and after a while it will dissolve into a black oil. Strain and bottle this. Apply this oil every night, making sure the rupture is back in place. Every morning use a healing salve, made as follows:

Melt together a little new, unsalted butter with one quarter as much beeswax and after melting add a few drops of oil of spike. This is very healing and prevents the rupture getting sore on the outside. This treatment is to be continued three weeks or more. I have used it with good success on ruptured colts.

The Costly Feed Situation

WITH corn away over two dollars a bushel, cornmeal over eighty dollars a ton, and other feeds in proportion, the stock feeding problem is going to be a perplexing one this fall and next winter. More than ever before will owners have to make home-grown feed go as far as possible, and there will be a great temptation to underfeed. Let it be understood, however, that underfeeding is the poorest kind of "economy." Unless the young, growing animals are fully fed, they will become stunted, and if that occurs, they never can be made profitable.

The feed for the growing calves need not be very expensive. In Great Britain store cattle are wintered largely upon oat straw and purple top turnips (rutabagas) and white (Dutch) turnips. If not too expensive, a little American cottonseed or linseed cake also is given.

Feed the Bright Oat Straw

We should make far better use of our oat straw. Too often this useful feed is got rid of by burning, or is allowed to weather and spoil. Put the choicest of it into the barn at threshing time and make it a part ration of cattle, young and old, the colts and adult horses. If a cutter is owned, we should run the straw through that for the young stock and dairy cows, and if blackstrap molasses can be bought at a fair price, that should be diluted with water and sprinkled upon the cut straw to make it more palatable.

Feeding Molasses

Molasses is a highly nutritious feed and will quickly plump a thin horse. It is now much used in combination with ground Alfalfa, as that feed is very rich in protein, while molasses is rich in carbohydrates needed to balance the protein. Use molasses to help out the ration of the dairy cows. By so doing more unpalatable yet nutritious feed can be used, now that ordinary cow feed is held at prohibitive prices. Second crop clover which usually is somewhat woody, and even threshed clover which is a lot woodier, may be made much more palatable by running through the cutter and then wetting with molasses water. If this cannot be done, it should be sprinkled with salty water, and if meal, or even some bran, can be sprinkled upon it at feeding time, it will be eaten with more relish and also will prove more nutritious.

Concentrated Feed Necessary

Cattle need a less concentrated ration than horses and many of our readers no doubt make the common mistake of feeding too much meal to their dairy cows, while as many more make the worse mistake of wintering their cows solely upon hay, straw and corn fodder. The rule of good feeders, who also are able economists, is to allow one pound of concentrated feed to every three or three and one half pounds of milk produced by each cow. The milk pays for this feed and the flow is kept up thereby. If the extra feed is withheld, the cow for a time draws upon her stored up nutrients, and so keeps up a fair flow of milk, but soon the surplus is exhausted, the milk flow shrinks, and the cow meanwhile has become unprofitably thin. While allowing the cow all the bulky feed she cares to eat, the concentrate is necessary to balance the ration. Study the prices of feed in the local market, and buy the feed that will supply protein most cheaply. Unless an abundance of hay, Alfalfa, clover, or oats is available, a concentrate must be given, if the cows are to do well. If homegrown grain, such as oats, barley, or rye can be fed, this, along with the home supply of roughage will suffice fairly well, but if not too dear, a little wheat bran and oil cake or meal should be added.

Utilizing the Corn Fodder

"For any sake" don't leave the valuable corn fodder out in the fields to freeze fast to the ground and lose over 75 per cent of its nutrient value by "weathering." At least bring it into the cattle yard as soon as the shocks have been husked in the field. Millions of pounds of valuable nutrient for animals are lost by allowing corn fodder to weather each winter. The best possible thing to do with a lot of the fodder, as soon as husking is completed, would be to run it through the silage cutter and into the silo. If this can be done, the cut fodder should be made wringing wet, as it is packed away, and then will go through a fairly satisfactory fermenting process before it is used. With it, if so desired, can be cut late grown green stuff of almost any kind in districts where early frosts do not kill all vegetation at the time when corn husking is going on.

When no silo is owned, it is a good plan to run the corn fodder through a cutter for cow feeding, as was done with the clover hay, and to add some meal and then feed it wetted with molasses water. For the feeding of horses we prefer uncut fodder. The horses eat only the best parts of the leaves and stalks and cannot well take care of the thicker parts of the stems, even when run through a cutter. Corn fodder alone does not fully supply the needs of the idle horses. Add oat straw and hay, and if at all possible, also allow some ear corn. One of the most perfect rations for a horse is formed of ear corn and Alfalfa hay, so far as maintaining weight and economy is concerned, but when the experiments in such feeding were made both of these feeds were comparatively cheap. Avoid feeding moldly or frosted corn fodder or hay. They may prove deadly or highly detrimental.

Other Items of Economy in Feeding

Get out of the habit of feeding hay to the work horses three times a day. Hay is unnecessary at noon where grain is fed, and the horses will do better without it. Then be careful to restrict the amount of hay to the needs of each horse. Many farmers allow their horses all the hay they care to consume, and they eat more than they need, or is good for them. A working horse needs little over one pound of hay for each 100 pounds of bodyweight as a day's ration, and should have most of this hay at night. Increase the allowance of roughage a trifle when the horse is idle. See that all feed is cleaned up at each meal and so adjust the manger and feed box that feed will not get onto the floor to be trampled upon and lost.

The "good" of much grain is lost by imperfect chewing and the horse consequently eats more than it needs or utilizes. Have the teeth of each horse put in proper condition by a veterinarian before winter feeding starts, and then mix cut hay or straw with the grain and feed from very large boxes to prevent bolting of feed.

Economy in Bedding Material

Don't waste good feed by using it as bedding. Coarse rye and wheat straw that are not relished by horses may be used, but not bright oat straw, shredded corn fodder or hay. Forest leaves and dry peat may in many districts be substituted for more expensive bedding material, and those who live near planing mills and saw mills should utilize shavings and sawdust until prices again fall to a reasonable plane. Any disadvantage such bedding materials may have will probably be more than offset by the use of straw, hay, and fodder as feed for their fertilizing elements will be saved in the manure.

Saving the Waste

The prices of all food products are high. So long as the war lasts there is little likelihood of cheaper prices on things to eat and every chance in the world of their going still higher. Prices are controlled by the law of supply and demand. A short supply means high prices—a large demand means high prices. Both a shortage in supplies and a large demand with a normal supply tend to drive prices up. We have both these operating at the present time. Owing to the war we have a greatly reduced supply of food. Too many farmers are fighting instead of tilling the land; hence there has been a falling off in production ever since the war began. The world supply of food is short. This has produced a large demand for American food. Much of this that has been shipped abroad has been sent to the bottom of the ocean by submarines; hence has never been used as food. These unsuccessful efforts to get food to Europe have further increased the foreign demand, and prices continue to rise.

WHAT CAN WE DO ABOUT IT NOW?—The answer is "Save the waste." No more food can be raised this year, hence every bit that has been produced should be saved. Very little food that is brought into the home is now wasted. Housewives have been forced by high prices to use up the "left-overs." Practically no food is thrown out. Where, then, is the waste? This comes largely in vegetables and fruits. More garden truck has been raised than can be used in the green state. Every year tons of fruit spoil on the ground for want of a market. This waste must be saved this year.

Saving by Canning

Surplus vegetables should be canned. It is not so easy to can vegetables so that they will keep as it is to can fruits, but it can be done. The cold pack method gives best satisfaction. By this method the vegetables are washed and packed in the can cold. Salt water is then poured over them to completely fill the can and the goods are thoroughly cooked in the can for several hours. The cooking is done by one of several ways. The cans may be simply baked in the oven for two or three hours, or they may be steamed in the wash boiler for the same time—or better still cooked in a high pressure cooker, a steam device that insures the keeping quality of the goods. These methods are fully discussed in a government bulletin referred to in another place in this paper.

Saving by Drying

Most all fruits and many vegetables may be dried. They may be dried in the sun in hot dry weather or over a stove or in oven on cool moist days. Fruits for drying should be ripe and clean. Plums, peaches and cherries should be stoned before drying. The screens upon which they are placed should be so arranged as to provide free circulation of air and be protected from flies and dust.

All berries may be dried in the same way, but for drying berries it is better to use artificial heat than to attempt to dry in the sun, on account of the large amount of juice which they contain.

Most vegetables can be dried. All beans that are usually cooked green, like string and Lima beans, may be left on the vines until fully mature and then shelled and dried. String beans may be dried green by cutting them up in small pieces in order to expose a large amount of surface for quick drying. Sweet corn may be dried either raw or cooked and is much more delicious than canned corn. Vegetables like carrots and even potatoes may be sliced and dried, though of course if one has a good place to store them root crops had best be kept fresh.

Saving by Salting

Peas, beans, corn and cucumbers may be preserved for winter use by salting in open jars with a weight on top of the contents to keep them submerged in the brine. Our readers should send for the two government bulletins described in this department in August COMFORT. One gives valuable information on how to save waste by canning and the other tells how to preserve fruits and vegetables by drying. Write to U. S. Dept. of Agriculture, Washington, D. C., for Farmers' Bulletin No. 839 entitled "Home Canning by One Period Cold Pack Method," and for Bulletin No. 841 entitled "Drying Fruits and Vegetables in the Home," if you have not already sent for them as we advised in August COMFORT.

Seed Grain and Shock Threshing

This year more than any other our slogan should be "Save the seed grain." If we are to do this, the practise of threshing from the field should be abandoned throughout the region of abundant summer rainfall.

Grain to keep well must go through a sweat to rid itself of excess moisture which it contains when it first ripens. If this does not occur before threshing it will afterwards. Such grain will sweat and heat in the bin. This heating in the bin destroys its vitality and promotes the growth of molds. Moldy grain will not grow and is unfit for either human or stock food.

Thresh from the Stack

The cure for this trouble is simply this: Let the grain stand in the stack long enough to go through the sweat before threshing. Shock threshing was introduced into this country from the dry regions of the West. Where it never rains during harvest time grain will cure in the field, but in humid regions grain must stand in the stack at least three weeks before threshing if we are to get it in best shape for both seed and feed. Hence stack before threshing.

Seed Shortage

Nearly every section of the United States has experienced some difficulty this year in obtaining seeds for planting. This has had its influence upon the size of this year's crop. The reason for seed shortage is mainly the war in Europe. Many farm seeds are imported from across the water and with the blockade and the submarine campaign seed importation practically ceased. Again, European nations have been so busy fighting that they have neglected to raise seeds for other than their own use, so there has been little if any to export to the United States.

WHAT SEEDS ARE SHORT?—Nearly all classes of garden seeds are short. Particularly is this true of the small seeds, like turnips, rutabagas and other root crops. Sugar beet seed production is confined largely to Europe; so too is that of such legumes as sanfoin, saradella and vetch. We depend largely upon Europe for our supply of seeds for everything except the standard farm grains and the usual garden seeds that may be produced easily and in abundance in America. The very small seeds, those of root crops and unusual plants, are not produced in America except in limited quantities.

LET US RAISE OUR OWN SEEDS.—The answer to the question "What are you going to do about it?" is "Raise our own seeds." It is pretty late to begin now but it is better to be late in starting than to have none of these seeds two years hence. Fortunate it is that this class of seeds retain their vitality for several years, else we would have had none to plant this year since most of the seed found on the market this year was "old stock" carried over from the year before. Next year we may have very few seeds of this class to plant and two years hence none at all unless we begin this year to raise our own seeds.

How to Raise Seeds of Root Crops

It takes two years to produce seeds from root crops. The roots grown from the seed this year must be carefully stored so as to come through the winter firm, crisp and vigorous. These may be planted next spring as soon as the ground is in fit condition to work in a moderately rich and well prepared soil. They will soon start to grow and should be as carefully cultivated as other crops during their growing period. As the tops mature the roots shrivel in size since the growing plant does not draw its food in very large degree from the soil but from the heavy root in which the food matter was stored the year before for the very purpose of producing seed.

HARVESTING SEED.—Near the ripening period seeds should be very carefully watched or the seeds will be lost if left to become too ripe. As soon as the first pods begin to split open and discharge their seed upon the ground, the plants should be cut, dried and the seed removed by threshing with a flail, by the old-fashioned method. For this purpose, a canvas,—a binder cover will do—should be spread upon the barn floor and the seeds threshed thereon. They may be cleaned by winnowing or by running through a first-class fanning mill if the supply be large. After cleaning they should be thoroughly dried before storing.

Fall Culture of Asparagus

Asparagus, one of the most delicious of early spring vegetables, is easy to grow if given the proper care after the cutting season is over. This occurs early in July in most sections where this plant thrives.

A new bed should not be cut until the plants are three years old. They may be started in the fall from seedlings or from old plants. These should be set three feet apart each way. The soil should be rich and sandy and the ground heavily manured. A Southern exposure is to be preferred. The beds should be cultivated between the rows and hoed the first year or two. Later the weeds may be kept down by use of a heavy straw mulch.

In early fall as soon as the plants have matured the old canes should be cut and removed from the field and the ground heavily manured.

Full instructions on "how to grow asparagus" are given by many of the seed houses as well as in agricultural bulletins. It will be well, for those who are thinking of setting a bed this fall or of sowing seeds in the spring, to send to the Department of Agriculture and to seed houses for the information obtainable from bulletins and seed catalogues.

The Questions and Answers constitute one of the most valuable features of this department and we urge our farmer subscribers to read all of them carefully each month, as you will find that they contain much useful information and advice on practical problems that are troubling you as well as those who have asked the questions. Cut them out and paste them into a scrapbook for future reference. This will save you the trouble of writing us and will avoid delay in getting your answer when you need advice on these same matters. We are glad to receive inquiries from our subscribers and to advise them on all matters pertaining to farming.

Questions and Answers

SELF-SUCKING COW.—To keep a cow from sucking herself put on an old horse collar and she can't get her head around. MRS. W. F. H.

A.—This is a good plan and much simplier than adjusting a "necklace" of sharpened pickets or laths which has been recommended.

MOLES.—What do you think as to moles being injurious to the farm? Do the moles damage crops badly? Do you think it necessary to trap or poison moles? It is the common practise here. P. H. T., Mich.

A.—Moles are a benefit to the farmer, as they eat worms, grubs and other noxious pests and turn up rich, surface soil. They are a nuisance, however, when they commence operations on one's lawn, or in the well sodded blue grass pasture and so people prefer to trap them on general principles. Apart from the unsightly burrows they make and the possible disturbance they are to crop plant roots, when driving their burrows, moles may be considered harmless as they feed on insects and not on plant life. It is questionable, however, whether their good qualities are not more than offset by the mischief they do in burrowing. Our personal opinion is that it pays to trap moles, where their burrows are so numerous as to be a serious inconvenience.

CHESTNUTS AND ERGOTS.—What do you call the horny growths on the fore legs of horses, above the knees on the inside of the leg, and at the back of each fetlock joint and also on the hocks of the hind legs? What are they for? Can they be cut off when long? N. J., Nebr.

A.—"Chestnuts" are the horny growths or callosities, of the legs above the knees and on the hocks. They are vestigial hoofs, or footpads, of the prehistoric horse, which had five toes. The modern horse stands on the developed nail of the middle digit or finger. The chestnut is supposed to correspond to the thumb nail, the ergot with the finger nail. The ergot takes its name from "ergot of rye" which is a purple-black spur protruding from the seed hull of rye, barley, blue grass or June grass, wild rye and other cereals. Chestnuts and ergots have no special function and are large and coarse in coarse bred horses, or those having coarse hair and skin. They may safely be reduced in length. This is not necessary, as regards the ergots, as they are hidden by hair; but the chestnuts are often unduly prominent and unsightly. They may be cut off flush with the skin, by means of a sharp knife. In race horses, with long pasterns, the ergots have been found bleeding after a race, showing that the parts come in contact with the ground in some horses of that kind. Possibly they tend to somewhat protect the tendons and fetlock joints when this occurs.

A WEED FARM.—A farm devoted entirely to the cultivation of weeds is maintained in connection with the University of Minnesota. Here students devote their time to studying the different kinds of weeds, their habits and growth, in order to determine the most effective ways of eradicating them in other places. Over 175 varieties were grown this season on this farm. The students were taught to distinguish each of these at a glance.

Planning for Winter

SEPTEMBER is a very important month in the poultry world, as it is the pivot on which winter success balances. Neglect of any sort at this crucial time will invariably affect the supply of winter eggs, on which the real profit of the year depends. Poultry houses must be put into thorough repair and sanitary condition before the first of October, so that the birds may be placed in their winter quarters and not again disturbed.

It is my own custom to go over all the buildings in the chicken-yard, mend any cracks or holes which may be found, and paint the roofs with liquid tar. The floors are scraped out to a depth of two or three inches, perches and nest boxes taken out, and the whole interior given a coat of hot whitewash. To make the whitewash, three quarts of fresh lime are placed in a pail and just covered with hot water. When the mixture commences to boil, it is stirred until the lumps are dissolved and, as it thickens, boiling skim-milk is added, until it is of the consistency of cream. Lastly, a cupful of crude carbolic acid, a pound of whiting, and a half pound of powdered glue are mixed in. This makes a wash which sticks almost as well as paint, and which, when applied hot, most effectually banishes vermin.

Cleaning a poultry-house is a task which must not be done in a slipshod way. Before whitewashing the walls, floor and ceiling with a brush, if you have a garden spray, fill it full of the liquid mixture, and apply it to all the corners, kinks and crevices, for they are the places which harbor vermin, and cannot be reached with the ordinary brush.

When the whitewashing is all done and has had time to dry, the floors are covered with fresh lime, which burns out all impurities, and after a few hours, dry soil or sand is filled in to the depth of two or three inches. Windows are cleaned, inside and out, so that the sun may have free access; perches and nest boxes are thoroughly scrubbed with kerosene, whitewashed and replaced. When all this is accomplished, the biddies' home is sweet and wholesome.

I try to finish all this work before the fifteenth of the month, so that there will be no delay in getting the hens into their winter quarters. Any change of houses after pullets have once commenced to lay invariably stops them, and should cold weather start in before they have regained their equilibrium, much time may be wasted.

Vermin are disagreeable enemies against which the poultry keeper must maintain a perpetual war. A good liquid exterminator is made by dissolving crude naphtha flakes in kerosene oil, using just as much of the flakes as will dissolve in any given quantity of oil. Paint the roofs, nest boxes, and any supports or frames about the house with the mixture. It does not take very long to do the work. Half an hour every Saturday will increase the birds' comfort and your profit.

Powder to use on the birds can be made for a few cents. Mix thoroughly equal parts of finely sifted coal ashes and tobacco dust, and moisten with the liquid exterminator. Allow it to dry, and put away in cans ready for use. Tobacco dust can be bought at most florists', and at all seed stores, for twelve cents a pound. An empty baking powder tin, with some holes pierced at one end, makes a good dredger.

The birds should be dusted with the powder before being placed in a clean house. Hold the hen by the feet, head downwards, and shake the powder well into the feathers. Use plenty of it, and with your hand rub it down into the fluffy part of the feathers near the skin, and especially near the tail on the body, and under the wings. If you have not been using any such precautions, or when you buy new birds, you ought to go over them every other night for a week. This will make it an easy matter to keep them free from the various vermin pests which seem to have been specially created for the undoing of poultry keepers.

My winter houses are one hundred feet long, twelve feet wide, and are divided into eight compartments, into each of which I put twenty-five layers. This gives them plenty of room for exercise, even when heavy snows necessitate keeping them shut up for days and weeks at a time.

If you have pullets and year-old hens, to secure the best results they should be kept in separate coops, as they require a different amount of feed. If you do not have a sufficient number of houses, it would be an easy matter to run a wire partition through the middle of one house, and so make two compartments.

I spend much of my time at this season of the year watching the hens, both old and young. I don't believe in keeping unprofitable birds through the winter, and birds which look mopy are consigned to the fattening pen. Even slow, dull-looking pullets are rejected, as I want only bright, energetic birds in the laying houses.

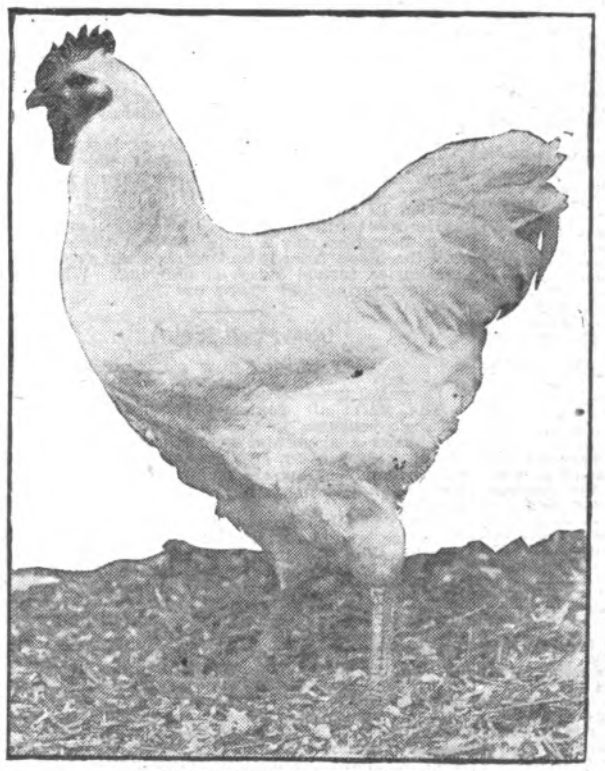
Lazy hens, although they do not produce eggs, fatten easily and bring a good price as roasters. Close weeding out of unprofitable birds is really more than half the secret of success, and should be rigidly practised.

Roosters are not allowed with the hens whose eggs are sold in the market, as infertile eggs are nicer for the table, and will keep fresh longer than fertile eggs. All the male birds are kept in one house and yard, so that they will become friendly and will not fight when distributed.

Hens intended to produce eggs for hatching are allowed free range until November; then they are divided into flocks of twenty-five, and four males are assigned to each flock, two being kept in a coop, two put with the flock, the pairs changing places every week. This prevents favoritism, which is the usual cause of infertile eggs. I make up my flocks in November, because I start the incubators in December, and like to have the birds running together for three weeks before using the eggs for incubation.

Exercise is of primary importance in the life of the laying hen, and every means should be taken to promote activity. The most natural way to do this is to provide a heavier covering of litter on the floor and to scatter small grain broadcast over this once a day, for the birds will scratch in it for hours at a time.

Straw or hay will answer the purpose, but both cost money and take time to cut; so, in October and November, before snow falls, we go into the plantation at the back of the barn and rake up the fallen leaves, placing them in bags and storing them in a shed near the poultry-house. Twice a week, all through a bad winter, a bag is emptied into each compartment. The birds delight to scratch and work among them, which keeps them busy, and also breaks up and converts the leaves into valuable fertilizer for spring use in the garden.



Buy Some Good Birds Now to Improve Your Stock

I want our readers to make a special effort and try to buy cockerels now to head their breeding pens next season, for this is the season of the year when the big breeders of thoroughbred stock commence to select their birds for the show season, and put them into separate coops to develop, take the young pullets off free range, and place them in permanent winter quarters and cull out the year-old birds, and divide them into flocks for next year's breeding pens. All this means that house room becomes so precious that they are willing—nay, anxious, to dispose of extra cockerels, and will sell good birds now for about half what they would ask for them in the spring. Such a golden opportunity should not be neglected, and I advise you to sell off all your old hens or your own young cockerels and use the money for the purchase of one or two really good birds, for if you have only mediumly fair stock, and mate a few of the hens to a good bird next spring, you are sure to get some youngsters who will more than pay you for your trouble. Look through the advertising columns for the addresses of well-known breeders of whatever variety you are breeding, and write them for prices of cockerels; or, better still, quote what price you can afford to pay; remembering always that you can't expect to get something for nothing, and that even a cull bird from a breeder who has for years kept nothing but full-blooded stock, is of more value to breed from than a splendid looking bird which may have all sorts of mixed and poor varieties among his ancestors. For, as I have before explained to you, the individual bird or animal is not half so important as his parents and grandparents, as far as his influence is concerned on future stock.

When writing to breeders about cockerels, you should give a clear description of the hens you want to mate him to, because the breeder will then be able to select a bird with such characteristics as will counterbalance the weak points in your birds.

To illustrate: If the hens happen to have legs rather too long for the breed they belong to, the male bird chosen to mate with them should have legs a trifle too short, and, of course, the same throughout the points. There are very few perfect birds, so matings must be arranged to counterbalance the faulty points. And it is impossible to get perfection from one mating, so it is positively necessary to breed the pullets back to the sire, even to the third and fourth generation.

Now, many people run away with the idea that it is only conformation and plumage that one does such mating for, but it is quite as necessary when one is trying to build up a strain of heavy laying birds. Roosters must be the offspring of prolific layers, no less than the hens to which they are to be mated, and it is only by re-mating to the progeny of the original sire that the breed can be firmly established. Of course, the same is to be said if your ambition is to raise specially good table birds with deep breasts and heavily meated thighs. So you see, even for the general purpose bird, it is well to devote some thought to the subject, and be careful not only to select hens that are known to be good layers, but males who are known to be the sons of heavy layers; and once having established a good pen, it is well to be very careful how you introduce a strange male bird.

I am emphasizing this subject now, because so many of my correspondents seem to be convinced that all that is necessary to get good layers is to select their best hens. I use "hens" in writing, but of course the same principles apply to ducks and geese, and, to a smaller extent, turkeys. It is quite time to consider breeding flocks of ducks and geese now, for if strange birds have to be bought, it takes time for them to become accustomed to their new surroundings, and as they are early layers, there should be no delay about the purchase.

Both ducks and geese are such easy keepers when they have a wide range that it is advisable for every small farm to keep a flock of either one or the other. Imperial Pekin ducks start laying in January, when hens' eggs are bringing very big prices, so the ducks' eggs are a great convenience and economy, as they can be used at home, and usually sell to neighbors for cooking purpose, even if they don't like to eat them. Ducks' eggs make better cakes and custard than hens' eggs, and people who are living near towns or cities can always dispose of any surplus quantity to confectioners and candy makers.

I give you this hint, as it is not advisable to hatch ducks before April in most localities, and by that time hens' eggs have gone down in price to such an extent that one does not mind using them in the kitchen. If you have raised any number of ducks or geese during the last season, now is the time to fatten and market them. Confine them in rather small yards; boil and mash any waste, green vegetables, small potatoes, or any other root crop that you may have on hand. When cool, mix about a quart of wheat middlings or corn-meal through a panful, and you will have a good fattening mash for twenty birds, and give them all the skimmed-milk you can spare in a dish they can only get their bills into, and they will be ready for market within three weeks.

Old ducks and geese which are to be kept for breeding in the spring, must have a dry place to sleep in, and good food. Chopped corn-stalks or fodder, well steamed, and a little bran, make a good, inexpensive mash. If skim-milk is plentiful, give them some every day, to take the place of insects which they can no longer find for themselves. If there is no milk to spare, get some commercial meat scraps, and mix about a tablespoonful for each bird in the mash three times a week. Also, be careful that they have plenty of grit and water. Ducks and geese often suffer for water on a general farm after outdoor pools and troughs are frozen.

The care the birds receive now, will influence their laying, and the strength of the ducklings and goslings next spring. Don't lose any time in getting your young pullets into winter quarters. The sooner they are settled, and winter rations started, the sooner they will commence to lay. Don't forget that, to produce eggs, they must have plenty of water to drink, and, as they have no teeth, need grit to grind the food after it passes into the gizzard—animal food, vegetables, and lime in some form. Brooks and outside drinking troughs are sure to be frozen; small stone and sand ditto. So when the farmer throws down the corn, which is greedily eaten, the hen profits little, for she cannot digest it properly, and in consequence is unprofitable. Insects (the natural animal food supply) are not to be had, nor is there any vegetable matter available. So the fowls return to natural conditions, which means no eggs until springtime, when they are again able to find the different ingredients from which eggs are formed.

Turkeys

I want to give you a few hints about the care of the old turkeys at this season of the year, in the hope that it may help in raising young ones in the spring, for during the past few years the number of letters telling about the loss of young turkeys in all parts of the country has been positively appalling, and it all springs from an intestinal disease commonly called "blackhead," which is spread through the droppings of affected birds. For this reason I want you to do a little doctoring right now to get the old birds in good condition if possible.

First of all, plow the yards or grounds where the turkeys have been in the habit of congregating and thoroughly disinfect the roosts or fences which they frequent; then once every week put forty grains of Epsom salts in half a pint of water, and place it where the birds are likely to drink from it in the early morning. And before you give them their regular feed in the morning mix one grain of sulphate of iron and one grain of silicate of soda and make it into a pill with a little curd cheese or bread which has been moistened with milk. The above amount is for one pill, and each bird should get one of them. At night again try to force them to drink the water with Epsom salts in it. Or if you only have two or three birds which are pretty tame and easily handled, give them a teaspoonful of Castor oil night and morning instead of the salts. Sweep up and burn all the droppings from under the roosts as early as possible in the morning. Repeat this treatment once a week for four weeks. After that time add seven grains of catechu to every two quarts of drinking water every day for another month. After the first of the year give the turkeys some of the laying hens' mash every morning, and all through the winter give them a good feed of corn at night.

F. P.—Australian salt bush is especially valuable for alkali soils which will not grow other grain crops. It seems to absorb a great deal of the salt substance, and if it has been grown on the same soil for two seasons, it is safe to plant corn or other grain. The plants are of a spreading habit, and yield about twenty tons of green forage, which will make about five tons of hay. A pound of seed costing one dollar twenty-five will seed an acre. On alkali soil the seed should be sowed on top of the ground, and well turned in, but not covered. The best time to plant is early in October. It needs light rain when first sowed, but later can endure any amount of drought. It can also be seeded in boxes, and transplanted in rows from four to six feet apart, plant two feet apart. You had better send for the Californian Experiment Station bulletins on salt bush, as they have been making a study of it for the last eighteen years. Address California Experiment Station, Berkeley, California.

E. S.—You certainly have had poor returns for your efforts, but as the results have been the same for two years I fear that the breeding stock has a good deal to do with it. Read this month's article at the beginning of the department, and answer to M. H. Clean the premises thoroughly, burn all rubbish and droppings. Don't feed the chickens until they are thirty-six hours old; then give them sour milk for the following twenty-four hours.

M. H.—Though you don't say the chicks had any discharge, I feel sure that they had white diarrhea, as the symptoms you do describe all belong to that disease, and sometimes the discharge is not very profuse or noticeable at first, as it has been found by investigation that the white diarrhea of young chicks is caused by at least four different kinds of infection, and each of these needs to be studied separately. All of these microbes also infect adult fowls and are generally communicated directly or indirectly from these to the chicks. The most common cause of the disease is a bacillus called Bacterium pullorum. This often infects hens and also the eggs which they lay. Such eggs produce chicks which have the germs of the disease within them when they are hatched, and these chicks show symptoms within the first few days of their lives. The contagion may also be communicated from chick to chick by means of the microbes scattered with the droppings, which contaminate the food and drink, and cause the appearance of the symptoms when the birds are from one to two weeks old. The chicks are most susceptible to infection during the first twenty-four hours of their lives, are more resistant during the second and third days, and are practically insusceptible after the fourth day. Those that sicken later must have taken the microbes into their bodies before they reached that age. Incubators and brooders, as well as coops, become infected and preserve the contagion indefinitely. Adult fowls are resistant to this microbe and do not show any symptoms even when they are laying infected eggs, as explained in this month's article. The cholera bacillus may also be carried by laying hens and infect the egg before it is laid. The young chicks hatched from such eggs soon show symptoms of disease and communicate the contagion to others at all ages. The coccidia which cause a chronic disease in adult fowls may also infect the eggs and cause disease with similar symptoms in the chicks. The aspergillus fungus is the fourth cause of white diarrhea. It occasionally is included in the egg when it is laid, but it may also penetrate the shell when eggs are packed in moldy chaff, straw, or grain, or allowed to get damp. All of these microbes may be carried on the outside of the shell, and may infect nest boxes, incubators, brooders and yards where diseased chickens have been. The symptoms of white diarrhea are seen in young chicks which are from a day or two to three or four weeks old. In the most acute form they may die suddenly after having shown but slight symptoms for a short time. Generally, however, there is first observed a disposition to huddle together and to remain under the hover or under the hen more than young chicks should. Very soon they appear listless, indifferent to what is going on around them, stupid, and sleepy. They stand in one position or sit still with the eyes closed, and the few efforts which they make to pick up food appear mechanical and unsuccessful. Their plumage loses its luster, the wings droop or project slightly from the body, and the characteristic diarrhea soon appears. The droppings which are voided may be white and creamy, mucilaginous and glairy, or they may be mixed with a brownish material. Often the sticky excrement adheres to the downy feathers about the vent, dries, and continues to accumulate until it completely covers and plugs this opening. This condition, known as "pasting up behind," will, unless soon relieved, bring about the early death of the chick. Many of the diseased chicks chirp or peep almost constantly, and when attempting to void the excrement they may give utterance to a shrill cry, as if the effort brought on paroxysms of pain. As death approaches the breathing becomes more labored, and the abdomen heaves with each breath. Often the disease is of a more chronic type and has a longer course. The young birds with diarrhea gradually waste away, become weaker and more emaciated until their legs are scarcely able to support their bodies. They try to brace themselves by standing with the legs apart, or they rest against a wall or other object for support. Many of them have the peculiar form of body called "short backed," which results from the distention of the abdomen and its projection backward, which makes the back appear too short for the body. Toward the last the strength is completely exhausted, and the chick sits constantly or lies on the side with outstretched wings until it dies. The most prominent and characteristic symptoms in nearly all cases are the white diarrheal discharges and the rapid wasting away of the affected birds. The losses vary from 50 to 80 per cent of the chicks hatched. Sometimes it is impossible to raise any of them. The medical treatment of affected chicks is impracticable, as it is too expensive and has very little effect on the course of the disease. The birds may be given sour milk or buttermilk to drink, or, lacking this, fifteen grains of powdered catechu may be added to the gallon of drinking water. The preventive measures should begin with the eggs used for hatching. If these are purchased they should only be accepted from flocks known to be healthy, and the eggs of which give rise to healthy chicks. If this assurance cannot be obtained, it is better to produce the eggs needed for hatching on the home farm and from hens that are known to be free from infection. Having obtained the eggs, they should be kept until ready for incubation in a dry, moderately cool place, so spread out that the air can circulate over them and carry away the moisture which they exhale. They should not be placed in hay, straw, chaff or other substance liable, to become musty or mouldy. Before putting them into the incubator or under the hen they should be wiped with a cloth wet in grain alcohol 70 or 80 per cent strength to remove any germs that might be on the surface of the shell. The hens used for hatching should be free from all infection, and the incubator should be thoroughly cleaned. If there have been any sick chicks in it, it should be disinfected by washing with compound solution of cresol (five per cent solution). The same precautions should be adopted in regard to the brooder. If the hatching is done by a hen, the brood should be put upon fresh ground and any chicks which sicken should be immediately removed and isolated or killed. By removing frequently to fresh ground or by frequent disinfection the disease may sometimes be limited to a few individuals. (2) The chicken had what is known as air puff—usually caused by an injury. Possibly the hen had trampled on it. You did quite right to open the skin and let the air out, as it is the only way to help such cases.

VETERINARY INFORMATION

Subscribers are invited to write to this department asking for any information desired relative to the treatment of animal troubles. Questions will be answered in these columns free by an eminent veterinarian. Describe the trouble fully, sign full name and give your address; direct all correspondence to the Veterinary Department, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

No atttention will be given any inquiry which lacks the sender's full name and address, but we will print only initials if so requested.

TUMOR.—Can you tell me what is the matter with my dog? The first of March a knot or lump commenced to grow on top of his fore leg, between his shoulder blade and ribs. It is as large as a man's head and he is getting lame in his leg and can hardly get up when he lies down. He has a good appetite. MRS. I. B. P.

A.—A tumor evidently has formed and very likely it is cancerous and if so it is incurable. Possibly a skilled veterinarian might conclude to dissect it out, but it will return accompanied by other tumors if it is cancerous. Clip off the hair and paint with tincture of iodine once daily.

CONGESTED UDDER.—I have a three-year-old Jersey cow. Just before she freshened her udder swelled unusually tight and got very red. After the calf came it gave us a good deal of trouble to get the swelling out. The flow of milk was good from all the teats and did not get lumpy. This was her second calf. We did not have trouble with first calf. What I want to know is what will prevent her being that way again and was this the best treatment? D. E. B.

A.—Dry the cow off for six weeks or more before calving and during that time withhold all rich feed, but allow bran or roots to keep the bowels active. Make her take active exercise every day. At calving time give her a physic of epsom salts (one pound) if her udder is congested and follow with half an ounce each of powdered saltpeter and poke root twice daily for three or four days.

ENTERITIS.—Please tell me what was the matter with my mare. She was twenty-one years of age, in good condition and running on pasture, and had not been worked for a long time. She had had five colts. About four years ago she had twin colts. She was sick two days. At first it seemed like a light case of colic and she would roll about half an hour. The last day it become worse. She had a chill, followed by fits, until she died. MRS. S. C.

A.—At first the mare probably suffered from stoppage (impaction) of the bowels and that not being relieved enteritis (inflammation of the bowels) ensued and caused death. She should have had full doses of raw linseed oil at the outset of the attack as well as medicine to stimulate muscular acton of the bowels.

HARDENED UDDER.—I have a heifer, seventeen months old. The left side of udder is hard and caked. I do not know what caused it. MRS. M. L. L.

A.—As the enlargement is not inflamed or sore we much fear that it is tuberculosis of the mammary gland and you should have the heifer tested with tuberculin to make sure. Meanwhile rub in a little iodine ointment every other day.

LICKING DISEASE.—I have a Jersey cow, twenty-one months old which I am milking now. She appears to have some sort of a skin disease. She can't stand more than five minutes without licking herself somewhere and generally in a different place. She has a few pimples on her ears. What ought I to feed her? MRS. H. J. T.

A.—Free the heifer from ticks and lice by spraying or scrubbing with a solution of coal tar dip made according to directions given by the manufacturer. Such licking when not caused by parasites, may be a symptom of depraved appetite due to indigestion. Allow free access to rock salf and feed whole or crushed oats and wheat bran in addition to grass.

SCOURS.—What was the matter with my colt? It was born September 30th and died December 24th. I fed the mother all the corn and corn fodder she would eat and changed from corn to oats and fed her all the oats she would eat which was about three pecks per feed, feeding once a day. In one week after I fed oats the colt was taken sick and was sick one week. Its bowels became loose and I gave the colt four ounces of starch that checked the looseness. The colt would not nurse but would drink plenty of water. The milk was very rich. J. A. McC.

A.—You should have fed the mare oats night and morning with a feed of ear corn at noon from the first. The sudden change of feed and overfeeding caused indigestion and scours which killed the foal. You should have given the foal a dose of Castor oil in milk instead of starch which locked the bowels and caused inflammation.

COUGH.—I have a milch cow that has a cough, also a discharge of a whitish color, from the nose. She seems to be in good health. The cough is worse in the winter. She has been coughing most of her life. A. J. S.

A.—The cow in all probability has tuberculosis and on that account her milk is dangerous and she may spread the disease to other cattle. Have her tested with tuberculin to make sure. Meanwhile do not use milk. Any veterinarian can apply the test.

ACUTE INDIGESTION.—Please give me the following information through the columns of your valued paper. What are the symptoms of acute indigestion, in a horse? (2) The probable length of time a horse that was afflicted with above disease would be apt to live with the ordinary treatment on the farm. (3) Would a horse that dies with indigestion or impaction of the bowels bloat in twelve hours after death? (4) Is there any cure for the above disease? (5) How would a horse act if enough strychnine was injected in the blood with a hypodermic syringe to cause its death? A. W. C.

A.—Colicky pains, bloating and gushing back and forth of fluid and gas from the stomach to the throat. (2) Death from suffocation or rupture of the stomach may occur in six to twenty-four hours. (3) It would bloat immediately. (4) By pressing the stomach tube and giving other modern treatment life often may be saved in such cases. (5) The horse would quickly die after having a few spasms or death might be instantaneous.

CORRESPONDENCE COURSE.—I am a reader of COMFORT and would like to know if it would be a profitable investment to take a veterinary correspondence course? J. K. Van B.

A.—A correspondence course does not give the student any professional standing as a veterinarian, nor can the science be properly learned in that way. To become a trained veterinarian the student should take the full course at a recognized veterinary college.

LAMENESS.—I have a five-year-old mare whose feet do not seem to grow. One hoof is hard and so is the frog of her foot. I keep her shod about three months and then take the shoes off for two or three weeks when I have her reshod. When I take the shoes off she gets lame and foot sore. S. J. B.

A.—A horse should be reshod once a month. It would be best to let the mare run barefoot on low pasture for two or three months. If you cannot do that soak the feet in soft water for an hour or more twice daily and at night apply any simple greasy hoof dressing. Blistering the hoof-head once a month would help.

BLOODY MILK.—I have a young cow that freshened in July. It was her second calf. She gives a good mess of milk but her teats seem as though they were filled with wind. The right side of them seems soft and puffy. What ails her and what can I do? (2) Another young cow that had her second calf this spring seems to have lost the use of her tail at the base, although she can switch it a little at the end. (3) Last spring I had a two-year-old heifer that freshened. She milked good, that is gave a good mess. The teats on the right side clog up and I milk large clots of blood from them. I do not use the milk. Is it fit to use? V. W. H.

A.—The tissues are congested with serum from the blood and this should disappear gradually if you give the parts a gentle massage three times a day, using a little Castor oil or vaseline upon the hands. (2) An injury has caused a fracture or paralysis and the case should be left to nature as there is no practical treatment. (3) Growths in the teats bleed from irritation at milking time. An expert might be able to remove them by operation, but drying off of the milk secretion often proves the better treatment, the cow not to be bred again.

COUGH.—I have a pig which always coughs. He is four months old. I feed it corn, oats, wheat middlings, milk and water. Is it the proper food? J. N.

A.—Stop feeding oats. Add ground barley or rye and a little flaxseed meal to the slop and fine shelled corn from a self feeder. Lung worms probably cause the cough and there is no specific remedy. Turpentine may help as intestinal worms also may be present. Mix one teaspoonful of it in milk or slop for each eighty pounds of body weight of pig and repeat on three successive mornings for two weeks.

WARTS.—I have a cow that has warts on the teats. They grow hard and turn dry. It is painful for the cow when milked. C. A. M.

A.—Rub best Castor oil, or fresh goose grease upon the wart coverd parts each night and morning after milking and they should soon disappear. Any wart that has a long, slim neck may be snipped off with scissors. Remove but a few at a time in this way. Apply a lunar caustic pencil lightly to the base of any wart that starts to grow again.

Clarence Mayne was on board, as you said, and they said he was killed. I have been telegraphing for an hour to find out, and I thought you must be with him, till a porter told me you came home in the express. I tell you, I rushed up here to see if you had really come!"

"Killed!" Nerine started back from him. "He can't be killed! He's in there!" pointing to the door. "He opened the door just now and looked at me; he had blood on his face and a cut on his forehead."

"What!" Maurice shook the door savagely, but it was fast.

"You're dreaming; you couldn't have seen him!" He was paler than the girl. "I saw a reporter who had been down to the smash-up on a trolley, and he had seen Mayne lying dead on the bank. They're bringing him up on a wrecking carriage now."

"I saw him!" she repeated, doggedly. "He may be dead, but I saw him! Oh, Maurice!" She began to cry more desperately than ever.

"Come away," the boy said. Young and incredulous as he was, he felt a horror creeping over him. "Come to the fire."

Seated close to him, in the warm morning-room, Nerine told her story of what had happened in the afternoon and how she had been in the train when Fairfax sent the telegram.

"I told him to sign it with my name, for I knew you wouldn't know his," she said. "I felt I must get here before Mr. Mayne, for fear you did not. I knew from his face he meant mischief. And when I saw him I never thought of one thing but that I must keep him out!"

Maurice sat silent.

"Don't tell a soul but me!" he said at last.

The girl nodded.

"I don't mean to. But you know I am telling you the truth. I did see him. And there was a little cut right over his eyebrow."

"Don't you want to go to bed?" Maurice asked, after a long silence.

"No. I don't want to be alone. Maurice"—hesitating—"will they bring him up?"

The boy nodded.

"About daylight, the station master said. Jones is at the station waiting."

He lighted his pipe and sat smoking silently.

Nerine got up and moved restlessly about the room.

Maurice looked at his watch at last. It was three o'clock, and as he looked there was a knocking at the door. Clarence Mayne had come to Lispenard House for the last time, but he was carried in on a stretcher, feet foremost.

He was quite dead, but the only mark to be seen upon him was a little cut over the eyebrow, and the blood from it had marked his cheek.

Maurice turned away, shuddering. What was it that Nerine had "kept out?"

CHAPTER XXVIII.

"CAN'T YOU SEE HOW I LOVE YOU?"

It was June—early June in London.

The warm air floated in at the windows of Nerine's bedroom in the Beltons' London house. All three Lispenards were there for Agatha's wedding; for after Mayne's violent end and his tragic home-coming, Lispenard House seemed to Nerine and Maurice to be a sorry place for a wedding.

There had been great discussion between Lady Satterlee and Lady Belton as to whose house Agatha should be married from; but the advice of Lady Belton, being a relation, had prevailed. No one but the Satterlees and the Beltons were told of the true history of Clarence Mayne's marriage; he was dead and gone, and there was no need to rake up so evil a story.

Maurice's lawyers, on being put in possession of all the papers, had made no ado about the case whatever; there was no reasonable doubt that he was of age, and he came into his property accordingly. And the first thing he did on becoming legal master of Lispenard House was to wall up that red door. The rooms behind it had been a modern addition, built under Clarence Mayne's rule, for Mrs. Mayne, and they were torn down and their place made into a flower garden. Not one trace, if Maurice could help it, should remain of Mayne's presence in Lispenard House.

Neither the brother nor sister had ever spoken of Nerine's vision that lonely night, but both breathed more freely when Mayne's rooms were gone; they could go back then without any haunting memories when Agatha was married and gone. For Satterlee's regiment had left the barrack, and was stationed at York, where he and Agatha would live for the present.

Tomorrow would be Agatha's wedding day.

Nerine stood before the long wardrobe glass, gazing at her own image. It was half-past five, and she had been dressing since four, with apparently very little result. She had on the black crepon she had made herself and worn only at Combe Farm; she settled its plain muslin cuffs and collar as she looked in the glass. Nobody could think that she resembled Agatha today. She had put on that plain gown for a reason; there must be no more confusing of her with Agatha; and Agatha had gone down-stairs long ago, shining resplendent in a wonderful frock which was neither green nor blue.

Well, there was no sense in putting it off; they were all down-stairs, and she must go down, too. Oh, if only she had not to meet Lord Satterlee!

She opened the drawing-room door and stood a moment. She had a reprieve; there was no one there but Agatha and Lady Satterlee, besides Lady Belton. She crossed the room to Lady Satterlee and would have shaken hands, but the elder woman kissed her quickly on both cheeks.

"So you have been doing great things since I saw you," she drawled, affectionately. "Sit down and let me look at you."

She eyed the girl closely as she took a little chair beside her. How handsome she was! Though she was a little thin, it did not hurt her lovely, clear-cut face.

"You are a very 'black Lispenard' today, my dear, are you not?" she said sweetly, looking at the prim little gown which sat so well on the round, exquisite curves of the girl's figure, and reading the girl's face like a book with her veiled brown eyes.

"You ought to wear the historic silk frock," she said lightly, looking at the contrast Agatha made standing flushed and handsome by the teatable. She had grown very fond of Agatha, but she had not crept into her heart like Nerine. And in a minute or two Nerine and Bobby must meet.

"Hark! do I not hear some one coming up-stairs?" she cried. "It must be that slow Bobby and his best man at last."

As the drawing-room door opened, Agatha blushed, but her future mother-in-law did not see that good sign. She saw only a hard, white face, and two young hands clasped sharply round a black-clad knee. The girl never looked up, and did not see who had entered the room behind Satterlee, and stood a silent onlooker beside Lady Belton.

Satterlee had shaken hands with Agatha; now he was holding out a strong palm to Nerine.

The girl had risen, had lifted her gray eyes to his face, and stood for one instant regarding him, as she put her hand in his.

Then she sank down on her little chair again, a quick carnation coming and going in her face. It was all she could do to keep from wild shrieks of laughter. What a fool she had been! What a mountain she had made out of a molehill!

For it was with a feeling of pure indifference that she saw Satterlee once more; saw him without that glamour which had always surrounded his image in her mind; and he was merely a nice, clean, boyish-looking man, like half a hundred others, and eminently suited for the post of brother-in-law. She cared for him not one whit! Her heart leaped with a joy that nearly choked her.

She had got over it! She could, as the old women say, dance at his wedding. Oh, the rapture of it! But how could that boyish face, that little gold mustache, ever have seemed to her the ideal of good looks in a man?

For the first time since her midnight vision of Mayne, her nerve had come back to her; for the first time for months she was the old Nerine Lispenard to whom life was a merry jest. A fog seemed to have been lifted from the room, and she could look around and see the people in it clearly. Lady Satterlee, lovely in a linen gown smothered with satin ribbons and lace insertions, looking younger than ever; Agatha and Satterlee, lost in conversation over the tea-table; Lady Belton, soft and purring in a smart new frock, talking to—Mr. Fairfax!

She had thought it was Maurice who came in with Satterlee.

"What! you here? I did not see you," he said, as he caught her eye and came over to shake hands with her.

"Didn't you know I was coming up to town to be best man?"

She was as lovely—no, a thousand times more lovely than he had thought her. Lady Satterlee caught the glance he gave her, and laughed in her sleeve.

"How should she know? We did not know ourselves till yesterday, Hughie." She turned to Nerine. "Vincent has bribed Agatha with a diamond bracelet to let him off the wedding. He wanted to go to Norway; and so we dragged Hughie into the service. I have a sort of idea"—laughing—"that he also was bribed—to come with a good grace," maliciously.

"Bribed to come! Why, he jumped at the offer! Satterlee exclaimed, innocently, as he

"Virtue itself offends when coupled with forbidding manners."—Bishop Middleton.

In order to meet the demand for information made by COMFORT subscribers on the kindred subjects of Etiquette and Personal Appearance, this column will be devoted to them, and all questions will be answered, but no inquirer shall ask more than two questions each month. We would suggest to readers to cut this column out and paste it in a scrap book. Address letters to Etiquette Editor, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

Heartaches, Lacassa, Tenn.—Why write from Tennessee to Maine for the answer to so simple a question as "what length a married woman should wear her dresses?" A married woman's dresses should be no longer or shorter than those of any unfortunate single lady of the same age. But they are wearing nowadays, both married and unmarried, shorter and therefore more sensible skirts. (2) A great deal of tact is necessary in the management of a jealous husband. We cannot tell you how to prevent him "talking to girls." The best course is to act rightly as you have been doing, and try to avoid argument and recrimination. Heartaches are bad, but quarrels will not make the pain any easier.

Inez, Shamrock, Texas.—There is no set form of answer that a girl should make when her friends congratulate her on her marriage. Any pleasant, simple phrase is sufficient: "Thank you; I am very happy," would be one way of doing it.

Happy Woods, La.—If you love a boy and your parents do not even like him, we would say that you should take their advice in the matter. We are very sure their judgment is better than yours. (2) It would be perfectly correct for a boy—this nice one, for instance—to ask if he might call again, and neither would there be any serious breach of etiquette if you told him you would be glad to see him again when he came.

J. K. Van B., Speedwell, Tenn.—As a rule a self-respecting woman, such as most men want for a wife, is not to be had through the medium of a matrimonial agency or by advertising. These methods are generally discountenanced and discredited by the public and such advertisements are not accepted by most, if not all, reputable publications. People who resort to this method of finding a life partner are jeered at by the community in which they live.

Unhappy Girl, Holland, Mo.—All marriages are not happy ones as you must know. Your mistake was in marrying at fifteen, and against your father's will. You do not say but what your husband is kind and good to you. If you have already lived with him for seven years, we can only say try and continue as you have been doing. Interest yourself in affairs outside of your home that will make your days full and your life more interesting. You will have time to do this as you say you have no children. Do not "repent at leisure" but leave yourself no leisure for repenting.

Engaged, Egeland, N. Dak.—The purchase of the wedding ring is always made by the groom.

Belle D., Golden Eagle, Ill.—You ask too many questions in your letter. The dresses of a thirteen-year-old girl should be exactly the length her mother tells her to have them. (2) We do not think it necessary, or that your school teacher would expect, that you should answer a card he sent you when he was away. If the card asked a question, or was sent regarding some school or business matter, you should, of course, reply. We are not answering your third question. Read the paragraph at the head of this column.

Three Girls, Mt. Hope, W. Va.—Etiquette would demand that three young girls going to a party at night with three young men should be accompanied by an older woman as chaperon, though in some localities the custom is often neglected. (2) One should use care in dressing so that no part of one's apparel becomes embarrassingly undone in company. Should such an unfortunate event happen, withdraw as quietly and quickly as possible, and repair damage.

I. C., Snelling, Cal.—As manners are used to make the relations between persons assume ease and pleasantness, we are very sure that it would be "bad manners for a lady to quarrel with a gentleman about politics."

M. E. R., Speck, Ky.—It is hard to get away from set phrases, but they are best avoided. If you are thanked for anything you have done, you might say: "It was nothing; I am glad to have helped." Remember the most simple manner is the best manners.

Brown Eyes, Rural Hall, N. C.—Some silver article of personal use, or some simple and inexpensive bit of jewelry would make a suitable birthday gift for the girl you are engaged to marry. Tell your jeweler how much you wish to expend, and take his advice. Do not be extravagant. You will need your money after you are married.

Uncertain, Crescent, S. C.—Because you motored twenty miles with your cousin and aunt to see your brother's college friend get his diploma, is certainly no reason for anyone to "whisper" that you were running after the boy. Do not be too sensitive to gossip or you will always be having, a cause for unhappiness.

Question Box, Lawndale, N. C.—We do not think it is necessary or best for a young girl who has been away for a few weeks to send post-cards to the young men she met while away. Should they write to you, you could use your own judgment about answering. (2) Whether you treat a young man in a "friendly way" or not depends upon whether you regard him as a friend.

Blonde Girl, Salem, Ark.—We are not in favor of the marriage of cousins.

Brown Eyes, Rougemont, S. C.—Blushing is a matter of skin and of temperament. We know of no way you can prevent your cheeks from turning red when this young man looks at you, unless it is by thinking of something else at the time than the fact that he is near you. It is not a serious matter, and no one will like you the less for your trick of blushing. (2) A young man should not ask a girl what she would prefer as a birthday gift, and nothing more expensive or elaborate than books, candy, or flowers are permitted to be given except in the case of a girl that the man is to marry. We judge from your letter that you are not engaged to the man who wishes to make you a gift.

O. G. B., Clay, W. Va.—It is the lady's part to take the gentleman's arm when offered if she so wishes. A sufficient phrase would be: "Will you take my arm?" (2) The gentleman should walk on the side of the two ladies which is nearest to the street. It is best not to walk between them.

June, Knoxville, Tenn.—If a gentleman introduces himself by saying: "I am Mr. Blank," it would be entirely proper for the lady to reply, "This is Miss Dash."

Debaters, Washburn, Wis.—If a gentleman asks you if he may call again, it would be perfectly good etiquette for you to suggest a convenient time. You could hardly set a day for him to come without knowing that he wished and intended to call again.

Brown Eyes, Warren, Pa.—If a young man with whom you had been corresponding commenced to write you "silly letters" which you refused to answer, we think you are to be congratulated on obtaining this second fellow whose letters are respectful and sensible. There are plenty of "silly" young men, and you did well to drop this one.

Honeysuckle Bill, Farmington, Wash.—As we have stated many times in this column, it is time enough to let a young man kiss you when you are engaged to be married. Too many young men simply like to go around with girls that they can kiss whenever they like but they generally pick out the other sort when they become really serious in their intentions. Test this young man by refusing to let him kiss and put his arms around you, and see what happens.

Once to Every Man

nurse left me in a rage last night. I have a devilish temper," he confessed humorously.

"If my advice is not offensive, I think you would better take immediate steps to replace him. Mrs. Strickland ought not to go through another ordeal like that."

"What," demanded Strickland, "brings you here at this season?"

"I have been overworking, if it interests you."

"Ah! I suspected as much. I have thought for a long time, doctor, that it would be wise to have a resident physician; indeed, my city doctor strongly urges it. Why shouldn't you move over here? We are going to remain up here the winter. The environment of pleasure in which I have no part irks me. Your duties would be negligible and we can make you very comfortable. Further, you could make sure that my wife is protected from scenes like that of last night."

There was a thinly-veiled sneer in Strickland's voice.

"And besides, Coit, I have the money to buy you."

Coit rose and some of the fighting light of his gridiron days gleamed in his eyes.

"You are laboring under a false impression, Strickland," he returned evenly; "and if you measured up to any standard of manhood that ever was charted, I'd knock you flat for saying that."

Strickland's face contorted with amusement. "Good!" he applauded. "Blamed if I don't like you, Coit! Could you move over today?"

"Not for you or your money."

"Oh, I quite understand that. It is for Diana. Men always fall for Diana. I did myself. Curious how those cool, virginal women appeal to a man. Well—I—got—her!" His soft fist came down on the padded arm of his chair.

"And no other man ever did. Or can. I'll attend to Diana, Coit. Thinking about her won't get you anywhere. Remember that."

Coit's face was sternly resolute as he stepped quietly over to Strickland's chair and, without a word, he placed a disciplinary hand across his heavy, purple lips.

TO BE CONCLUDED IN OCTOBER COMFORT.

Evidently Dr. Coit despises Strickland but adores his wife who has every reason to detest her beastly husband, and it is for love of her that he goes to live in Strickland's home as his physician. The startling incidents and fateful result that develop from this trying and dangerous situation, still further complicated by the arrival of Strickland's daughter, a coquettish, attractive and none too scrupulous specimen of worldliness, are told in fascinating style in the concluding part of this story to appear in October COMFORT. Nerine's Second Choice brought his mother more tea. He gazed at the twins as Agatha came over with her bracelet on her wrist, to show Nerine. "By Jove! you two are not so much alike as you were," he said slowly, and Nerine gave a happy, heart-whole laugh.

"You're right!" she said impertinently. "No one could mistake us again."

Lord Satterlee had the grace to look down. But his mother, on wh nothing was wasted, smiled with enjoyment.

"She has got over it, and is making fun of him. The minx!" she thought gleefully. "After all, she would have been too clever a wife for Bobby, though she would have been an adorable daughter for me."

She caught a keen, sweet glance from Hugh Fairfax, and smiled back at him. So that was what had gone on at Combe, as well as the discomfiture of Mr. Mayne! Well, if it could not be Bobby, Hughie would be next best. She would pump the sweetly unconscious Nerine by and by, and hear the whole story.

"Don't you want to hear about Mrs. Simpson?" Fairfax was as'ing Nerine in a low voice. "I assure you she has become a model of abstinence."

"Not really?" she asked, joyfully.

"Yes, really. Of course she is bound to have little relapses, but she is keeping nobly straight now with the aid of that maid you sent her."

"I am looking for a cottage near Lispenard for her," the girl said, thoughtfully. "Do you know, horrid associations as I have had with her, I am quite fond of Mrs. Simpson?"

"I believe you like everything no one else likes. I wonder," he stopped himself sharply, mindful of Lady Satterlee, who had ears like a hare, "I wonder if you only pretend to, as you know you did about the white rat!"

"Oh, that rat!" she shuddered. "But you weren't strictly honest yourself about that."

"I revere its memory now, though," laughing. "Shall I ever forget what a brute I felt, with you and Joan gazing reproachfully at me when I ran over it?"

"I miss Joan; Lady Belton did not bring the children. But I am going down there by and by."

"When?" promptly. "In the autumn? Because I am going to Belton for some shooting myself."

Nerine laughed.

"You are sure to come when I am there, for I shall have to stay for months. I have nowhere else to go. You see, Maurice and Kitty Belton are going to be married in August, and I think they will get on very well without me at Lispenard House for a time. All my family"—cheerfully—"seem to have fallen in love except me."

Mr. Fairfax regarded her attentively. Something reminded him of that ball where things had gone wrong.

"Were you never in love?" he demanded, but she did not even change color.

"Once," she said, lifting her eyes to his, honestly, "but it was with a shadow. And I mean to be very careful not to see such shadows again."

"Perhaps you would not care for the substance after the shadow," he said, half earnestly. "Would you?"

"Wait till I meet it!" provokingly. "Here are Kit and Maurice. And Maurice wants to thank you for those telegrams you sent him."

In half a minute she had drifted away from him, and presently he was carried off by the Satterlees—to see the second Miss Lispenard no more till the wedding. It seemed ages to him, waiting with the bridegroom in the vestry for the bride to come. She really was shockingly late, having sat up with her twin sister nearly all the night before, and sleeping till ten o'clock in consequence.

It was with a sort of rapture that Nerine wished Agatha joy on her wedding day. How could she ever be glad enough that it was not for her a day of dust and ashes, and a hair-cloth skirt worn in secret under a smart gown! Her gladness shone in her face as she came slowly up the aisle with Kitty Belton, behind Agatha's long satin train.

The best man never looked at the bride; he had eyes only for the first bridesmaid as she swept into her place next the bride. She looked so sweet, so happy. Her cheeks were flushed to a softer rose than that of her lovely gown. Kitty Belton looked like a tiny child beside her; even Agatha's good looks paled. Her black hair rippled back softly under her big hat, her steady gray eyes shone as she stood in her place, with a sweet dignity all her own. It seemed like a dream to Fairfax that she could be the same girl who had sat crying on the stile, or fought so gallantly that day in the cottage.

Would the ceremony never be done, and let him give her his arm to leave the church?

Mr. Fairfax fidgeted visibly under the keen eyes of the bridegroom's mamma as Sir William Belton gave away the bride, and the long service went on. And he gave an audible sigh of relief when the signing of names in the vestry was over, and Lord and Lady Satterlee led the way out of the church.

Since he could not be alone with Nerine, at least it was a comfort to be near her. Mr. Fairfax, who had trotted all over the world in search of an interest in life, had found contentment at last in the simple fact that a skirt of rose-colored gauze rippled against his feet while he sat with his back to the horses in a stuffy brougham!

To his surprise, when the bride appeared in her traveling dress, the chief bridesmaid also came down in a street frock.

"Are you going to kindly accompany them?"

RITA or, the OUTCAST SISTER
By LIBBIE SPRAGUE PHILLIPS
SPECIAL SALE PRICE with a six (6) months' subscription to THE ILLUSTRATED COMPANION ONLY 20 CENTS.
This Book contains one of this noted author's best novels.

Pressed close against the window pane was a wan, white face.

The pathos of this story sweeps all before it. It touches the heart of humanity everywhere. Even the man with a heart of stone learns from this story that deep down under the cold, hard strata of stone, he has in his heart a deep well of human sympathy for the erring one; that he has also a heart capable of love and admiration for the good and noble character of Luella, the gentle, loving, self-sacrificing sister. Righteous indignation is aroused toward Silas Lockwood, her relentless and unnatural father. The heart's emotions like a great ocean billow, rolls on from the beginning to end of the book; when you lay it down and say blessed is God who rules over all for the good of all. Thousands will want to read this book and pass it on to their friends. Libbie Sprague Phillips writes exclusively for THE ILLUSTRATED COMPANION; has done so for 10 years. One minister has furnished it with sermons for 13 years; other writers have contributed regularly for years. THE ILLUSTRATED COMPANION is 36 years old. The years of continued service of its writers show that our magazine is one of fixed and standard worth. We know you will enjoy reading it. THIS OFFER of magazine 6 months and book, for 20 cents is made to get new trial subscribers. Address

The Family Doctor

So many inquiries are received from COMFORT subscribers concerning the health of the family that this column will be devoted to answering them. The remedies and advice here given are intended only for simple cases; serious cases should be addressed to physicians, not to us.

Address The Family Doctor, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

NOTICE.—As the privileges of this and all other departments of COMFORT are for subscribers only, no attention will be given any inquiry which does not bear the writer's correct name and address. Initials only, or a fictitious name, if requested, will appear in the published answer, but the inquiry must invariably be signed by the writer's true name.

H. S., McAdams, Texas.—Use deep breathing for five minutes, twice a day. Best time is in the morning before dressing, and on retiring. Stand on the ball of the foot and inhale deeply about twelve times or possibly fourteen times per minute. Inhale slowly and deeply, and exhale the same way. In this way you will get rid of the residual air in the lungs, and slowly but surely revitalize your whole system by introducing more oxygen. (2) To exercise the liver, stand the same way, inhale deeply, holding the breath, and with the hands on the hips twist the body from side to side rotating the same forty-five degrees either way in the process. Repeat this for five minutes at the beginning. Walking is a very good exercise, provided you have some place to go, and some object in view. Croquet, or the medicine ball is more desirable, for then you have an opponent and you have mental recreation as well as physical exercise. (3) It is hard to enumerate vegetables for a weak digestion. Sometimes the stomach will digest uncooked vegetables better than cooked vegetables. This is true of cabbage especially. Celery, potatoes baked and mealy, so that the starch is transformed, spinach well cooked, and carefully cleaned to remove any foreign matter and even cucumbers will sometimes be grateful, if carefully prepared. The personal equation comes in in all cases of stomach trouble, and one must try out various vegetables and hold on to those, which prove in the individual case most digestible.

E. J. S., Fairfield, Nebr.—Eczema is of diatetic origin, as your doctors have told you. It is almost impossible to indicate a diet for an individual case, but in the main it should be one free from nitrogenous foods—such as meats, eggs, etc. Try skim-milk, cottage cheese, rice and green vegetables. Drink plenty of water always. Use a dish mop when you wash dishes, any soap is irritating to the skin, especially those used to cleanse dishes or for washing purposes. A local application of a preparation known as Lassar's paste is beneficial at times, but should be adapted to the individual case by a physician. It must not as a rule be used in full strength. Ask your physician about it and follow his directions.

J. B. L., LaGrange, Ga.—The normal weight for a person six feet tall, ranges from one hundred and forty-five pounds to two hundred pounds. Average about one hundred and seventy pounds or seventy-five pounds. Family history and individual peculiarity must be taken into account in judging the normal weight for a given case. (2) Violent exercise for one operated on for appendicitis with adhesions should almost never be undertaken. Adhesions broken up during operation are very likely to recur in part. If you mean eructation of gas, etc., this can occur and usually does occur in chronic appendicitis as well as intestinal symptoms of most every kind and description.

A Reader, Fairmount, Ga.—Knots or bumps on the forehead usually come from a disordered digestion. Doses of Rochelle salts every morning in hot water with a meatless diet, will cure the trouble in a short time.

A. F., Stewart, Minn.—For chronic catarrh, after all operations have proven only palliative, and there is a direct tendency to lung involvement, a change of climate is imperative and in many cases curative. Your doctors are right in advising an immediate change to a drier climate.

"Thankful," N. Dak.—Your throat trouble is probably due to your excessive nervousness. You should have the one offending tonsil removed, as this will give more flexibility to your voice and possibly aid you in overcoming your natural nervousness. Don't give up trying your voice in public, but try by short efforts to overcome your morbid self-consciousness. May be a change to other surroundings and the meeting of people in other locations will help you. At any rate don't yield to your natural diffidence, but keep trying to forget yourself and you will succeed.

"Ruth," West Baden, Ind.—Fever blisters are frequently due to malaria. Quinine, and a local application of white precipitate ointment under a doctor's directions, should cure you. Of course, a careful diet, free from sweets and pastry is imperative.

F. H., Mexico, N. Y.—Shingles, so-called, is a disease caused by an inflammation of the spinal nerve roots. It is usually due to malaria or may be of rheumatic origin, also some drugs are said to be an exciting cause, such as arsenic, etc. It is as a rule a self-limited disease. Locally you might use boric acid ointment, or zinc oxide ointment, or paint the vesicles with flexible collodion. Internally salicylic acid in three grain doses, taken after meals, should be curative, but it is very bad for the stomach and we hesitate to advise its use.

E. C., Miami, Ind.—You may have malaria. The yawning is frequently due to malaria, and your residence would add to the probability of such a condition. The smothering you mention is due no doubt to your present condition, and is of nervous origin. You should consult your physician, and have a thorough examination.

Frisco.—There is no absolute remedy for sea-sickness. Many remedies have been exploited, and as many discarded. Probably you will be the only sufferer from the disease, as children usually go along without any discomfort. At the beginning of the trip, it is wise to remain in your berth in the recumbent position until well out to sea. This in many cases is effectual. The use of large doses of bromide of potassium or soda also has its advocates. The doses should range from ten to twenty grains three times a day. Should be taken in water. Probably one of the best preparatory treatments is careful dieting before the trip and a good dose of physic.

The Masked Bridal

"Emil, if Anna could speak at this moment, I believe she would tell the truth herself, and save that innocent and lovely child from a fate which to her must seem worse than death," Mr. Goddard solemnly asserted.

"Thank you—you are, to say the least, not very flattering to me in your comparisons," retorted Correlli, as he sprang from his chair and moved toward the door.

He stopped as he laid his hand upon the silver knob and turned a white, vindictive face upon the other.

"Well, then," he said, "since you have determined to take this stand against me, it will not be agreeable for us to meet as heretofore, and I feel compelled to ask you to vacate these premises at your earliest convenience."

"Very well! I shall, of course, immediately comply with your request. A few hours will suffice me to make the move you suggest," frigidly responded Gerald Goddard; but he had grown ghastly white with wounded pride and anger at being thus ignominiously turned out of the house where for so many years he had reigned supreme.

Emil Correlli bowed as he concluded, and left the room without a word in reply.

As the door closed after him Mr. Goddard sank back in his chair with a heavy sigh, as he realized fully, for the first time, how entirely alone in the world he was, and what a desolate future lay before him, shorn, as he was, of home and friends and all the wealth which for so long had paved a shining way for him through the world.

COLUMBIA NOVELTY CO. DEPT. 73 EAST BOSTON, MASS.

His head sank heavily upon his breast, and he sat thus for several minutes absorbed in painful reflections.

He was finally aroused by the shutting of the street door, when, looking up, he saw the new master of the house pass the window, and he knew that henceforth he would be his bitter enemy.

"Homeless, penniless, and alone?" he murmured, crushing back into his breast a sob that arose to his throat.

Then suddenly his glance fell upon the table beside him and rested upon the letter that Mr. Clayton had given to him, and which, in the exciting occurrences of the last hour, he had entirely forgotten.

He took it up and sighed heavily again as the faint odor of Anna's favorite perfume was wafted to his nostrils.

"How changed is everything since she wrote this!—what a complete revolution in one's life a few hours can make!" he mused.

He broke the seal with some curiosity, but with something of awe as well, for it seemed to him almost like a message from the other world, and drew forth two sheets of closely written paper.

The missive was not addressed to any one; the writer had simply begun what she had to say and told her story through to the end, and then signed her name in full in a clear, bold hand.

The man had not read half the first page before his manner betrayed that its contents were of the most vital importance.

On and on he read, his face expressing various emotions until by the time he reached the end there was an eagerness in his manner, a gleam of animation in his eyes which told that the communication had been of a nature to entirely change the current of his thoughts and distract them from everything of an unpleasant character regarding himself.

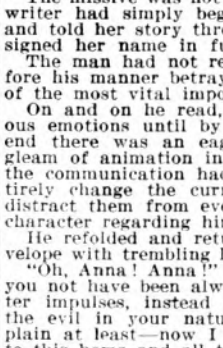
He refolded and returned the letter to its envelope with trembling hands.

"Oh, Anna! Anna!" he murmured, "why could you not have been always governed by your better impulses, instead of yielding so weakly to the evil in your nature? This makes my way plain at least—now I am ready to bid farewell to this home and all that is behind me, and try to fathom what the future holds for me."

He carefully put the letter away into an inner pocket, then sat down to his desk and began to look over his private papers.

When that task was completed he ordered the butler to have some boxes and packing cases, that were stored in the cellar, brought up to the library, when he carefully packed away such books, pictures and other things as he wished to take away with him.

It was not an easy task, and he could almost as readily have committed them to the flames as to have despoiled that beautiful home of what for so long, had made it so dear and attractive to him.



When his work was completed he went out, slipped over into Boylston street, where he knew there were plenty of rooms to be rented, and where he soon engaged a suite that would answer his purpose for the present.

This done, he secured a man and team to move his possessions and before the shades of night had fallen he had stored everything he owned away in his new quarters and bidden farewell forever to the aristocratic dwelling on Commonwealth avenue, where he had lived so luxuriously and entertained so elaborately the creme de la creme of Boston society.

Three days later he had disappeared from the city—"gone abroad," the papers said, "for a change of scene and to recuperate from the effects of the shock caused by his wife's sudden death."

TO BE CONTINUED.

How You Can Get This Story In Book Form

If you do not care to wait for the monthly installments of this serial as they appear in COMFORT we will be glad to make you a present of the complete story in book form. You will enjoy reading this thrilling story of mingled romance and tragedy for it is one of the very best Mrs. Georgie Sheldon has written. The heroine is a refined and beautiful character that will challenge your wonder and admiration and stir the heart's strongest emotions. The story is full of action which moves rapidly through a succession of startling events to the final chapter. The "Masked Bridal" will run as a serial in COMFORT through the fall, winter and spring months, but you need not wait in order to get the complete story. Nerine's Second Choice the best man inquired blankly as he met her in the hall.

Nerine laughed.

"I'm going to stay with Lady Satterlee for a few days," she returned, and Mr. Fairfax forgave dear Dora many things on the spot. This was why she had worried him to dine with her and take part in a play!

He repaired early to Lady Satterlee's tiny house in a fine street, and found Fate and his hostess even kinder than he had anticipated; for there was no one in the drawing-room but Nerine Lispenard, dressed in a white gown, and looking out of the window.

As she greeted him he saw she had been crying, and a sick suspicion that she was grieving for Satterlee took away his breath. He could not speak to her.

"How bored you look," she said, reproachfully. "Lady Satterlee told me she did not think you wanted to come."

"You are not looking any too cheerful yourself," he retorted, speaking roughly from a sore heart. "Are you happy?" gazing jealously at her as she stood in front of a big bank of hothouse flowers, red roses which touched her white dress and whiter arms.

"No," with frank admission. "I was having a little cry all to myself, I think, when you came. It is such a horrid wrench, parting with Agatha; we have been together all our lives. And Maurice can't think of any one but Kitty Belton!" with an impatient laugh. "I am a selfish wretch, I know, but I don't like my family getting married!"

She was so sweet as she stood before him that Fairfax lost his head. Thank God, she was not crying for Bobby.

"I wish you did like it, and would do it yourself," he said with soft audacity. "Tell me, will you, Nerine?" very low and appealingly.

She looked at him in wide-eyed astonishment; then her eyes fell before his, which were surely the sweetest, truest eyes ever set in a man's head.

"You don't mean it!" she said, shamefacedly. "You only pity me because I—feel lonely."

Oh! if only she had not said that about missing Agatha!

He caught her half-reluctant hands, and a tide of new life seemed to come from his close and tender grasp.

"Do I?" almost fiercely. "Then I began to pity you the night of Satterlee's dance! I thought then that you were the sweetest, proudest thing that ever walked the earth. Can't you see," tightening his hold on her hands, "how I love you?"

"I don't know," she stammered. "I never thought of it."

"Think now," leaning a little nearer, "or am I too old and battered for you ever to care for me?"

Miss Lispenard raised her eyes to his in silence, but there was in them such an eloquent disclaimer that a quick tide of joy raced through him.

"Sweetheart!" he said softly; and Lady Satterlee, who had raised the portieres of the back drawing-room, to enter the front one, noiselessly and discreetly retired.

"I call it indecent haste, Tommy!" she remarked to one of her Yorkshire terriers which she was carrying under her arm. "But, thank goodness, I foresaw it and have another man coming to dinner, or my evening would be a trifle—dull!"

* * * * * * * * * * *

Mr. Jones fled on the day of Mayne's funeral from Lispenard House, and even his sister knows nothing of his whereabouts. There is a cottage outside the gate of Fairfax Park, inhabited by a stout and flourishing lady dressed always in the most brilliant of garments, whom it would be hard for her early acquaintances to recognize as Mrs. Simpson. For, after all, Nerine never took a house for her near Lispenard. And perhaps the happiest day in Mrs. Simpson's existence was that of a certain grand wedding at which she was an honored guest in a bright red satin gown, and saw "her Miss Lispenard" made into Mrs. Fairfax. To her credit, it has never passed her lips that Mayne was ever married to her, and her lapses from strict sobriety are far and few now.

And to Mr. Fairfax's credit it may also be mentioned that he has never to this day mentioned to his wife that he knows quite well the whole history of her humiliation on the far-away night of Lord Satterlee's ball.

Lispenard House is a different place now than it was in Nerine's day. But sometimes, when she stays there, she thinks with a strange and wondering awe of the hour spent at midnight in front of the red door.

THE END.

Birthstone Rings

Genuine Gold Filled — Guaranteed For 5 Years

APRIL

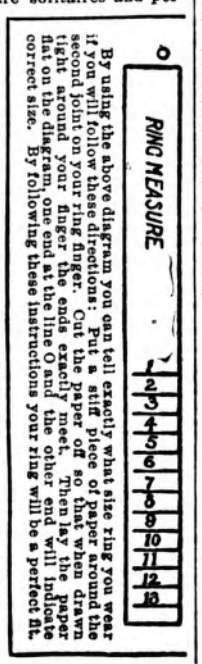
AUGUST

JANUARY

Given For A Club Of Two!

THE most popular lady's rings worn today are these beautiful birthstone rings. Not only is it considered lucky to wear one of them but they are now and always will be exceedingly stylish. We are able to illustrate only three of the rings but there are twelve in all—a different stone for each month of the year and of course you should wear the stone that is symbolical of the month you were born. The following is a list of the twelve rings, names of the stones, the month to which one applies and its symbol.

No. 7632. January, The Garnet, Symbol of Power.
No. 7642. February, The Ameythyst, Symbol of Pure Love.
No. 7652. March, The Bloodstone, Symbol of Courage.
No. 7662. April, The Diamond, Symbol of Purity.
No. 7672. May, The Emerald, Symbol of Immortality.
No. 7682. June, The Agate, Symbol of Health and Long Life.
No. 7692. July, The Ruby, Symbol of Charity.
No. 7702. August, The Sardonyx, Symbol of Happiness.
No. 7712. September, The Sapphire, Symbol of Constancy.
No. 7722. October, The Opal, Symbol of Hope.
No. 7732. November, The Topaz, Symbol of Friendship.
No. 7742. December, The Turquoise, Symbol of Prosperity,



Each ring is guaranteed genuine 12-Karat gold filled which looks exactly like solid gold and will wear for years. In fact we absolutely guarantee each ring for at least five years. The rings themselves are perfectly plain, the stones are solitaires and perfect imitations of the real gems. The setting of each ring is the ever popular "Tiffany" style. As a Christmas, Birthday or all-the-year-round gift for wife, mother, sweetheart or sister nothing could be more appropriate and acceptable than one of these beautiful guaranteed rings set with the birthstone of the person to whom it is given. And not only the women and girls but men and boys as well are now wearing them.

Please do not class these rings with the cheap "electro-plated" rings that turn brassy after they have been worn a month or two. Remember that every one of them is guaranteed to be 12-Karat gold-filled and positively warranted for five years. If you want a handsome birthstone ring for yourself or some dear friend or relative you will make no mistake in taking advantage of this offer at once. When ordering be sure to specify the size and number of ring wanted. You can easily tell just what size ring you wear by following the directions at the right.

Club Offer. For two one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 25c. each, we will send you one of these beautiful gold-filled birthstone rings by parcel post prepaid. Please be sure to give size and number of ring wanted. Address

COMFORT, Augusta, Maine

RING MEASURE

By using the above diagram you can tell exactly what size ring you wear if you will follow these directions: Put a stiff piece of paper around the second joint on your ring finger. Cut the paper off so that when drawn tight around your finger the ends exactly meet. Then lay the paper flat on the diagram, one end at the line O and the other end will indicate correct size. By following these instructions your ring will be a perfect fit.

Comfort's Information Bureau

Under this heading all questions by COMFORT subscribers on subjects not related to the special departments elsewhere in the paper will be answered, as far as may be. COMFORT readers are advised to read carefully the advertisements in this paper, as they will often find in them what they seek through their questions addressed to this Bureau. They will thus save time, labor and postage.

NOTICE.—As the privileges of this Bureau and of all other departments of COMFORT are for subscribers only, no attention will be given any inquiry which does not bear the writer's correct name and address. Initials only, or a fictitious name, if requested, will appear in the published answer, but the inquiry must invariably be signed by the writer's true name.

Bucko Bill, Floris, Iowa.—If you wish to start a Boy Scout organization in your town, write to the National Headquarters of the Boy Scouts of America, 200 Fifth Avenue, New York City, for full information how to go about it.

D. F., California.—The United States Government does not buy arrowheads and Indian relics. A good place to dispose of such articles is to merchants in large cities who will often purchase them for a window display. Show them what you have.

Lonely Lady, Mount Selman, Texas.—It is hard to make any money at home with the pen unless one has marked literary ability and can turn out salable products of their imagination. The ordinary hack work is generally done by old timers at the game, and those who are near the big centers of knowledge and reference. Are you strong enough to do something with your fingers? Make children's caps, for instance. Trim hats. Work luncheon sets. Try and find some particular wants in your neighborhood and fill them.

Mrs. M. P., Oakwood, Texas.—Show the piece of jewelry you have found to some responsible jeweler and let him value it for you. Because it sparkles does not prove that it is really valuable. It will be necessary for you to place an advertisement in the papers regarding your find before you can legally retain possession. Do this for your own protection if you are told that the stones are of value.

M. W. Glaive, Phelps, Wis.—The reason why there is a demand for good cartoonists is the same as the reason for the shortage of good novelists, good poets, good artists, etc. Cartooning is no simple work, and requiries a rare combination of originality, brains, and ability to draw well. But every cartoonist had to make a start at the bottom. Your chances are the same as those of any beginner. Good luck to you.

E. B. D., Bruceville, Ind.—The language of postage stamps is all foolishness, and we cannot give space in COMFORT for its publication. Besides it is contrary to the rules of the Post-office department. Say what you have to say inside of the letter.

Miss E., Lowell, Mass.—We cannot tell you where you can obtain a "good mineral rod." There is no such thing, Do not waste your money by purchasing an article of this kind, as minerals are not located in any such manner. It is a fake. We have answered the "mineral" and "divining" rod question many times in this column. Readers take notice.

COMFORT Lover, Fir, Ark.—Circulars with photos and descriptions of escaped convicts and other criminals are frequently furnished to the postmasters of the sections in which it is thought the men wanted might be found.

Mrs. B. S., Ovenfork, Ky.—You should be able to obtain the compound "Rough on Rats" at any good drug-store. It is a widely advertised product, and is successfully used for the purposes for which it is made.

L. S., Daggett, Mich.—Under the present Federal Draft law a citizen of military age who for any reason is not exempt from service can be sent to France or to any other place the government chooses to send him.

Mrs. R. H. H., Riverside, Cal.—Write to "The Editor," Ridgewood, N. J., for a sample copy of that periodical. This magazine, which is of immense value to the writing fraternity, conducts a bureau of criticism. The charges are not high, and vary for different classes of work. You will find them stated in the pages of "The Editor."

Mrs. V. S., Clayton, N. Mex.—We believe that if corn is put into jars, the covers loosely screwed on, and the jars then placed in a boiler or other vessel with sufficient water to come up to the rims of the covers, that it may be canned so that it will keep. Let the jars remain in the steadily boiling water for half an hour, and then seal tightly. The corn should completely fill the jars. We believe your friend made an error in boiling the jars each day for three days. This is not necessary. Try the above method, using new jars, and putting nothing else in the jars but the corn itself. No salt even should be used. There are several different canning compounds on the market which may be purchased at any up-to-date drug-store. It is best, however, not to use them as they are never necessary if the canning is done properly. These chemical preservatives are not approved of and might get you into trouble under the Pure Food Law. Why not dry some corn this summer by the Shaker method, if you are familiar with it.

R. P., Saukville, Wis.—We cannot tell you if the physical defects you mention would be sufficient to exempt a person from the Federal Draft law. The decision would be up to the examining physician. Watch the advertising columns of COMFORT for the answer to your second question.

M. L. J., Hokes Bluff, Ala.—It is difficult to make any helpful suggestions from the lack of detail in your letter. Write again, stating your age, if you are completely bedridden, and what has been your previous occupation. We will gladly help you if we can.

R. F. H., Womelsdorp, Pa.—Yes, lumber from black walnut trees three feet in diameter would have a large market value. Ask some furniture dealer to give you the addresses of some Pennsylvania manufacturers of furniture, and write to them asking them to quote prices, and tell them how many feet you think you have for sale. Black walnut lumber is also in demand for gun stocks.

J. B. Brown, Osceola, Iowa.—A thorough washing with soap and water, being careful not to get fabric too wet, is a simple way of cleaning leather upholstery. After drying, apply a small quantity of linseed oil mixed with turpentine and rub thoroughly, being careful to remove all surplus oil and have leather clean and soft before using.

Anxious, Plymouth, N. C.—We cannot print the patent laws in the space of this column. If you have an article you wish to patent you should get in touch with a patent attorney. Read COMFORT'S advertising columns.

E. F., Raven, Nebr.—We do not think, after reading the facts of your letter, that your father could obtain any pension from this government. You might, if you so wish, place the details of the case before a pension attorney.

Comfort's League of Cousins

fare of COMFORT and its readers, and everything of a business nature receives attention. The urgent things of course come first, while things of less importance must take their turn. I do not think there is a busier brain or pair of hands in all the world than mine. Often the doctor tells Maria to take every scrap of paper that is within my reach away from me, and force me to rest. Often I lie for hours practically in a state of coma, utterly unable to even raise my tongue to the roof of my mouth or make an articulate sound. Every atom of nerve force in my body becomes exhausted, then my heart gives out, and you can imagine the rest. So, Luilla my dear, be lenient with me. If I cannot correspond with you there are plenty of League members who will. Read my monthly message, and if you want to profit by it just think it is addressed to you individually and written solely and wholly for your instruction and edification and that will go a long way to appeasing your appetite for personal letters. Meanwhile read, study and try to improve your writing and spelling and your mind. There is plenty of room for improvement, and it is your own fault if you don't improve.

Here's your chance to do good. Remember all you are put here on earth for is to do good, and the only worthy way to do good for yourself is to start and do good to others. You'd hate to have anyone call you a hog, but you spend all your time looking out for yourself, and that's exactly what a hog does. Try and be human. Help these poor souls, and you'll be more than human, you'll be divine. Lovingly yours,

Uncle Charlie

League Shut-in and Mercy Work for September

"Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these, ye have done it unto me."

Comfort's League of Cousins

The League of Cousins was founded as a means of bringing the scattered members of COMFORT'S immense circle of readers into one big, happy family. Its aim is to promote a feeling of kinship and relationship among all readers. It was primarily started as a society for the juvenile members of COMFORT'S family, only, but those of more mature years clamored for admittance so persistently that it was deemed advisable to impose no age limit; thus all are eligible to admittance into our League provided they conform to its rules and are animated by the child spirit.

Membership is restricted to COMFORT subscribers and costs thirty cents, only five cents more than the regular subscription to COMFORT which is included. The thirty cents makes you a member of the League and gives you an attractive League button with the letters "C. L. O. C.," a handsome certificate of membership with your name engrossed thereon, and the privilege of having your name in the letter list, also a paid-in-advance subscription to COMFORT. You continue a League member as long as you keep up your subscription to COMFORT. There are no annual dues, so after you have once joined all you have to do to keep in good standing is to keep your subscription to COMFORT paid up.

Please observe carefully the following directions which explain exactly

How to become a Member

Send thirty cents to COMFORT'S Subscription Department, Augusta, Maine, with your request to be admitted into COMFORT'S LEAGUE OF COUSINS, and you will at once receive the League button and your membership certificate and number; you will also receive COMFORT for one year if you are a new subscriber; but if you are already a subscriber your subscription will be renewed or extended one full year beyond date of expiration.

Or, if your subscription is already paid in advance, you can take a friend's one-year subscription at 25 cents and send it in with five cents of your own, thirty cents in all, with your request for membership, and we will send you the button and membership certificate, and send COMFORT to your friend for one year. League subscriptions do not count in premium clubs.

NEVER apply for membership without enclosing thirty cents to include a new subscription or a renewal.

The League numbering over forty thousand members, undoubtedly is the greatest society of young people on earth. It costs but thirty cents to join, and that gives you at least a one-year subscription to COMFORT also, without extra cost.

Never in the world's history was so much given for so little. Never could thirty cents be invested to such advantage, and bring such splendid returns. Don't hesitate. Join us at once and induce your friends to do likewise.

All those League members who desire a list of the cousins residing in the several states, can secure the same by sending a stamped addressed envelope and five cents in stamps to Nellie Rutherford, 1299 Park Place, Brooklyn, New York, grand secretary.

Special Notice

Never write a subscription or renewal order or application for membership in the body of a letter. Write your subscription or renewal and membership application on a separate sheet of paper, separate from your letter. We have to put all subscription orders on our subscription file at once; so if it is written on the same sheet as your letter, the whole letter has to go on to the subscription file at once and thus can receive no attention from Uncle Charlie.

Never send subscriptions to Uncle Charlie nor to the Secretary of the League; they bother him and cause confusion and delay.

Address all letters to COMFORT, Augusta, Maine, and they will promptly reach the head of the department for which they are intended.

Note. Full particulars of how to secure Uncle Charlie's splendid poems and song book will be found at the end of the League of Cousins' Department.

In this department will be carefully considered any legal problem which may be submitted by a subscriber. All opinions given herein will be prepared at our expense by eminent counsel.

Inasmuch as it is one of the principal missions of COMFORT to aid in upbuilding and upholding the sanctity of the home, no advice will be given on matters pertaining to divorce. Any paid-up subscriber to COMFORT is welcome to submit inquiries, which, so far as possible, will be answered in this department. If any reader, other than a subscriber, wishes to take advantage of this privilege, it may be done by sending twenty-five (25) cents, in silver or stamps, for a one-year subscription to COMFORT thus obtaining all the benefits which our subscribers enjoy including a copy of the magazine for one full year.

Full names and addresses must be signed by all persons seeking advice in this column but not for publication. Unless otherwise requested, initials only will be published.

H. W. B., Virginia.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that every householder residing in the state shall, in addition to the property or estate which he is entitled to hold exempt from levy or garnishment, be entitled to hold exempt from levy, seizure, garnishment or sale under any execution, order, or process issued on any demand for any debt or liability on contract his real and personal estate or either, to be selected by him, including money and debts due him, to the value of not exceeding two thousand dollars; provided that such exemption shall not extend to any execution, order or other process issued on any demand in the following cases: first, for the purchase price of real estate, or any part thereof; second, for services rendered by a laboring person, or a mechanic; third, for liabilities for money received by any public officer, officer of a court, fiduciary, or by any attorney at law for money collected by him; fourth, for a lawful claim for any taxes, levies or assessments; fifth, for rent; sixth, for the legal or taxable fees of any public officer, or officer of a court; seventh, for any debt or liability on contract, as to which the debtor or party to the contract has waived the exemption to which he is entitled to. We think payment of an unpaid balance on a mortgage can be enforced against any property the debtor may own, not exempt from levy under execution.

Mrs. C. M., Pennsylvania.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that the life tenant of real estate cannot convey any greater title to the property than he himself possesses, and that to convey good and absolute title of the fee it would require the deed of both the life tenant and the remainderman.

C. D. L., Tennessee.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married woman, leaving no will, her estate, after payment of debts and expenses and subject to the rights of her husband if one survives her, would go in equal shares to her children, the descendants of a deceased child taking the parent's share; we think her share of the estate of a parent who predeceased her, would be administered and would descend upon her death, as a part of her estate.

Mrs. W. R. S.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will, and leaving a widow and two children, his estate, after payment of debts and expenses, would go in equal shares to the widow and children, unless the estate vested prior to November 1st, 1880.

Mrs. M. K., South Dakota.—Under the laws of Iowa, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will, and leaving a surviving widow and children, his widow would receive one third of his estate, after payment of debts and expenses, the balance going in equal shares to his children; this, of course, would not apply to such property as he had owned and disposed of before marriage, but only to such property as he left at the time of his death.

Mrs. B. I., Florida.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that all property, real and personal, of a wife, owned by her before marriage, or lawfully acquired afterwards by gift, device, bequest, or purchase, shall be her separate property and the same shall not be liable for the deaths of her husband, without her consent; we think the property of the wife shall remain in the care and management of the husband, but he shall not charge for his care and management, nor shall a wife be entitled to sue her husband for the proceeds or profits of her said property, that the husband and wife shall join in all sales and conveyances of the property of the wife. We think that upon her death, if no child or descendant and no will, the whole estate after payment of debts and expenses, would go to the surviving husband, if child or descendant, the husband takes a child's share; we think the husband's share, if no child or descendant, can be made his by will.

Mrs. W. O. M., Lothair, Mont.—Under the laws of your state we are of the opinion that a married woman has no present interest in the property of her husband, except that he is liable for her support and that she has inchoate right of dower in his real estate. We think he has a legal right to disinherit her by will except that he cannot cut off her right to dower of the one third interest for life in any property owned by him from which she has not released her dower. This dower right is usually released by her joining in the deed of conveyance of the real estate of the husband. We think that she can defeat her right of support from her husband in case she deserts him without cause. We think that in case your wife has left you and in case she brings a separation action against you, demanding an allowance for her support, it will be necessary for you to defend such action as in case of your default, she would quite probably get a court order or judgment decreeing that you should pay her a sum of money for her support.

Miss M. C., Texas.—We do not think that the use of the name of her stepfather, by the young woman you mention, at the time of her marriage would in any way affect the validity of her marriage, or in any way affect the legitimacy of her children.

Mrs. S. R., Haywood, Okla.—Under the laws of your state we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will and leaving a surviving widow and more than one child, one third of the estate would go to the surviving widow and the remainder in equal shares to the children, the descendants of any deceased children taking the parent's share. We think that if any of this property is tribal property and if the descent was cast prior to November 16th, 1907, it may be possible that the devolution might be otherwise than above expressed. This, however, would depend upon facts not stated in your communication, and we think if this man had any tribal interest in property affected by the treaties with the Five Civilized Tribes, you should take this matter up with some lawyer in your locality with whom you can go in greater detail.

Mrs. R. C., Umatilla, Fla.—We do not think that the law of either the state of Florida or Kentucky makes it necessary that the husband be mentioned by name in the wife's will. He, however, under some crcumstances, would have some interest in the property even though his name was not mentioned. You state that the property in Kentucky was owned jointly by the husband and wife. If this is a fact, we fail to understand how this property could have been sold without the husband joining in the deed. Possibly an examination of this deed may show that he did so in which event, of course, he would have no further interest in the property. It may be possible that the property you state as owned by the wife in Florida, may have been so held that she could dispose of same without her husband's consent. The general rule, however, is that in the state of Florida the husband's signature is necessary to the conveyance of the real estate of the wife. We think it might be advisable that you have the real estate records examined of this property to ascertain just what was done in the matter.

Mrs. E. B., Michigan.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will, and leaving issue, his estate would go one third to his widow and the remaining two thirds to his issue, and if no widow the whole to his issue; children may be disinherited by will.

Conducted by Cousin Marion

In order that each cousin may be answered in this column, no cousin must ask more than three questions in one Month.

HEIGHO, my dears, how have your gardens grown? September right here and we have all been so busy we haven't seen the summer slipping by. I hope all those small and large gardens will give bountiful crops to help feed yourselves and our Allies this winter, and I hope all of you who have been knitting or sewing for the hospitals have got some blessed peace of soul from it. Think of the comfort and aid your work is going to give, this cold winter, to the soldier boys and sailor lads. I can't think or say much of vacations while there is so much to be done, but I hope you have all had a chance to get a restful and joyous change of air and scene. Now I must attack this pile of letters from my perplexed friends, and help them whatever I can.

Twin Sisters, Morgantown, W. Va.—Do not let tale bearers upset your faith in your soldier friend. The boys in the camps and the trenches need all the support their wives and sweethearts can give them. Be faithful to your soldier until you know he is not faithful to you. That tattling friend (?) hasn't much respect for you if he tried to kiss you the first time you met.

M. J., Ashville, N. C.—If you don't know which of the two you love, you should wait. But if you love a man I can't see why you shouldn't marry him even if he is subject to conscription. Is that any reason to reject him?

Dixie Girl, Beaumont, Ala.—I am afraid you never loved him. There is no reason why you should not have a good time while your finance is doing his duty in the navy, but I fear he will have to come to realize that you are either too young or too unstable to be constant to him. I am sorry for the boys who go to war engaged to girls who have mistaken their love of a good time for love of a man.

X. Y. Z., Wilson, Kansas.—It will be perfectly right for you to become a Red Cross nurse if you are old enough and fitted for nursing. Good nurses will be wanted in thousands. Write to the Red Cross managers for your state and they will give you the necessary information as to how to go about it.

Louisiana, 125, Pollack, La.—You surely do need advice but unfortunately no one is qualified to say just what you should do. It is not wise nor right to marry a man unless you love him, but love often does come if you respect him. It would be a great gamble for you to leave your present condition of life, unpleasant as it is, for the uncertainty of a loveless marriage. As for your other questions if I could tell you of a sure wart remover, a certain face bleach and a reliable fat reducer I would soon be wealthy. Most druggists have toilet articles that will sometimes do the things for your skin that you desire.

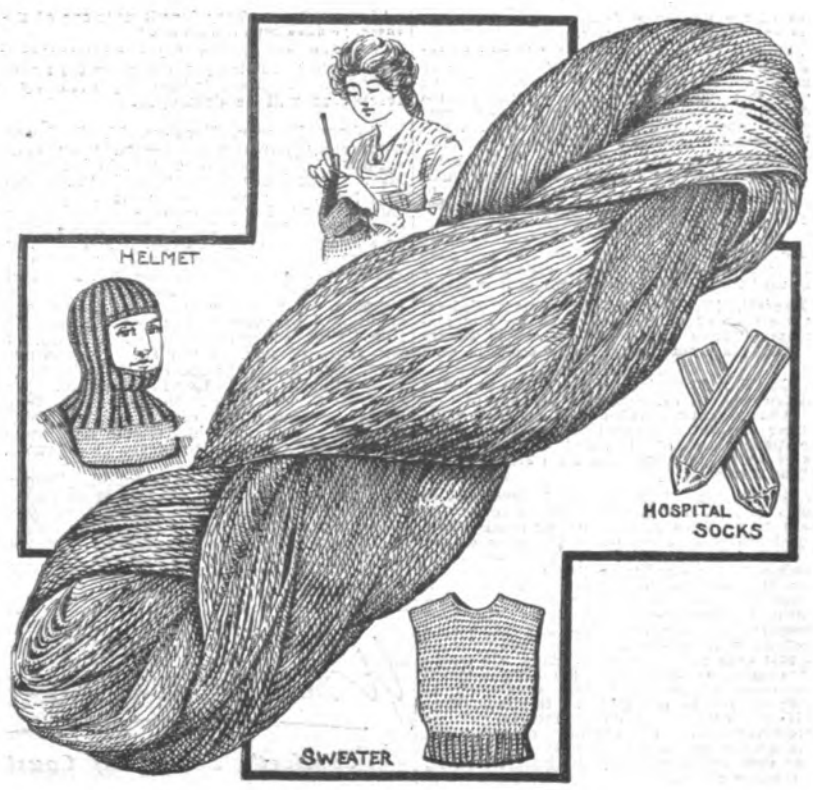
Madison, Wisconsin.—You say your father is "strick" with you. Well, if more fathers had a little more care over the habits and associates of their daughters there would be less trouble in the world. Ask him if the young man may take you out occasionally and if he refuses obey his wishes for a few years.

Sallie of Coal Hill, Ark. asks the same question as several others this month: "Should she go with a boy much younger than she is?" It depends how much younger. A year or two's difference doesn't matter but more than that is likely to be unfortunate.

Little Girl Rougemont, N. C.—One of your difficulties seems like that of many other inquirers. "How often should you write?" It depends upon whether you are engaged. If not I should not write oftener than the young man does, unless there is some reason that makes it difficult for him to write as often as he would like. Why do you bother with the other boy if you love this one?

Hello Girl, Nowata, Okla.—Many have dreamed of being "Movie" stars but few will ever attain their object. It requires real ability, and hard work as well as great beauty or a very strong personality. It seems to haunt the minds of many who could never hope for success, and I would discourage any thought of it.

Brunette, Norfolk Va.—I don't advise you to go against the wishes of your parents. You are evidently young enough to be able to wait a while and see if you and the young man really love each other. If so a small social difference will not matter.



Michigan Girl, Charlotte, Mich.—By all means tell your parents. You have no right at your age, to be secretly meeting young men, much less to get engaged to one of them. Your mother should advise you.

Blue Eyes, Penscacola, Fla.—If you have not already found an answer to your question here it is: Of course you should not consider a proposal from a man you know nothing about. He may say nice things and be generous on four days' acquaintance, but you must know him better before considering him seriously.

Blue Eyes and Brown Eyes, Mexia, Texas.—I would much prefer to scold your parents. The idea of their permitting you at your age to be afflicted with proposals and with suggestions of love from married men. It is too awful to think about.

There, I haven't scolded you as much as usual, perhaps not so much as I should have done. I am feeling charitable to small offenders nowadays. And so many this month have a real feeling of uncertainty as to what they should do that I have overlooked their petty foolishnesses and their bad spelling and their horrible grammar. I will try to be more school teacher like next month and scold you all you deserve. By, by, my dears, until October, and believe me to be, Yours sincerely,

COUSIN MARION.

An Offer
To Women Workers Of The Red Cross

OUR boys—your boys—will soon be at the front "somewhere in France." They will need all the comforts that busy hands at home can provide for them. Among other things there are sweaters and socks, helmets, mufflers and mitts to be knitted. Thousands of mothers, wives and daughters already are industriously plying the needles to good advantage.

You, of course, are doing your bit. Perhaps you would like to do more—and would—if you had the means to do with. Yarn for instance is pretty expensive just now. You may feel unable to buy enough for all the things you want to make.

This being the case why not let COMFORT help you out. We have the yarn—bought at the lowest wholesale price—guaranteed pure, all wool yarn in all the most desirable colors—light and dark grey, khaki, black, blue and white. It comes in large quarter-pound skeins. We will send you free of all cost any desired quantity in any of the above mentioned colors in return for a few subscriptions to COMFORT.

It will be the easiest thing in the world to get the subscriptions, especially when you tell your friends what you are working for. And look at the bargain they are getting in COMFORT for only 25 cents a year—when practically every other magazine in the country has raised its price. They will be glad to subscribe if you will but ask them. We have made our offer just as liberal as we possibly could—so it won't take you long to secure the few subscriptions required. You should start at once however because we shall soon be obliged to raise COMFORT'S subscription price, also the cost of yarn is going still higher so the chances are that next month we shall have to ask for larger clubs. Please be sure to give color wanted when ordering.

OUR OFFER. For four one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 25 cents each we will send you one large skein (one-quarter pound) of guaranteed pure wool yarn free by parcel post prepaid (Premium No. 7504.) Or for eleven one-year subscriptions at 25 cents each we will send you three skeins (Premium No. 72011,) or for fourteen one-year subscriptions we will send you four skeins (Premium No. 72514.) When ordering please be sure to mention color or colors wanted.

Six Wheel Chairs in August
427 is COMFORT'S Total to Date

Six wheel chairs is a very good achievement for the hot and sultry month of August. It doubles our July record and gives promise of an early start and satisfactory results for our fall work.

The six August chairs go to the following shut-ins. The figures after their names indicate the number of subscriptions sent in by them or by their friends in their behalf.

Fannie May Hix, R. 2, Danielsville, Ga., 204; Dollie Virginia Lanier, Fitzpatrick, Ga., 150; Mrs. Maggie Winder, Mahl, Texas, 133; Sanford Shillings, R. 1. Box 161, Rockwood, Tenn., 129; Andrew Buel Hibbard, Ursula, Ark., 119; Walter Joseph Slaybaugh, Anna, Ohio, 117.

Little Fannie Hix, age 11, has never walked, as spinal trouble, which developed in infancy, has paralyzed her lower limbs. Her wheel chair will be a source of great pleasure to this girl shut-in.

Dollie Lanier, age 10, is entirely helpless, being unable to walk, talk or use her arms as the result of spinal trouble which has afflicted her from birth.

Mrs. Winder, age 45, is paralyzed from her waist down by kidney trouble and has not been able to walk the past year. She has a family of small children.

Sanford Shillings, age 11, has no use of his feet as the result of infantile paralysis which attacked him when six months old. He is the oldest of six children.

Andrew Hibbard, age 5, is blind and has been a cripple from birth.

Walter Slaybaugh, age 4, can neither walk, talk nor even sit alone, caused by injuries at birth.

This is a heart-breaking list of pitiful sufferers whose afflictions must move you to compassion. But there are many others, whose cases are equally distressing, working and waiting for a much-needed COMFORT wheel chair. Will you not kindly help them to secure the hoped-for blessing?

The accompanying picture of bright-faced little Dorothy Kate Harris and the letter of thanks from her father, printed below, illustrate the happiness which our Wheel-Chair Club contributors are bestowing on the unfortunate shut-ins. Do your part to help them, and be blessed for doing so.

Sincerely yours,

W. H. GANNETT, Publisher of COMFORT.

P. S. For the information of our many new subscribers let me explain that for each and every 200 one-year subscriptions to COMFORT, at 25 cents each, sent in either singly or in clubs by persons who direct that they are to be credited to COMFORT'S WHEEL-CHAIR CLUB instead of claiming the premiums to which they would be entitled, I give a FIRST-CLASS INVALID WHEEL CHAIR to some needy crippled Shut-in and pay the freight, too. It is a large and expensive premium for me to give for that number of subscribers, but I am always glad to do my part a little faster each month than you do yours.

Any shut-in who has friends to help him get subscriptions can obtain a wheel chair free. Write me for information.

Very Thankful for Little Daughter's Wheel Chair

CUMMING, GA.

DEAR MR. GANNETT:

Please find enclosed a photo of our Dorothy Kate enjoying the wheel chair sent by you, for which we are very thankful. We surely do appreciate your kindness and shall be glad to do anything we can to help on the good you are doing through COMFORT. With best wishes and hoping you may be able to bring joy to many other shut-ins, I remain truly yours,

H. J. HARRIS.

Walking the Rope to Fortune

By Owen Hugh O'Neil

MOST of us desire wealth, but probably very few of us would care to follow the route to fame and fortune pursued by Jean Francois Gravelet, professionally known as Blondin.

In 1830, at the age of six, he made his debut in France, his native country, as a professional tight-rope walker and gymnast. His theatrical appearances brought him considerable fame, but he owed his fortune to the feat of crossing Niagara Falls on a tight-rope, eleven hundred feet long and one hundred and sixty feet above the surface of the water. This he accomplished first in 1859, but performed the feat several times thereafter. Once he crossed the Falls blindfolded, and once, pushing a wheelbarrow ahead of him; again, bundled up in a sack, and another time on stilts, which was the most hazardous of all. His greatest sensation, however, was caused by the remarkable achievement of walking the 1100-foot tight-rope with a man on his back. This was particularly dangerous, since the slightest movement on the part of his "passenger" would have plunged them both into the raging waters of Niagara.

Blondin made the perilous journey safely, however, and a few years later thrilled European audiences by walking a tight-rope on stilts, and turning somersaults in the middle, at a height of one hundred and seventy feet from the ground.

In spite of the perils to which he constantly exposed himself, Blondin reached the age of seventy-three years. His last performance was presented in Ireland, in 1896, when he was seventy-two years old.

Growing Camphor in the Gulf Coast

Growing camphor may within a few years become one of the leading industries of this country. Surprising as this may seem, it comes to us, as though in answer to the great cry of the South for more diversified farming, especially the Gulf-coast region, where growing cotton, altogether for a livelihood is not always profitable.

Experiments which have been conducted in the Gulf-coast region of Texas have proven beyond question that the trees from which this article of commerce is distilled can be grown here and be made a very profitable industry.

Several years ago some camphor seeds were planted, they soon came up and in one year's time they reached the height of 18 inches, which is said to be a more rapid growth than they have in the camphor-producing regions of the old world.

It is believed that a regular annual profit of $300 to $400 an acre may be obtained from a camphor farm, by cutting the camphor with a mowing-blade when the plants reach a height of about 12 inches from the ground, instead of waiting until the trees are of full-grown size and then cutting.

It has been demonstrated that by cutting the plants in the manner suggested, a larger percentage of camphor can be obtained. As the stubble left by the cutting of the plants soon sends up new sprouts and in twelve months it is again ready to cut, giving an annual output.

The camphor is obtained by putting the plants through the distilling process.

"Yes, Bobby, I did."

"Well! He ain't done it."—Sydney Bulletin.

Why She Made No Outcry

"You say," said the lawyer, "you heard this man break into your house in the dead of night and yet you made no effort to call for help?"

"That is so."

"Were you too frightened to call out?"

"No. I was not disturbed a particle. He bumped into the rocker of a chair and swore, so I thought it was my husband."—Detroit Free Press.

In Running Order

The dealer in automobiles was pretty angry.

"Look here," he said. "The bill for that motorcar I sold you has been running for over a year now."

"Let it run," said the delinquent customer. "I want to have something connected with this machine that will run for over half an hour without stopping."—New York Times.

Treatment Helped Some

"Let me kiss those tears away," he begged tenderly.

She fell into his arms and he was busy for the next few minutes.

And yet the tears flowed on.

"Can nothing stop them?" he asked breathlessly.

"No," she murmured, "it is hay fever, you know. But go on with the treatment."

A Leap-Year Hint

"What a beautiful dog, Miss Ethel!" exclaimed her bashful admirer. "Is he affectionate?"

"Is he affectionate?" she asked, archly.

"Indeed he is. Here, Bruno! Come good doggie, and show Charlie Smith how to kiss me."—Answers.

Why England Is Called J. Bull, and Why the Lion

Every country has a nickname and is represented in pictures by an animal. The British lion is the animal that stands for England and John Bull is the owner and master.

John Bull is the nation. The name John Bull comes from a work written by John Arbuthnot, a witty doctor and writer, a great friend of Swift and Pope. He was born in Scotland in 1667 and died in 1735. The sketch that he wrote dealt with political affairs of Europe at the time and the countries were made to appear as if they were men and women.

THOUGHTS THAT BREATHE AND WORDS THAT BURN

America's Harvest Must Be Carefully Conserved and Wisely Administered to Save the World from Famine

THE allegorical significance of COMFORT'S front cover design, this month, is no exaggeration of the stern reality that faces the world. Europe is over-populated to the extent that even under normal conditions in time of peace its crops fall short of feeding its people by a large margin which has to be supplied from the surplus agricultural products of other lands. But war has increased the consumption and diminished the production of the staple foods in Europe which is thus compelled to call on the rest of the world for extraordinary supplies, and especially of wheat and meat, fats and sugar. And the peculiar difficulties of the situation are such that the obligation and burden of rendering this service rest almost exclusively on the people and government of the United States.

Besides the United States and Canada the other great wheat and meat exporting countries are Argentina and Australia, and heretofore they have marketed their products in Europe; but they are so far distant and it requires so much time to make the voyage that, with the present shortage of shipping, ships can not be spared for this purpose. India and Russia also produce a surplus of wheat, but the former is too distant while the latter's commercial intercourse with the rest of Europe is cut off by the military operations of her enemies. So it narrows down to Canada and the United States as being the only countries practically available as sources of wheat and meat supply, the importance the latter country measuring up in proportion to its larger size and greater productiveness.

Therefore all Europe is anxiously contemplating the harvest in the United States; our enemies with envy and foreboding of disastrous consequences to themselves; our allies with expectation of succor that inspires confidence of ultimate victory and the triumph of the cause of liberty for which they have been and still are making such glorious sacrifices.

Fortunately this year's yield of most of our crops is unusually large so that we shall have an abundance to feed our own people and a large surplus to export. But so great and pressing are the needs of our famine-threatened, war-stricken friends across the water -that we must practice the most careful conservation and rigid economy of food in order to make the surplus available for their use as large as possible.

By urging economy we do not intend that anyone in this country should scant his food allowance. To reduce the quantity or nutrient quality of food consumed below the requirements of health and bodily strength would invite sickness and induce a wasteful reduction of the war power of our country. First of all our own people must be well nourished in order to stand up under the strain and added labor imposed on them by war. What we advocate is the plain, common-sense economy of eliminating all waste so that every scrap of good food shall be saved, and not only saved but saved for the best possible use, which latter necessitates a wise discrimination in the selection of foods and involves some personal sacrifice in gratification of mere preferential desires for certain kinds of food. This sacrifice, so small in comparison with those endured by our faithful allies, should be cheerfully undertaken by us. Although its nature and the reason for it is described in Mr. Hoover's letter, on another page in this magazine, we wish to add a few words in further explanation.

Transportation is one of the most difficult problems of the war both here and abroad. With the continual increase of our army in France the need of ships is growing while their number is diminishing week by week through the piratical submarine attacks which Germany directs indiscriminately against the commerce of all nations. Therefore cargo space must be economized by restricting our exports to the bare necessaries and even those in the most compact and useful form. The railroads of Europe can hardly serve the needs of the armies in the field, and the carrying capacity of our own railroads is inadequate to the rapidly increasing demands of the country in the present emergency. Because sugar and wheat flour are the most concentrated forms of food, and beef, pork and mutton are the meats best adapted to army use, we are asked to cut down our consumption of these and to substitute on our home tables the more bulky and perishable foods. These are as wholesome and some of them even more so than those which we are requested to forego. Also we should make a special effort to use the products of our own vicinity in order to relieve the freight congestion of our railroads.

With good judgment in selecting and combining, and reasonable skill in cooking and serving there need be little self-denial and some positive advantage in the use of these substitutes. To eat fish, poultry, eggs, milk and cheese instead of red meats, to reduce the consumption of white bread by substituting in large part bran rolls, Graham or entire-wheat bread, brown bread, corn bread, oat meal and other cereals, and to vary the diet with more fresh and canned vegetables and fruits would benefit the health of most people and should prove no real hardship. In fact it is the diet that the health experts prescribe. In this connection I am prompted to express the hope that COMFORT readers have put up an ample supply of home-canned vegetables, fruits and berries, as advised by us last June.

According to present indications England, France and Italy need to import 500,000,000 bushels of wheat or its equivalent in flour. The visible surplus in the United State and Canada is but little over half that quantity in case we retain for home consumption the amount usual in previous years. The dictates of humanity as well as our own interests in winning the war demand that we largely augment this surplus by the only means now possible, which is by using less ourselves. We can easily do so, if we will, for we have an abundance of other cereals to take the place of wheat. Also we must plant a larger acreage to wheat for next year's harvest; and the farmers need have no fear of breaking the market by over-production as our government has guaranteed them a minimum price of two dollars per bushel for the 1918 wheat crop.

The necessity of conserving our meat supply is even more urgent. If we fail in this respect we shall suffer the consequences in higher prices and scarcity of meat for years to come. The war has taken a heavy toll of meat. Consumption has so far exceeded production that the world's total of meat-producing animals numbers 115,000,000 less than three years ago. Effective measures must be taken to increase our live stock. It is a great temptation for cattle and sheep raisers to sell at prevailing high prices, but we believe it poor policy for them to reduce the numbers of herds and flocks, for world conditions are such that meat prices are bound to maintain a high level long after the war.

This war seems likely to fulfill the prediction of a well-informed authority, made some years previous to its outbreak, that famine rather than military success would be the determining factor of the next great war. Germany has been forced to abandon her original expectation of decisive military success and now confesses that her hope of victory depends on starving England, France and Italy into submission through the ruthless sinking of merchant ships by her submarines before she herself is reduced to the last extremity by hunger. The importance of the food question as a determining factor of the war can not be over-estimated, and the responsibility and means of its solution are in the hands of the American people. Through the concerted action of all and the individual efforts of each we can and must render this service, as in duty bound to our country and our allies.

Drastic Treatment Needed to Suppress the Menace of Rampant Treason

PRESIDENT WILSON has complained bitterly and with good reason of the heinous plots and atrocious crimes instigated and financed in the United States by the German government through its officers and sympathizers during the last three years. Emboldened by the impunity or leniency too commonly accorded the perpetrators, the legion of traitors with which the country is infested have progressed from secret conspiracies and covert attacks to open promotion of treason to an extent that handicaps our government's war efforts.

Whose fault is it that these conspirators were not handled at the outset in a manner calculated to inspire our country's enemies with a wholesome respect for the law and with fear of violating it? Why have these traitors been permitted recently to stalk through the length and breadth of the land openly instigating anti-draft riots and other forms of treason including wholesale arson and murder in their plans and efforts to cripple the resources of the nation and paralyze the functions of government? Shall the anarchists, nihilists, pro-German socialists, I. W. W., pacifists and foreign-language press be allowed to carry on their monstrous propaganda to the end that we fall to the condition of Russia? Russia with her 180,000,000 people and immense resources lies prostrate and helpless before her foreign enemies with her vitals lacerated by internal strife, a pitiable example of the calamitous consequences of German intrigue aided by Russian socialists, anarchists, pacifists and other traitors.

Last summer former Secretary of State Elihu Root was sent as head of President Wilson's Special Commission to Russia. On his return, after comparing conditions there with those developing here, Mr. Root declared that there were men walking our streets "who ought to be taken out at sunrise and shot for treason." This statement from a man of such pre-eminent ability, noted as conservative in his ideas and cautious in expressing them, the leading lawyer in this country, carries extraordinary weight and should have aroused our government to take those measures of suppression and punishment long since obviously necessary to stamp out this nest of vipers ere the sedition which they are sowing gets beyond control. Editors of the loyal newspapers have been denouncing the "unhung traitors" and demanding condign punishment for them. The New York Sun says that every one is asking why the Kaiser is being allowed to make war upon the United States openly on American soil.

To our soldiers who go to fight the Germans in France it is poor encouragement to know that the Kaiser's emissaries in America are allowed to "stab the country in the back" (Secretary Redfield so characterizes the pacifist activities). Another deplorable effect of such failure of public justice is its tendency to result in lynchings. For persistently and defiantly inciting to treason Frank Little, the I. W. W. organizer, was hung last August, not by process of law but by a Montana vigilance committee. Calling our soldiers "Uncle Sam's scabs in uniform," and threatening that, "if the mines are taken under Federal control we will make it so damned hot for the government that it will not be able to send any troops to France," are samples of his utterances for which he should have met a traitor's fate at the hands of the law. The recent discovery of a nation-wide I. W. W. plot alleged to have been instigated and financed in the interest of Germany has caused the arrest of some of its members.

Doll's Crocheted Outfit

ANY little girl will be delighted with a pretty doll dressed in clothes which can be slipped off at will.

The outfit illustrated can easily be made by nimble fingers in short time. Silkateen or any soft finished mercerized cotton can be used, worked up with a steel hook of suitable size.

The under garments should be made of white, and the dress and tam-o'-shanter of pink or blue and white.

UNION SUIT.

The doll shown is about six inches in height and the directions as given will result in clothes to fit a doll of this size, but the same idea can be carried out and clothes made larger very easily if one desires. The under clothes consist of a union suit and short skirt.

For the union suit use white and begin with a ch. 52 sts. turn, 1 d. c. in the 4th st. from hook, then 1 d. c. in each st. of ch., ch. 3, turn.

2nd row.—8 d. c., making 1 between each d. c. in last row, ch. 9, sk. 3 d. c., 1 d. c. in between each of the next 15 d. c., ch. 9, sk. 8, 8 d. c., ch. 3, turn.

3rd row.—1 d. c. between each d. c. making 7 doubles on the chs. 9, forming the armholes, ch. 3, turn.

Next 2 rows the same, turning at the end of each row and working 1 d. c. between each d. c.

Now work three rows round and round widening a little by making 2 d. c. in the same st. in the center of the back in each round. Divide the work evenly front and back and work two rows around on each half to form the legs, each of which is then finished with two rows of ch.

DOLLY DRESSED UP.

3, with 1 s. c. in every second double stitch. Break thread and finish off.

Join in bottom of opening in the back, single crochet along the edge to the top, ch. 5, 1 d. c. between 3rd and 4th doubles, ch. 5, repeat to opposite end of rows, turn. Ch. 5, 1 s. c. under ch. 5, turn at end and work one more row, then s. c. down to center of back opening. Finish around armholes with chs. 3.

Under Skirt

Begin this with ch. 55 sts., then 5 rows doubles, turning at the end of each row to form opening in the back, then 1 row doubles and 3 be full enough. Finish with a scallop of 6 treble crochet between every 4 d. c., caught with a single between scallops; edge with ch. 3, 1 s. c. in each treble.

Finish the neck with 1 row d. c. working on ch. which forms upper part of sleeve, turn, 1 row of s. c. with picot every 3rd st. Make sleeve of 4 rows of d. c. edged with a row of chs. of 3. Finish opening in back as on skirt and run in baby ribbon around neck and sleeves.

Tam-o'-Shanter

Ch. 4 of color, join in ring, s. c. round and round, working through both loops of each st. and making 2 sts. in one as needed to enlarge, until one has circle the size of a half dollar, then ch. 3 and 1 d. c. in each st. Next round enlarge by working 2 d. c. every little way, add 2 more rows in same way, 1 row sk. every 4th st., next row sk. enough so as to bring into doll's head size, then 3 rows singles for band.

TAM-O'-SHANTER.

Finish the top with full pompom of white wool and Dolly will have one of the cutest little caps imaginable.

Crocheted Lingerie Clasps

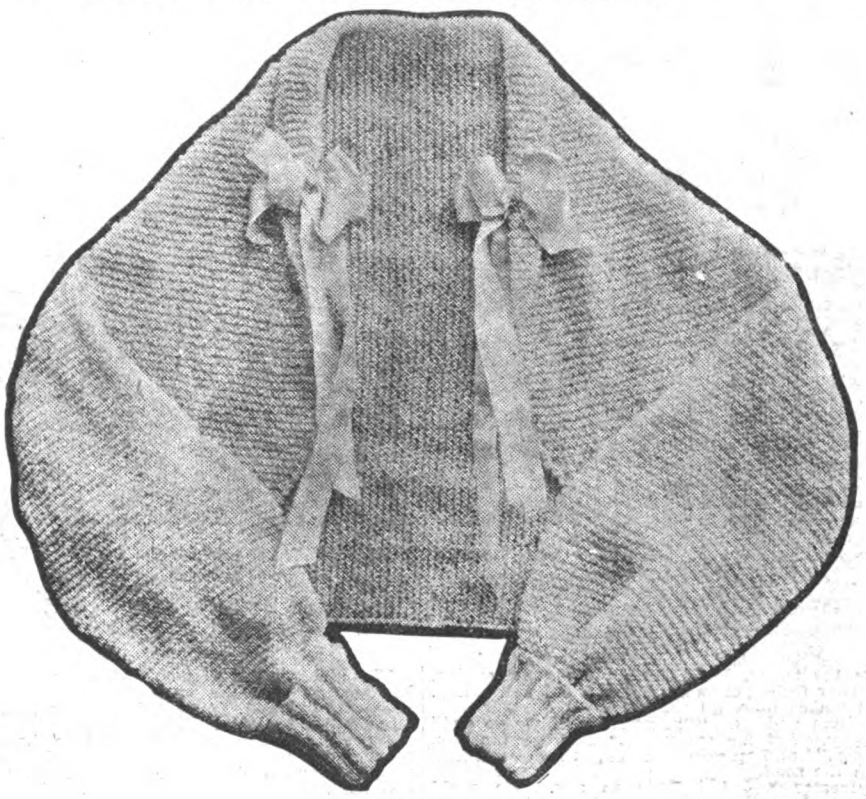
These useful trifles will be appreciated by most any one, young or old, for who does not find it annoying to have their shoulder straps out of place.

In a half hour's time one can crochet a pair of these useful little articles which will be sure of a welcome as they fill a real need. Use rather fine crochet cotton and a suitable steel hook. Ch. 50 sts., 1 s. c. in last st., ch. 5, 1 s. c. in next 4th st., ch. 5, repeat at the end ch. 5, turn, 1 s. c. under last ch. in first row, ch. 5, 1 s. c. under next ch., repeat. Two more rows of chains turn and work back over last chs., making 3 s. c., ch. 3, 3 s. c. under each ch. 5, s. c. around the ends and work down opposite side in the same way. This forms the strap, one end is finished with a little rose made in this way. Ch. 4 join in ring, ch. 5, 1 s. c. in ring, ch. 2, 1 s. c., repeat making 5 sps. in all.

3rd row.—6 d. c. under each ch. 2, join.

4th row.—Ch. 5, 1 s. c. between each group of doubles in last round.

5th row.—8 d. c. under each ch.



6th row.—Ch. 6, 1 d. c. between each group of doubles.

Last round.—1 d. c., 9 trebles, 1 d. c. under each ch. 6.

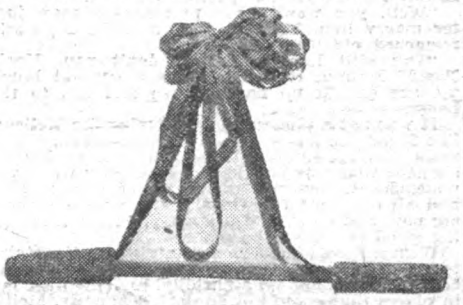
Sew the roses in place and finish each strap with a tiny snap catch. A pair of these slipped over a bit of bright ribbon and placed in a little box with a Christmas card makes a most attractive little remembrance.

Knitted Wool Kimono

The useful wrap will prove very acceptable to most any woman and especially so to a semi-invalid, as one can easily slip into it and it gives warmth across the shoulders and arms, just where it is needed.

KNITTED WOOL KIMONO.

For materials one will require eight skeins zephyr floss, 1 pair bone knitting needles No. 6. 2 pair steel needles No. 8, 10 yards wash ribbon for rosettes. On bone needles cast 60 sts. (on 12 inches) K. in ridges increasing 1 st. on each end of needle every 4th row until there are 112 sts. on needle. K. on these sts. until work measures about 30 inches, then decrease 1 st. each end of every 4th row until there are 60 sts. on needle.



Cuffs

Change to steel needles k. in rounds of k. 1, p. 1, for 5 1-2 inches, bind off.

Pick up 60 sts. for other cuff and make in the same way. Sew up 9 inches on each end about the cuffs for sleeves. Turn over three inches for collar and finish with ribbon.

For Knitting Needles

A case for holding idle knitting needles may be easily made and will be an appropriate gift for most any one now that we all are knitting. This consists of two ends crocheted of silk or mercerized cotton as shown, with a couple of yards of narrow ribbon attached to the inside of either end and tied in a full rosette as shown.

To make the ends use a steel crochet hook of suitable size to make the work close and firm. Begin with ch. 4, join, fill with s. c., work round and round, enlarging by making 2 sts. in one as necessary until work measures three-fourths of an inch across when folded together. Then continue round and round without enlarging until end is three inches in length. Make another end to match and sew ribbon to the inside of each.

Red Cross Bag

This very appropriate bag, made in the shape of a cross, is used extensively now to hold the knitting work, yarn, needles, etc. It can be made by sewing together two yards of six-inch wide red ribbon, or any red material of the same width, running a flat corset steel, millinery wire or any other metal band through the heading at the upper part of the cross section to hold it in position. Notice how nicely it hangs on the arm and how well the ball of yarn fits down in the lower pocket, also that the needles can lay in the cross sections, together with the work in hand.

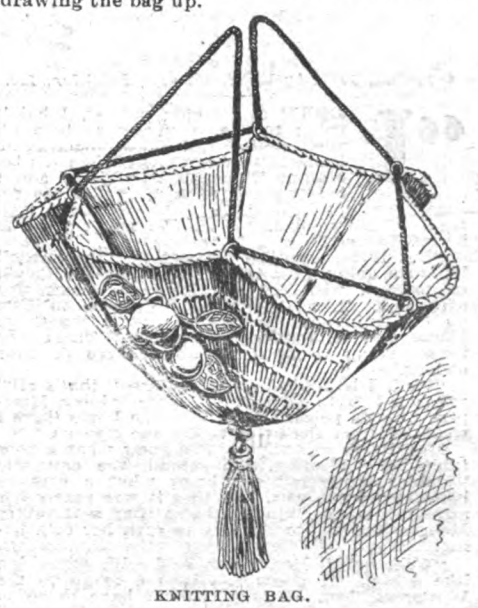
Child's Sewing Apron

A cute little apron which will encourage a child to learn to sew can be made of linen, Indian head or similar material.

CHILD'S SEWING APRON.



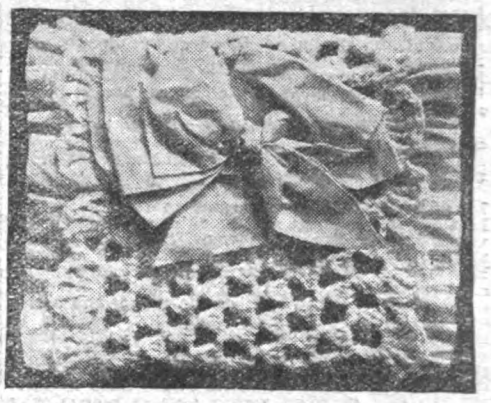
Cut sides and bottom straight, round the upper edge and add a strap to button on the left shoulder.

Cut another piece the same size in width and long enough to form a bag from the waistline down and a rounded flap on which can be outlined some simple appropriate design and the words "A stitch in time saves nine."

Buttonhole all edges as shown or finish with feather stitching. The size of the garment depends upon the age of the child but our illustration shows clearly the method of making.

Knitting Bag

An ample and unique knitting bag may be fashioned of the outside covering of a tea chest. Cut a 30-inch circle of this and line with brightly flowered cretonne or plain sateen. Bind the edges together with ribbon or finish with a silk cord. Add a half-dozen large white ivory rings, placed an equal distance apart, to the edge, through which run a cord or ribbon for drawing the bag up.



KNITTING BAG.

Finish the front with appliqued designs of fruit and green felt, velveteen or crocheted wool leaves. To make the fruit cut circles of bright silk, draw up edges, stuff with cotton and make large black French knot in center. A silk tassel finishes the bottom of the bag.

Child's Crocheted Muff

To make this dainty and comfortable muff use a medium-sized bone hook and Germantown wool in white or any preferred color. Make a chain twice the width you desire the muff to be; join the ends of the chain, ch. 3, then work a petal thus: Having thread over hook, take stitch same as treble, draw thread through 2 loops, repeat 1 treble, again drawing thread through 2 loops, repeat once more then work off loops two at a time. * ch. 3, sk. 3 in foundation ch., petal in next 3 sts. Repeat from * to end of round.

Make all succeeding rounds same as the first working petals over the ch. 3 in preceding row. The large shells on ends is made thus: 1 s. c. over ch., * ch. 3, 5 d. tr. in next space separated by ch. 2, ch. 3, 1 s. c. over next ch. 3 or space, repeat * around. Line the muff with quilted padding with flannel or outing inside and a pretty silk interlining to show through the mesh in the muff. Trim muff with a pretty ribbon bow in pale blue, pink or other desired color and sew a narrow ribbon frill just under the shells on ends of muff. Any little girl will be pleased to carry such a pretty muff and it will certainly keep tiny hands cozy and warm.

Point Lace

Cast on 28 stitches and knit across plain.

1st row.—K. 1, n., o. twice, n., k. 17, o. n., o. n., o. k. 2.

2nd row.—K. 8, p. 16, k. 2, p. 1, k. 2.

Bind off 5 sts. to finish the scallop and proceed as before. GEORGIANA T. DRENMAN.

Melissa's Home Coming

by Joseph F. Novak

Copyright, 1917, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

"I DON'T care what you say, I hain't going to the Winterses to help fill silo, that's all! They hadn't no business to work today when it's beginning 'Home Coming Week,' and I hain't going to miss any of the doings!" exclaimed Irvin Ream passionately. "All the boys are going to town and I hain't going to be left behind!"

"But Irvin," soothed his mother, "there won't be much doing until tonight and they say they'll be finished with the silo by four o'clock this afternoon. There'll only be folks coming to town on the train and the band'll play in the Court House Square, that'll be about all. The shows hain't going to open up afore three or four o'clock."

"Well, I hain't going to Winterses, that's all," reiterated Irvin stoutly. "I hate Widder Mumpers worse'n poison. The last time I was there I was sick from the orful vittles she give us."

Mrs. Ream was silent. She knew what a poor table Mrs. Winters, the second, the erstwhile "Widder Mumpers" set, knew what a careless housekeeper she was, and that it was partly her advent into the Winters' home that sent pretty Melissa Winters to the city to earn her own living.

"Well, paw," Mrs. Ream said with something like a sigh, "I guess you'll have to go to the Winterses then. I guess I don't have to go to town the very first day of the celebration——"

"You will too," interrupted Sylvester, her first-born, "you will too. We got to send a man to the Winterses, and if Irvin won't go, I will. Paw's promised to take you to town every day of the celebration and go you will. I'll help at the Winterses."

"I know you hate to go there, Sylvester, but if you won't mind very much——" Mrs. Ream hesitated, then said: "You could go just as well as not, Irvin."

"Well, I won't, maw, that's all there is to it. I ain't going to be made sick for the doings tonight."

Sylvester disliked going to the Winters farm even worse than Irvin did. But not because it was Home-Coming Week nor yet because of Mrs. Winters' atrocious cooking. The Winters farm always brought thoughts of Melissa, of her sweet girlishness, and the love that nestled in his heart for her. He had believed himself somewhat favored above others, but on the night she told him that her father was to marry Widow Mumpers and of her dislike of her, the tears in her eyes had swept him off his feet and he had caught her close to his rugged, honest bosom and kissed her.

Frightened and terrified at what to her seemed a liberty bordering somewhat on the improper, she had slapped his face and told him never, never to speak to her again.

She would not see him after that, and shortly after her stepmother came to live in the old home, Melissa packed her things and went to work in the city. She went, however, without malice toward the woman who had usurped her mother's place, for she wrote frequently and returned once or twice for a visit. Recently rumor was that she had become engaged to a city chap, and it was understood that she was to marry him that winter.

These then, were the reasons why Sylvester Ream disliked going to the Winters farm. But the thought that his mother would have to forego the day in town was a greater reason why he should put self aside, and so when breakfast was finished, he started off.

He made a splendid figure as he trudged the road, his body well set up, and his handsome face glowing with sunburn and health. Even his rough clothes seemed to add to the bigness of his fine physique, and a cleaner young fellow than Sylvester Ream would have been hard to find.

Sylvester had to pass through town on his way to the Winters farm. As the morning train was already in, and the town was filled with people, he avoided the main street.

He soon reached the farther outskirts of the town and as he turned into the road that led to the Winters farm, he noted the chic figure of a girl before him.

She was extremely citified in her swagger coat of palm beach, with its big green silk collar, her nifty white shoes and her big white felt hat with a single band of delicate green around the low crown. In one hand she carried a reed suitcase. She walked along with a jaunty step, but presently she put the suitcase on the ground and stopped to rest a bit.

Sylvester kept up his long, swinging pace, and in another moment reached her. Then he stopped and stared, for the fine city girl was no other person than Melissa Winters!

"Well, is it really you, Melissy?" he asked. He felt decidedly awkward. "You look so citified, I didn't know you from a distance."

She smiled sunnily.

"Yes, it's really me, Sylv," she replied, and it made his heart beat to hear her use his name thus foreshortened. "But why aren't you in town today? You surely aren't going to work?"

"Oh, yes. We're filling silo at your father's place, and they want to finish up because they're going over Amboy way, and it would be a shame not to fill when they have all the machinery here this week."

"Will there be many men at the house?" Melissa asked.

"About nine or so. Let me see: McIntosh and Agnew will pick up from the field, Ed Brash tends the cutter, Donald Blake and Will Nesbit drive the teams, Fred Dunton tends the engine, and your father, old man Smith and I will stamp. That makes nine, all told."

Melissa nodded. "Oh, yes. Shall we go on?"

"Sure. Let me carry your suitcase for you, Melissy," and picking it up, they continued down the road.

Sylvester had but little to say. He could only steal sidelong glances at the trim little figure, and he was almost glad that the hat was so big, for several times when Melissa looked straight at him, his heart gave such a jump, he was afraid she might notice it. And with her big hat shielding her face, he could admire her all he pleased, unseen.

At length they reached the Winters farm, where the men were awaiting someone from the Ream farm. At the appearance of Sylvester, they rose to take up their work of filling the silo, but when they noted the chic little lady and knew her to be Melissa, they crowded about her and welcomed her home.

Melissa shook the hard, calloused hands with genuine warmth, and pretended not to see the admiring glances bestowed upon her.

"Goin' to stay to hum now, Melissy, or air ye goin' back after the celebration?" Ed Brash asked.

"I intend to return," Melissa replied. "I have a nice position in town as a stenographer, you know."

"It's better to bang one o' them machines than bein' a farmer's wife an' havin' to work like thunder th' hull o' th' days, eh Melissy?" said Jim Agnew.

"Yes, Jim, if one becomes a farmer's wife merely for the sake of getting married."

"Well, you won't have to marry a man just ter marry him. You kin pick a little, I guess," remarked old Tom Smith.

"You still like to flatter, don't you, Uncle Tom?" Melissa chided, and as a general laugh up, she caught up her suitcase and ran to the house.

It was not a pleasant home-coming for Melissa. She found the house deserted. The kitchen, which room she first entered, had a generally untidy air about it that was mortifying, especially when she remembered how spic-and-span her own mother had always kept it. On the stove were several big pots and pans, and a steamy, rather nauseating smell pervaded the place.

With a little shudder, she hurried up the stairs to her own room. It was in careless order, the bed was made but very untidily, and the dust lay in places that could not be dusted handily. Melissa set down her suitcase and then went to her stepmother's room, where she found that lady fixing her oily-looking hair, her mouth full of hairpins.

"My heavens, Melissy! I didn't know you was comin' home Home-Comin' Week. Ain't ye swell, though. Turn 'round and let me look at you. I'd never know you in them swell things. How ye bin since I heard from ye last an' how's Mr. Vreeland?"

"Oh, I've been getting along quite nicely," Melissa returned, but she made no comment with relation to Mr. Vreeland, the man to whom rumor said she was engaged. "Is there anything special going on in town today?"

"No, nothin' until this afternoon, but I hain't goin' to miss nothin'. I'm getting' ready to go to town. Will ye come with me?"

"You're surely not going to town with the silo-fillers here, are you?" asked Melissa, amazed.

"Why not?" Mrs. Winters demanded. "Heavens and earth, Melissy! I been cooped up all summer and I'm goin' to have a good time this week. There's no sense in them men fillin' silo today ——"

"But I understand that they are going to Amboy tomorrow and they won't be back this way for a month."

"Oh, o' course. But that hain't goin' to stop me. I got dinner all done and half a hour afore the men's ready to sit down, Hiram kin dish it up."

Melissa sat down without another word. Her stepmother, however, kept up a flow of chatter until she completed her toilet, and then tying on her bonnet, she picked up her small bag and umbrella and announced her intention of going.

"Will ye come, Melissy?" she asked.

"I don't think I will, ma," she returned. "I'm tired and think I'll rest a while."

"Suit yourself," Mrs. Winters replied, and she bounced off.

Melissa watched her depart, then her thoughts went to the hard-working men outside. No wonder none of the farmers cared to help out at the Winters farm. For this was the interest Mrs. Winters, II, took in the place. It was just like her to cook up a lot of stuff and hand it to the men warmed over.

Well, since she was to be at home for a few days at least, she had best make up her room to her comfort. So taking off her coat and hat and smart dress, she took from her suitcase a neat house-gown and put it on. Then she substituted serviceable black slippers for her white shoes, after which transformation, she straightened up and aired her room until it began to look something like what it had when she had always been at home.

Then she went to the kitchen.

The woodbox was empty, everything upset and things were in a deplorable condition generally. Mrs. Winters was not a tidy housekeeper at best and the kitchen now showed her at her worst.

Melissa went to the stove and lifted the lids of the various pots and pans and gave a sigh of disgust. The potatoes had boiled down to a shapeless mass, the meat was simmering in a pot of fat, and the beans looked like a gravy.

The girl stood a moment with a pot-cover in her hands, eying the mess. Then she slammed it down. "Slop! You'd think those men were pigs! I'll make their dinner!"

With the thought, she whisked into the dining-room and brushed up. Mrs. Winters had set the table, slamming down the dishes in her usual careless manner. Melissa gazed at the table a moment, then with a sudden determination, gathered up the dishes, took off the red cloth and put on a white one. Then she reset the table and was considerably cheered at the sight it now presented.

Then she drew down the shades darkening the room, and went back to the kitchen, and picking up a basket, she went out to the wood-pile.

Sylvester was standing near the engine, Fred Dunton having relieved him of the stamping for a while, as that was the most tiresome part of the work. As Melissa came out, he smiled at her, for he felt less afraid of her now than when she was arrayed in her city finery.

"Let me carry in that wood, Melissa," he said, coming up. "Do you need much?"

"Yes, a great deal," she replied.

"What are you doing?" he continued, picking up the basket, and following her into the kitchen.

"Getting dinner," she replied. "Look at the stuff that woman prepared for you men! Such stuff! Not fit for anything but hogs!"

"But there's nine of us, Melissy. It'll be too much."

"No, it won't," she answered.

"Well, I'll help you if you want me to," he volunteered.

"All right, but don't say anything to the men. But mustn't you watch the engine?"

"Not every minute. I can sit on the steps and go over every now and then. What do you want me to do first?"

"Empty that pot of potatoes and those beans into the slop for the hogs. Then you can peel some more. Is there any sweet corn and do you think the men would care for it?"

"I think they would and your father has some mighty nice this year."

"Then go and get some," Melissa ordered, and Sylvester did, after which he helped her peel the potatoes. They sat in the cool shade of the porch as they worked.

"Say, Melissy, I thought you forgot how to do those things. To get up a feed for a bunch o' eaters like we are here, hain't such an easy matter."

Melissa smiled. "I haven't forgotten, and I'd like to do it always."

Then their conversation drifted to old times, but not one word did they mention of the time when both had thought the other the one person in the world.

"How do you like living in the city, Melissa?" asked Sylvester at length. "But I guess you like it all right, and say do you know when I saw you on the road this morning, I didn't no more guess you was our Melissy. I thought you was a stranger altogether."

"Is that so? Well, anyone can look like a city girl if she's got a little taste and knows how to buy things. My clothes look as if they cost a lot. But they didn't simply because I've learned how to wear inexpensive things. When you're a stenographer you've got to look nifty or you soon lose your place."

"How's Mr. Vreeland who you're engaged to?"

"Oh, he's all right!"

"I s'pose he's a pretty swell sort of a fellow, hain't he?"

"I suppose people around here would think so, because he's nice looking and wears fashionable clothes. But he's just a clerk making about eighteen dollars a week, though like most of those office men, he tries to play big. He seems to like me pretty well. It got the other girls in the office furious to know that we became engaged," and Melissa's brow clouded a little. "Look," she said, suddenly, changing the subject, "I guess the men want you. You'd better go."

Sylvester did.

He did not have a chance to get to the house again, until Melissa called that dinner was ready. The men came, not very enthusiastically, for they had seen Mrs. Winters depart for town and knew what sort of dinner to expect.

How surprised they were when they were invited to sit down to a meal consisting of potatoes both mashed and creamed, to a roast that, rehabilitated under Melissa's hands and garnished with an onion sauce, proved most tempting, to sweet-corn boiled in milk, to a combination salad, to pickles of various sorts, to iced tea and stacks of freshly made cake. The men ate with a will, and when finished cheered their hostess.

"You'll make a fine farmer's wife, little gal," was the comment on all sides, and this was highest praise.

Sylvester had helped Melissa serve the dinner, so now when the others were finished, Melissa cleared off a portion of table and set plates for two.

As Sylvester ate, he thought of Vreeland and what a lucky chap he was. But then it was men of his type that appealed to girls like Melissa. They didn't care for big, awkward fellows like himself.

Still, as Melissa was an old friend, he presumed upon that friendship, though rather timidly.

"Melissa," he began, "do you s'pose Mr. Vreeland'd care if I took you to the doings in town while you're here? I'd love to do it, if you're sure he wouldn't mind."

"I'll be very glad to go with you, Sylv," she answered, "and I'm sure Mr. Vreeland wouldn't care."

"Then as soon as we're through with the silo, you be ready and we'll go. I'll have to change my clothes but you can come over to the house and visit with maw while I do it. Will you?"

"Yes. How soon shall you be through?"

"About four or five o'clock."

"Then I'll have supper ready for us, and we'll go."

Sylvester was delighted, and with glowing eyes he left the house.

At five o'clock the work was done, and Sylvester came to the house with Mr. Winters. A tempting supper was laid out, and Melissa did the honors, dressed in her smart city togs.

The supper over, she did up the dishes, Sylvester helping, and soon they were on their way to the Ream farm. Leaving Melissa with his mother, Sylvester hurried up-stairs and changed his clothes for his Sunday best, then descending he joined Melissa and they started for town.

The revels were at their height. The shows were open, the "bally-hooers" were shouting. The "free shows" flourished. Those camp-followers of street-fairs, the balloon men, the popcorn men, the "cheap John" and all the rest were there, crying their wares.

Sylvester felt under a little restraint, and afraid to suggest doing any of the things the young people were indulging lest Melissa might think it childish. She, with her years in the city, what would she care for all this?

But Melissa did. And it cheered his heart when she asked him to buy her some confetti and serpentines which she tossed at friends and townspeople. And every suggestion that he made, she heartily acquiesced in until Sylvester threw restraint to the winds, bought peanuts and popcorn and cracker-jack and lemonade, and patronized the shows and movies. And never once did Melissa exhibit any sophisticated airs, but enjoyed it all with an artlessness that delighted yet pained Sylvester.

He could not forget that she was engaged, and with her at his side, he realized how much he loved her and that she was as dear and unspoiled now as before she went away.

It was growing late, and the crowds on the street began to thin out. Soon the shows began to close up and buggies, wagons and automobiles, loaded with tired but happy country folk were leaving town.

Many offered Sylvester and Melissa a lift.

"I don't want to ride," Melissa said. "I want to walk home under this glorious harvest moon. I was a little disappointed this morning when I came home, and almost wished I hadn't. But I've so enjoyed the whole day, every bit of it.

"Dear old town! I suppose to some it may seem a pokey old place, but you don't know how often I've longed for it and the old farm."

"Do you really like living on the farm better than working in the city?" Sylvester asked. They had reached the end of Main street and were turning off into the road that led home, flooded with moonlight.

"Yes, I do. I hate the city and I hate the thought of going back. I've pretended all the time I liked it. But I don't. I've got enough of it. I used to long to go and when pa married Mrs. Mumpers I thought that a good excuse to get away. And though I'm going back to the city, I hate the thought. It's everybody for himself there, and the airs people put on. They try to make you think heaven alone knows what they are, and at the same time they're living on crackers and milk to keep themselves alive so they can buy the clothes they sport, and half the time they are bought on the installment plan! Here nobody puts on; and it feels so good to be natural again. Here, where everybody knows I'm just Melissa Winters."

She threw out her arms wide and inhaled the sweet night air.

Sylvester stood silent, feeling awkward, but unable utterly to speak a word. He was amazed that Melissa should speak so, especially when she was engaged to Vreeland.

At last he spoke, a little uncertainly:

"Well, I s'pose you'll get used to living in the city after you get married and have a home of your own."

The girl turned to him.

"Sylvester, I'm a country girl, and I want to be one always. I used to think it would be a fine thing to live in the city and then come back here all dressed up in city clothes, and with a handsome husband, pretend we were real rich. It didn't make any difference whether we were or not, just so long people thought we were. I didn't care particularly for Mr. Vreeland though he is a nice enough young fellow as city boys go. But he was good-looking and knew how to wear smart clothes so I accepted him, for I thought we could lord it over people here. But as I thought about it, I saw there was no sense to my silly dreams—marry and live in the city to come to the country and pretend something we were not! I simply couldn't live such an artificial life. It may be all right for those who like it, but the very thought of it haunted me. I couldn't bear to think of living in four small rooms for the rest of my life. I want the sunlight and God's free air and lots of room. I want the birds, and the trees and the flowers and God's great outside. I've broken my engagement with Mr. Vreeland, and I told him why. I guess he didn't care much either. You know," and she turned almost shamefacedly to Sylvester, "I've almost determined that if I can get work as a hired girl with people around here, I'll never go back to the city. I was more lonely in the city than I ever was in the country. It's all right if you've been born there because then you make your friends there and all that. But when you go there without knowing anybody, well, there's

This Department is conducted solely for the use of COMFORT sisters, whereby they may give expression to their ideas relative to the home and home surroundings, and to all matters pertaining to themselves and families; as well as opening a way for personal correspondence between each other.

Our object is to extend a helping hand to COMFORT subscribers; to become coworkers with all who seek friendship, encouragement, sympathy or assistance through the interchange of ideas.

Any abuse of this privilege, such as inviting correspondence for the purpose of offering an article for sale, or undertaking to charge a sum of money for ideas, recipes or information mentioned in any letter appearing in this department, if reported, will result in the offender being denied the use of these columns.

Do not ask us to publish letters requesting money contributions or donations of any sort. Much as we sympathize with the suffering and unfortunate, it is impossible to do this as we would be flooded with similar requests.

Do not request souvenir postals unless you have complied with the conditions which entitles you to such a notice. See postal request notice in another column.

We cordially invite mothers and daughters of all ages to write to COMFORT Sisters' Corner. Every letter will be carefully read and considered, and then the most helpful ones chosen for publication, whether the writer be an old or new subscriber.

Please write only on one side of the paper, and recipes on a separate sheet.

Always give your correct and full name and address, very plainly written; otherwise your letter will receive no attention.

Address all letters for this department to MRS. WHEELER WILKINSON, CARE COMFORT, AUGUSTA, MAINE.

ONE of the sisters suggests that we have a column on "How I Helped My Husband," and, personally, I think it would be very interesting and helpful to all. We cannot offer a prize for the best letter, as many magazines do, but judging from the general trend of the letters received each month, the sisters are not writing for material motives but just as woman to woman and mother to mother in a spirit of helpfulness. When we put our corner on a dollar-and-cents basis it seems it must lose much of its spontaneous good fellowship, and we don't want that to happen, do we? And don't be too modest and unassuming in your opinion of yourself. There are times when a reasonable amount of self-appreciation is a good thing.—Ed.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

I want advice about my new little bungalow I am about to have built. Maybe you or some of the sisters can help me. There are to be five rooms, dining-room, parlor, two bedrooms and extension kitchen. It must be one story only, with no stairs or hall. My plot is thirty-nine by eighty feet. I also want a small garage at the rear. For a time I expect to go back to the old-fashioned way of living; that is, giving up gas, using a washtub to bathe in and use a pump for water in the kitchen. I want to build the house as reasonably as possible. What material shall I use? How are the ready-made houses? Do any of the sisters have them? My husband wants to build the house himself but he built one for a friend and it took such a long time, as he has only a day or two each week for the work.

Mrs. Wilkinson, I wish we might have a column like some of the other papers have, called "How I helped my husband," and some of the papers have discussions on household economics, telling how to make the most of different salaries. It is a lesson for young folks. I learned a lesson from a wealthy woman who is very old now but who once had nothing. I told her I could not save although my husband got from thirty to sixty-five dollars a week. I had a bad habit of buying furniture on the installment plan. This woman took me in hand and made me pay a deposit on a plot of real estate. When the month came around I always seemed to have the money to pay. Because I had to. This year finishes my payments of five hundred and fifty dollars. The place is at Northport, L. I., and is now all built up. My place is now double in value. I have started in on another place and still keep on paying the same installments. My new place is in the city. This place was almost unknown and now the subway is going through the neighborhood and the station will be one block away. Also an Improvement Company has decided to run a ferryboat from Brooklyn to Rockaway, just about ten minutes' walk from my place. This will shorten the trip to beautiful Rockaway. I am paying six dollars a month for the place I am to build on. I am telling you all this because I learned how to save and I am glad. I've been told I'm very lucky in real estate, as I know people who would not even look at the places I took and they were surprised when they heard how they had increased in value, and they knew more about the business than I ever did. There's an old saying, "Where angels fear, fools dare to tread." I suppose that's what I did.

When the roof of my little coop is on I'll move right in. It won't have to be finished inside before I get there. I want to stop paying rent. I am telling you all this to show how I help my husband. I also make all my own clothes and I think every woman should know how to do this.

Sisters and Mrs. Wilkinson, have you a hobby? I have several. One is this: I love old silver and the blacker the better. I have quite a collection, from friends who wanted to throw it out because they "hated the sight of it," or because it "belonged to Noah's Ark," and still I love it all the more. My husband calls my silverware "the orphans." If any of the sisters have some "orphans" or heirlooms they want to dispose of, I'll adopt them. I might be able to exchange some articles of value for them.

I hope I will hear some advice about the house and also about the garden. I want to know the best all year plants and would like to have the sisters send me flower seeds. Also tell me what trees grow the fastest, as I must have trees planted around my house. Sincerely, MRS. M. MENDEL.

COLORADO.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

I am an interested reader of the sisters' letters and after reading a letter signed "A Happy Wife and Mother" I cannot refrain giving some of my ideas in regard to the subject discussed—birth control. This lady writes she thinks a knowledge of birth control will send more souls to hell than whiskey will.

I do not know how she understands the subject but it seems to me to understand it rightly we should look beyond our own household and take in all classes of people and all the conditions surrounding them. I am sure the advocates of birth control do not believe or teach that murdering their unborn infants is the way to control the number in their families. On the contrary, they teach that if they would learn to control these things it would do away with this crime, now so widely practised, though secretly, but we cannot deny truth even if it is hidden. God may send the poor little souls but does not God give to man reason that he may be somewhat above the animals? Surely God expects his human creatures to exercise reason and self control in the exercise of their power. As it is now, babies are an accident mostly, instead of a desire, held sacred in the parents' breast. No one would come to this life crippled in mind or body because of not being wanted if this crime of accident birth could be abolished.

Think of the countless mothers who are in the depths of the most miserable poverty being forced to bring forth little wailing babies to die of neglect and lack of nourishment, or grow to be put in the mills and factories where they are murdered by inches for the profit of a few.

There are many sides to this question that I cannot even touch upon as my letter is too long now so will close, with best wishes to all. I am also a Happy wife and mother, M. C. H.

Comfort Sisters' Recipes

NO man would think of running his business without some system of account keeping. Keeping house is a business proposition, or should be, but rarely do we meet a housewife who runs her household on a plan that will balance income and expenditure and show systematically how the money has been spent, saved or wasted. She should have a blank book, each page having thirty-one lines and each line numbered with the day of the month. Each page should be ruled so to show space for food, rent, clothing, incidentals, etc., and into these spaces put the amount expended daily. Unless one has a particularly good memory it is well to enter these items in a small account book at the time the purchase is made. The above arrangement will have to be varied to suit individual needs but by all means work out some kind of a system.

CANNED VEGETABLE SOUP.—Scald, peel and mash one peck of ripe tomatoes. Run two heads of cabbage, one dozen medium-sized carrots, one bunch parsley and one half peck onions through food chopper. Mince three stalks of celery. Boil one dozen ears of corn and scrape from cobs. Mix all together and add salt and water if too dry. Boil until carrots are done, which will be about one hour. Seal in jars while hot. The good, rich soup next winter will more than repay you for your trouble.

MISS H. BURMESTER, Philadelphia, Pa.

SWEET TOMATO PICKLE.—One peck green tomatoes, and one half peck onions, slice and cover with one cup salt. Let soak over night. In morning, drain, put in kettle and cover with vinegar, then add four pounds brown sugar, one quarter pound mixed spice, in bag, and cook all until soft. Put in jars while hot.

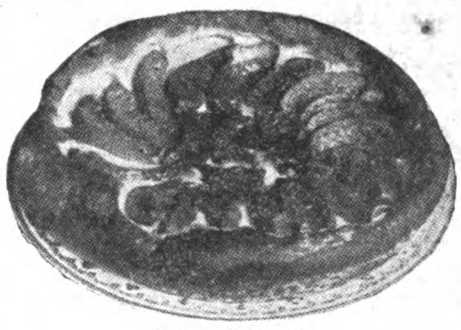
MRS. WALTER E. JACKSON, 27 Harvard St., Dorchester Center, Mass.

RIPE TOMATO SWEET PICKLE.—Four pounds tomatoes, two pounds sugar, one pint vinegar, and a handful of cloves. Place the tomatoes, sugar and cloves in a stone jar or crock; heat vinegar to boiling point and pour over them. Next morning heat all the liquid and pour over them again. The next morning place all in the preserving kettle and cook till the tomatoes appear to be almost transparent; dip them out and cook the liquid ten or fifteen minutes longer. This requires only half as much sugar as preserves.

MRS. S. C. TALCOTT, Mountain Grove, Mo.

VEAL EN CASSEROLE.—Chop cold cooked veal fine, put layer in casserole, alternating with layer of cracker crumbs, salt, pepper and butter, till dish is full. Beat up two eggs, add pint of milk; pour it over veal and crackers. Cover and place in oven till heated through, then remove cover and brown before serving. Garnish with parsley.

CREAMED CRAB MEAT.—Melt two tablespoons of butter and in it fry one tablespoon of finely chopped onion and two tablespoons of chopped green pepper, for five minutes. Add one tablespoon of flour and one cup of thin cream. Cook until thickened, then add one cup of crab meat, either fresh or canned, and seasonings. Serve on toast.



FANNIE V. TIDD, New York, N. Y.

TO MAKE TOUGH BEEFSTEAK TENDER.—A tough beefsteak can be made tender and juicy if it is allowed to stand over night in a mixture of equal parts of vinegar and salad oil. For a three pound steak put a half cup of the mixture in a crockery dish large enough to spread the meat out flat. Do this early in the evening, turning the meat so both sides will be treated. Whatever of the mixture is left in the morning can be bottled and used for the same purpose again. Do not put salt or pepper on the meat while it is in the oil and vinegar.

CHEESE STRAWS.—Three tablespoons flour, three tablespoons grated cheese, one tablespoon each butter and milk, one half teaspoon salt and one quarter teaspoon of pepper, and yolk of one egg. Mix together dry, add the milk, cut in strips and bake. These are very pretty tied with yellow ribbon for receptions or five o'clock teas.

MINNIE O. MACKINTOSH, San Diego, Cal.

PEACH SHORTCAKE.—Four tablespoons each of lard and butter chilled, then chopped into two and one half cups of flour. Add half a teaspoon of salt and four even teaspoons of baking powder, and mix in one and one quarter cup of milk. Do not knead, but flour hands and divide dough and put into two buttered round tins. Bake in a hot oven twelve minutes. Split cakes by breaking open with a fork—do not cut—and butter generously. Peal and cut peaches in eighths and cover with sugar, letting stand one hour. Put peaches between and on top of cake and pour the juice over top. Canned peaches can be used, but are not nearly as nice as fresh fruit. This makes two cakes.

BAKED MACARONI WITH CHEESE.—Three quarters cup macaroni, broken in pieces, two cups boiling water, one tablespoon salt, two tablespoons flour, two tablespoons butter, one half cup grated cheese, one and one half cups scalded milk, one half cup buttered bread crumbs. Cook the macaroni in the boiling water for twenty minutes; drain and blanch with cold water. Make a white sauce of the butter, flour and milk. Add seasoning to the sauce. Arrange a layer of cooked macaroni in the bottom of a buttered baking dish; sprinkle with the grated cheese, repeat till all the macaroni and cheese are used; pour over the white sauce, cover the top with buttered crumbs and bake for twenty minutes in a hot oven, or long enough to give the top a nice brown.

ESCALLOPED POTATOES.—Peel raw potatoes and cut them into thin slices. Place a layer of the potatoes in a well-buttered baking dish, cover with a layer of thinly sliced onions, then a layer of thinly sliced bacon. Sprinkle with salt and pepper and repeat till dish is filled, having a layer of potatoes on top. Dot with butter and pour over all enough sweet milk to come within one third of top. Bake in moderate oven till potatoes are done.

JELLIED CHICKEN.—Skin and remove all the fat from chicken. Cut at the joints, and arrange in a stew pan that can be closely covered. Add salt and a little pepper. Pour over boiling water until about two thirds way to top and cook very slowly until the bones can be removed. Carefully skim out the chicken. To one quart of boiling liquor, add two tablespoons of gelatine that has soaked in one half cup of cold water fifteen minutes. Season to taste with salt, pepper, a little onion and lemon juice, and celery salt. Pour a little into a mould, set on ice until it will hold up a layer of the chicken; cover chicken with more jelly, and so on until all is used. Serve cold.

FRIED BEETS.—Wash, peel and slice as you would potatoes. Put fat in spider and pepper and salt and fry brown.

STUFFED CABBAGE.—Carefully separate one head of cabbage without breaking the leaves and soak in cold water till crisp. Grind fine two pounds of pork, add a cup and a half of cracker crumbs, two eggs, salt and pepper, and a little minced onion, if liked. Mold into a ball and cover with the leaves to resemble the whole cabbage. Wrap in thin muslin and boil two hours. Remove the cloth and lay in center of platter and garnish with mashed potato and small onions.

FANNIE V. TIDD, New York, N. Y.

SAUSAGES COOKED IN BATTER.—Four tablespoons of flour, one pint of milk, one egg. Beat well together, pour boiling water over one pound of sausage and pull off the skins. Place in baking dish, pour the batter over them and bake till brown on top.

HAMBURG WITH RICE.—Wash one cup of rice and put it into a kettle, add one onion cut fine, one teaspoon salt and one pound Hamburg steak, six cups of boiling water. Let it cook slowly, uncovered, and stir so it will not burn. It will take about one and one half hours of slow cooking. Then when water has almost cooked away cover and set it on back of range where it will keep hot and finish cooking by its own steam.

COLD WATER BUNS.—Two cups of sponge, one cup of cold water, one cup of sugar, one cup of lard, a little salt and enough flour to make stiff dough, like bread. Work down six times during day and make into small biscuits at night. Let rise all night and bake fifteen minutes next morning. Iowa.

GRAHAM GEMS.—Beat one half cup sugar with two thirds tablespoons shortening; add one beaten egg, one cup sour milk, with one teaspoon soda dissolved in it; stir in one cup graham and one cup white flour and one half teaspoon salt. Bake in hot oven.

MISS AGNES TRAVISS, Platte, S. Dak.

TO USE BREAD OR BISCUIT THAT HAVE BECOME DRY.—Beat three eggs, add enough sugar to sweeten and flour to make thin batter. Beat well. Slice cold bread and dip in batter and fry in hot lard till brown. This will be found a great saving if one has a lot of cold or slightly stale bread.

O. S., Snowball, Ark.

MARSHMALLOW TEA CAKES.—One cup sugar, two thirds cup lard, beaten yolks of three eggs; to this add two thirds teaspoon soda dissolved in one half cup buttermilk, then one teaspoon baking powder, pinch of salt and enough flour to roll out.

COCOANUT LAYER CAKE.—Six eggs, two and one half cups sugar, one cup butter, one cup sweet milk, two teaspoons baking powder, two teaspoons lemon flavoring and enough flour to make a soft batter. Bake in layers and fill with cocoanut filling.

FILLING.—One cup brown sugar, one cup white sugar and one cup water; boil this till it spins a thread, add twenty pieces of marshmallow, beaten whites of three eggs and one half teaspoon vanilla. This recipe makes about thirty doubled tea cakes.

Subscriber, Ringgold, Ga.

DELICIOUS BISCUIT.—One quart flour, one half teaspoon soda, two teaspoons baking powder, one teaspoon salt and lard size of apple, medium size. Make biscuits with hands as rolling dough packs it.

COCOANUT FILLING.—Whites of three eggs, sugar enough to make it easy to spread; grind cocoanut in food chopper, pour cocoanut milk in to make it moist; spread icing on and sprinkle cocoanut between layers and on sides. Keep in a tight box with some kind of fruit and it will remain moist.

MRS. MELVIN LONG, Roxboro, N. C.

APPLE SAUCE CAKE.—One and one half cups unsweetened apple sauce, cold, two cups sugar, one teaspoon soda (dissolved in apple sauce), butter size of walnut, one teaspoon cinnamon, nutmeg and cloves, and one quarter cup cocoa, and two cups flour. This cake is cheap but good.

MRS. C. B. BURLINGAME, Cayuta, N. Y.

RAISIN CAKE.—Two cups brown sugar, three quarters cup of butter and lard mixed, three eggs, though two may be used, one cup sour milk, very sour, two teaspoons soda in milk, one teaspoon each cinnamon, cloves, allspice and ginger, one cup chopped raisins and flour to make batter. Put raisins in before flour is added. Bake in three layers.

CARRIE GOSSMAN, Jenera, Ohio.

Conservation and the prevention of waste is the order of the day. Stale bread accumulates in every home, and every crumb should be utilized. The following recipe makes a real wartime, though delicious dessert, and it occurred to me that many of our readers would be glad to know it.

LEMON PIE WITH BREAD CRUMBS.—One and one half cups soft bread crumbs, three tablespoons butter, one cup boiling water, one cup sugar, one and one half teaspoons corn-starch, two egg yolks, three tablespoons Sunkist lemon juice, grated rind one Sunkist lemon. Break bread crumbs in small pieces; add butter, pour boiling water over, and let them stand until soft. Mix sugar and corn-starch, add egg yolks, well-beaten, and lemon juice and rind. Combine mixtures; bake in one crust and cover with meringue.

MISS MARGARET HALL, Pasadena, Cal.

PUMPKIN PIE.—Stew pumpkin, cut into small pieces, in a little water, and when soft mash with potato masher very fine; let the water dry away, watching closely to prevent burning or scorching. For each pie take two well-beaten eggs, two thirds cup sugar, two large tablespoons, heaping full, of pumpkin, half pint of rich milk (a little cream will improve it) a little butter and salt. Stir well together and season with a pinch of cinnamon, nutmeg or ginger; bake with undercrust in a hot oven. Too much spice makes the pies too dark. We like the yellow pies better.

MRS. P. S. HENDRY, Loxley, Ala.

SQUASH PIE.—After cutting the squash into small pieces, boil until tender, drain well, and put through a strainer. To every cup of the squash add one cup of sugar, four eggs well beaten, two and one half cups of milk, one teaspoon of vanilla, and salt to taste. One cupful of squash will make a fair-sized pie. Mix the ingredients thoroughly. Pour into the pie shell, and bake slowly until the filling has set.—Ed.

SWEET POTATO PIE.—To five well-beaten eggs add one pound of sugar, already rubbed into a pound of butter; mix with two cups cold sweet potato, which has been rubbed through a sieve; add a teaspoon of lemon juice, beat well and season to taste with nutmeg and cinnamon; add milk enough to make a rather thick batter and bake in pie tins. Meringue may be added if preferred.

MRS. A. R. SMITH, Afton, Okla.

PEAR CREAM.—This is an excellent dessert that is suitable for an emergency, as it is quickly prepared. To make it drain the juice from a quart of canned or preserved pears and mash them very fine. Whip one cup of rich cream very stiff with one half cup of sugar and one teaspoon of vanilla. Stir in the pears and whip all together. Set in a very cool place and serve in sherbet glasses.

MISS ESTELLA FRAVER, Hammondsport, N. Y.

PEACH BAVARIAN CREAM.—Two tablespoons of gelatine soaked in half a cup of cold water ten minutes and dissolved in half a cup of boiling water. Stir together two cups of mashed peaches and one half cup of sugar and add to gelatine. Set into pan of ice water and stir until the mixture begins to thicken then lightly beat in one pint of whipped cream. Line edge of mould with half peaches, pour over the Bavarian and set to harden. When ready to serve, turn out on serving dish and pour over sweetened whipped cream flavored with a little grated orange or lemon rind.

POTATO PIE.—Peel and grate one large white potato, add the juice and rind of one lemon, the beaten white of one egg, one cup white sugar, and one cup cold water. Pour this into an under crust and bake. When done, have ready the beaten whites of three eggs, half cup powdered sugar, flavored with lemon and pour on the pie and return to oven to harden.

Food Administrator Hoover Appeals to the Women of America to Help Win the War and Save the World from Famine by Strict Economy of Food

This is what the Food Administration is asking of you. Is it too much?

The wise and careful use of Wheat

Meat

Butter fat

Milk

The use of other fats for butter in cooking:

The use of other cereals for part of the wheat in bread:

The use of other meats, such as game and fish, or the use of eggs and cheese, to reduce the demand for beef, pork and mutton, should be advocated.

The larger use of fruits and vegetables should be featured.

The proper nourishment of every member of your family is your first duty. The substitution of the foods that are plenty for the foods that are scarce or especially needed for export does not imply any cutting down in the ration of nourishing foods.

Waste must be eliminated.

Perishable foods locally grown, must be consumed more freely.

The "Gospel of the clean plate" must be preached.

MR. HOOVER'S appeal to the women of America is in line with the efforts which COMFORT, from the time our country entered the war, has been making to impress its readers with the necessity of larger production, better economy and more extensive conservation of food as vitally essential to our successful prosecution of the war.

Along with our preaching we have done some teaching. While urging conservation by canning we have explained how to do it, and by our series of special articles on cooking we have tried to show how to practise thrift without parsimony in the kitchen through the better handling of raw material and left-overs and the elimination of waste.

COMFORT subscribers, as we know them, belong to that 70 per cent which, as Mr. Hoover says, conduct their households with thrift. Aside from the sense of patriotic duty, the prevailing high prices are sufficient incentive for the thrifty to practise strict economy. Unlike the idle, self-indulgent, spendthrift class, they need no preaching but are keen to be shown how to obtain the best economic results with the least degree of sacrifice—economy in its highest sense.

In the art of cooking is the secret of food economy, and therefore the U. S. Department of Agriculture is issuing a series of war cooking recipes which can be had free. Write to Washington and ask to have them sent to your address. Below we print a few selections from them. The illustrations are our own.

Uncle Sam's Daily Thrift Thought

Monday

A pleasing variation from pastry meat pies may be had by preparing eggplant and meat pie, says the United States Department of Agriculture.

EGGPLANT AND MEAT PIE.—Cook together in a baking pan alternate layers of eggplant and chopped cooked meat salted to taste. If raw meat only is available it may be fried until brown before baking. Tomato juice or pulp, or a few sliced tomatoes may be added if desired.

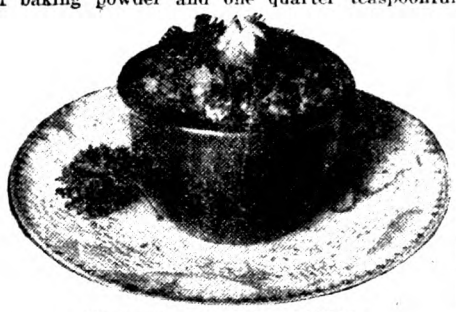
Tuesday

Don't throw away stale bread and left-over skim-milk, Madam Housewife. From them you can make that simple and well-known but nourishing dish, milk toast, the United States Department of Agriculture points out. This makes a good dish for breakfast, luncheon, or supper, especially for children.

MILK TOAST.—Heat the milk. Add a small quantity of butter and season to taste with salt. Pour while hot over well-toasted stale bread and serve.



Wednesday

Spread the Meat Flavor

Spread the meat flavor over other foods and so economize on the quantity of meat consumed, says the United States Department of Agriculture. Here is one way to spread the flavor.

MEAT STEW WITH DUMPLINGS.—Make a stew from a cheap cut of meat cut into small pieces, potatoes, and such other vegetables as are desired. Thicken with a little flour diluted with cold water. Serve with dumplings made as follows:

Mix and sift one cup of flour, two teaspoonfuls of baking powder and one quarter teaspoonful of salt. Work in with the fingers one teaspoonful of butter; add gradually one third of a cup of milk or a little more if needed. Roll out one half inch thick and cut with a biscuit cutter or in square pieces. The dumplings may be steamed, baked like biscuits, or cooked with the stew. In the latter case remove enough liquid to permit the dough to be placed on the meat and vegetables.

My Countrywomen:

I ask your help.

The President has laid upon me and has asked me to assume great responsibility in the conservation of the food supplies of our country. It would be an unbearable burden but for two reasons:

One is I am sure every loyal American will at this time undertake unhesitatingly and whole-heartedly whatever service is requested of him.

The other reason is—the American woman. I believe you have only to understand the food needs of this nation, of the Allies, and in fact of the entire world, in order to enlist your immediate and intelligent support.

I realize full well that 70 per cent of our households are conducted with thrift and without waste, but even in these we need to secure the use of equally good food in substitution for those commodities which are so concentrated a character that they can be shipped over the seas in these times of short shipping.

Among the 30 per cent, it is true enough that we have deserved the reputation of the most wasteful housekeeping in the world, and the time has come to turn our faces squarely in the opposite direction and make our country a model throughout, of economical management.

Indeed, if our American ideal of a square deal is right, we can do no less.

For three years now the people of the Allied countries have borne the burden of this struggle for life and liberty, and are bearing it with pain and privation. There are millions of women in Belgium and Northern France today who for three years have heard no word of their husbands, their sons or their brothers, who go about their daily tasks provided with the most meager allowance of food for their children, with a smile on their lips.

It is for women such as these, for soldiers gallant beyond description, for little children of Europe, that you now face the immediate duty of taking up arms as it were in your households. You are a great army drafted by conscience into what is now the most urgent activity of the war—that of increasing and conserving the food supply.

Conditions which have brought about a world shortage of food have placed upon the shoulders of you, the women of America, to a great degree, the responsibility of winning this war, for the wolf is at the door of all the world except our own country, and we have a superabundance.

We are not alone appealing to the women; we are actively organizing so far as possible without legislation, the men in trades, hotels, restaurants, and in food distribution, hoping not only to eliminate waste but to moderate the burden of speculation and extortionate profits.

It stands to reason that your first duty is to the members of your family. They must have all the food they require to keep them in good health and capable of performing efficiently their daily tasks. Information for your guidance as to the food needs of the average family will be put in the hands of every earnest woman in America.

In confidence I turn to you so to conduct your affairs, and so to influence the activities of your community, that we may largely pay for the war as we go along out of our savings in food and in human production.

With deep gratitude for the earnest support already given me, I am,

Faithfully yours,

Herbert Hoover

FRENCH TOAST.—Here is a way suggested by the United States Department of Agriculture to utilize stale bread and left-over milk:

Beat up together one egg, one cup of skim or whole milk and salt to taste. Place a small quantity of butter, bacon fat or other suitable fat in a broad-bottom frying pan. Dip slices of stale bread into the egg and milk mixture until they are thoroughly moist and fry on both sides until a golden brown. Serve hot with or without syrup.

Thursday

MEAT AND BREAD-CRUMB CAKES.—Here is one way to utilize left-over meat by spreading its flavor. To four parts of chopped or ground meat, add one part soaked bread-crumbs, a small quantity of chopped onion, and salt and pepper to taste. Mix and form into small round cakes. Brown the cakes in butter or other fat, turning them.

Raw ground meat may be used. If so the pan should be covered so that greater heat will be applied.

Friday

Making Greens Nutritious

Here is a way to add nutriment to greens, and at the same time to vary the form in which this important food is served. The suggestion is made by the United States Department of Agriculture.

CHEESE AND GREENS ROLL.—Cook two quarts of spinach, Swiss chard or other greens. Drain and dress with one tablespoonful of butter. Chop and add one cupful of grated cheese and bread crumbs enough to make a mixture sufficiently stiff to form into a roll. Place in oblong pan and cook in moderate oven for twenty minutes. When cold the mixture may be sliced in one half inch pieces and served on lettuce leaves with salad dressing. If desired leave the mixture more moist and bake in casserole or baking dish and serve hot.

Saturday

MOCK DUCK.—Here is a suggestion for making a delicious dish from an inexpensive steak.

On a round steak cut thin, place a stuffing of bread crumbs well seasoned with chopped onions, butter or other fat, salt, pepper and flavorings such as sage, celery seed, etc., if desired. Roll the steak around the stuffing and tie in several places with a string. If the steak is tough steam or stew the roll until tender before roasting in the oven. If desired, the roll may be cooked in a casserole, in which case a cupful or more of water should be added.

MEAT TURNOVERS.—Here is one way to utilize left-over meat by spreading its flavor.

Chop the meat. If the quantity on hand is small, mix with it left-over potato or rice. Season with salt, pepper, onion, etc. Place filling on circular pieces of biscuit dough about the size of a saucer. Fold over the dough and crimp edges together. Bake for about one half hour in a hot oven.

A brown sauce made from two tablespoonfuls of flour browned in two tablespoonfuls of butter to which a cupful of water or stock and a half teaspoonful of salt is added, may be served over the turnovers.

Use Every Drop of Milk

Don't throw away left-over skim-milk. It is a nutritious food and every drop of it should be used. One way to utilize it to make milk-vegetable soups.

MILK-VEGETABLE SOUPS.—To each two cupfuls of milk use one tablespoonful of flour, one tablespoonful of butter, two thirds of a cupful of a thoroughly cooked vegetable, finely chopped, mashed or put through a sieve, and salt to taste. Thicken the milk with the flour as for milk gravy and add the other ingredients.

Practically any vegetable except tomatoes may be used with the other ingredients as stated. If tomatoes are used a little soda should be added to them to prevent the milk from curdling.

PEANUT SOUP.—A delicious and nourishing soup may be made from skim-milk and peanut butter as follows, says the U. S. Department of Agriculture:

Heat one pint of milk until lukewarm. Add two rounded tablespoonfuls of peanut butter mixed to a smooth paste with a little of the milk. Salt to taste. Thicken with one teaspoonful of butter or savory fat mixed with one tablespoonful of flour. Bring almost to the boiling point and serve.

KANSAS CITY, 3230 Flora Ave., Mo.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

I read COMFORT several years when I was at home and, since leaving there, have subscribed for it myself.

I have lived in the city three years, am a stenographer and enjoy my work very much. I have never seen a letter from Kansas City. Most of them are from the country, telling of the joys of farm life. I wonder if the city sisters are too busy in this great rush, to sit down and visit a bit with these fine COMFORT sisters and dear Mrs. Wilkinson?

Kansas City is an industrious and growing city. A fine place in which to live if one has God as their protector but a poor place for a young person without this fortification against temptations that daily arise. I am a member of one of the Baptist churches here, teach a Sunday School class of twelve-year-old girls and am a worker in the Baptist Young People's Union. I enjoy the work very much. We young folks hold meetings at a Mission among the poorer people, support a missionary in China and are engaged in a good work. It certainly makes one see the deeper side of life.

I have been interested in the discussion as to whether country or city children are more innocent. In all schools, in both city and country, there are children ready to unfold the sacred secrets of nature in the most rude and coarse manner, just as it has been unfolded to them. Rather, just as they have found it out as it is rarely unfolded to them. I think, after all, that one's parents have more to do with the development of one's character than their school associations. While they do receive wrong impressions upon first entering school, as they grow older, the home influence will have more weight with them than those early impressions. For this reason a mother should realize what a sacred thing it is to bring a soul into this world and undertake the forming of that one's character. Although I have never met a man that I could love and may never be a wife and mother, I do think that motherhood is the greatest height that God has allowed a woman to attain.

I do not think a mother is entirely responsible for what her child grows up to be but, after she has made the home a shelter from the sins and temptations of the world, by living close to God, and has done all in her power, by intelligent study to give to the world a Christian young man or woman, with a depth of character to meet and conquer the bad things that come to ruin our lives, she need have little fear as to the final outcome. I have a dear mother and father living on the farm and I am always glad to get off for a few days and go back to them and the old home. They visit me here, too, which makes it pleasant for all of us.

I taught school, in the country, and I had but very few children in my care who were evil minded. I do not think that the things a child sees on the farm, which were intended by nature, are so harmful to him as the sins of the small towns and cities. Most country children have enough to employ their minds and time, and are not in daily contact with all classes as are many town children. Mothers may be careful but the little ones who have only the street for their playground, hear coarse jests and remarks of which mother never knows.

Now you will see that, although I live in the city and like it very much, I really think the country child has many advantages over the city child. They generally develop a deeper character, one that will withstand greater temptations, on account of having been associated with nature instead of things artificial. They, most always, are healthy and robust and can come to the city and adopt city ways much quicker than the city folks can learn of the country. A green country boy is amusing in the city but not nearly so amusing as a green city chap in the country.

I will close by describing myself. I am twenty-two years old, have brown eyes and dark brown hair, five feet six inches tall and in the best of health. If any of the sisters ever come to Kansas City would be glad to show them around or help them in any way I can. I would like to hear from some of the sisters on ranches and from different parts of the West.

With best wishes to Mrs. Wilkinson and COMFORT sisters, I am, Your COMFORT sister, ETTA BAKER.

NEW YORK, N. Y.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

I thank you all for your kind letters which were forwarded to me. I tried to answer all, but it was impossible as I had so little time. You ask who I am. I am "Lonesome in the Heart of the City," whose letter appeared in COMFORT a few months ago. I thank each and every one for the aid they offered which I cannot now accept as for the last four months I have been in a hospital where I am training. There is nothing like helping those really in need, for those in ill health are the really poor, I think. As for myself, I am getting stronger every day and am quite a different person from the lonesome, homesick and motherless girl who wrote the other letter to COMFORT. I am always cheerful now. Duty, sweet duty, has taught me to overcome everything, even the loss of mother for when I see how some of the old ladies here suffer with the same disease she had, I thank God she is spared that much. I can realize now what she suffered.

All of my patients like me and some of them even think that the older nurses cannot handle and take care of them as well as I can.

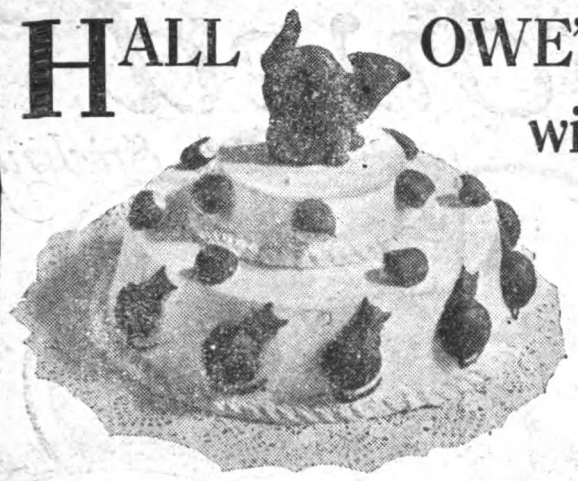
It has cost me a lot though for my people think that a nurse has a very poor moral sense, but I saw my work and I did not hesitate to take it up, for a person can really enjoy doing work which suits them.

God bless you all, NURSE BUSSMAN.

Nurse Bussman. Your letter brings to mind a remark I once heard—to the effect that there were no really lazy people in the world but just people who didn't like their work because they were not fitted for it and it did not appeal to them, and if they could once find work they liked they would be the most industrious people in the world. Sort of a square-peg-in-a-round-hole idea and it's rather a comforting one to me. Here's wishing you success.—Ed.

LAVACA, ARK.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:



I have been waiting for some one to write about their favorite books and authors, since Mrs. Wilkinson invited us to discuss the subject, but no one has taken any interest in the subject. There are so many people who cannot be coaxed to read a book or newspaper; some few because they can't and more because they won't. People think they are too poor to buy books but will spend twice as much money on clothes and food as they ought to. Don't waste your spare time gazing off into space but grab a worth-while book, magazine or paper and get some brain food. You may even have a college education, but that is just a foundation and you still need to read and think in order to keep informed on current events and discoveries in science.

I plan to have my subscriptions to my papers and then the renewal price doesn't seem as great as when they all come at once.

I will tell you some of the books I have read and enjoyed. "Daniel Deronda," by George Eliot, "Lady of

HALLOWE'EN PARTY with MYSTIC RITES and WEIRD CHARMS

By Ella Gordon

Copyright, 1917, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

MISS OCTOBER, dressed as a witch, ushers in Hallowe'en, on the last night of her stay, October 31st, when the vigil of the feast of All Saints is celebrated in merrymaking and divination of the future. The popular superstitions attached to Hallowe'en give license for narrating any weird stories of supernatural lore; for singing folk songs that reflect old superstitions; for indulging in quaint customs and mystic tricks, and people have been known to "ride the goat" at these entertainments.

If you would have your Hallowe'en party a success, spare no pains in making your setting weird and spooky; a barn or attic offers ideal advantages to this end.

Decorate with bunches of cornstalks, behind which are lighted lanterns with globes covered with red or yellow tissue paper. Use branches of any green trees available, and festoon with garlands of green, having pendants of carrots. Use numerous Jack-o-lanterns with horns made from ears of corn, and smiling with a display of large uneven teeth. Put a lighted candle in each, and these and the lighted lanterns will furnish the only light. Another effective decoration is made by putting a lamp in the center of a table, and about it arrange vegetables and fruits so the light will shine through, but the lamp remains unseen.

The invitation carries a request of secrecy, and that a mask and hood must cover the entire head, and the form be draped in white, black, yellow or red. The guests assemble in a nearly dark room, and when all is ready, three groans, the first deep, the second weaker and the last just a sound are given, and the way is lead to the decorated room. The guests will pass in grand march, endeavoring to identify each other, and the one making the largest number of correct guesses receives a black cat, either alive or stuffed, or made of cake or chocolate, as a prize. Masks are now removed and the fun begins.

Hallowe'en Rites and Mysteries

Make a mound of flour on a large platter, using just water enough to hold it together. Somewhere in the mound conceal a ring. Each guest takes a turn at cutting a slice from the mound, and the one who finds the ring will be the first to marry, but must pay for that good fortune by taking the ring from the flour with his or her teeth.

Hide a penny, a thimble and a ring in the room. The one who finds the penny will be wealthy; the thimble promises single blessedness, and the ring a hasty marriage.

Have a tub nearly filled with water on a table, and in it several small apples floating. The ones who can catch an apple with the teeth receives a prize.

Have a woman who can disguise her voice, enter the room masked and dressed in gaudy short skirt, a red waist with huge sash and wearing numerous strings of buttons around the neck. She must tell the fortunes of those present by reading the palm, and with some preparation this feature may be very amusing. Give the palmist a list of the guests' names a few days in advance, that she may inform herself of their past and present circumstances and therefrom predict their futures.

Have the guests seat themselves in a circle on the floor, cross-legged. If before a fireplace so much the better. Have some one start a weird story, stopping short at the most exciting point, and the one next to him go on with the story, each one trying to outdo the other.

Popping corn, roasting apples and toasting marshmallows on long sticks, make appropriate refreshments.

Let the hostess be dressed as a witch, representing Miss October as pictured in "The Kingdom of Our Birthright." The skirt, cape and pointed hat are red, and the hair is powdered white. The broom is ma of crisp brown wrapping paper cut in strips to make it rustle, and suspended on a wire is a cat cut from pasteboard and painted black.

The Cat and Chestnuts Cake

There is an old fable about the cat that tried to pull the chestnuts from the fire, and as both cats and nuts are intimately associated with Hallowe'en, the fable was appropriately taken as a theme for the Hallowe'en cake illustrated in the above heading. Of course it is a "fortune" cake, containing wee trinkets such as coins, thimbles, rings, and other prophetic emblems. It is made in two tiers, two cakes of different sizes having been put together, one above the other, and the icing (pale yellow) applied over all. Around the sides of the lower cake are small cats made by applying chocolate peppermints to form the bodies, and small chocolate wafers for the heads, the ears and tails being drawn with chocolate icing. On the apex of the cake is placed a hump-backed black cat with wide open mouth and staring eyes, such as can be bought in any candy store at this season, or might be made at home, and the remaining space is decorated with candy chestnuts. These may be bought at almost any confectioner's, or can be made at home of chocolate fondant tipped with white fondant.

DEAR EDITOR:

My advice to the lady who wrote about adopting a child would be to do so by all means and get one as young as possible for I think you will love it more the younger it is when adopted. I am sure no parents could love their own any more than we love our Gladys, whose picture appeared in the January, 1913 COMFORT. She was a year and a half old at the time the picture was taken but was only three weeks old when we took her. She will be seven years old the 11th of next March. I am sending her picture hoping it will be printed. She is a very bright child, smart in her studies and everyone seems to like her. We are very proud of her. I think every couple who have no children of their own should take one, or more, of these little unfortunates to care for, for there are many that need homes and many homes that need children. They are such a blessing. If Gladys goes away to spend the day the place seems so lonely without her and the first thing husband says when he comes home is, "Where's baby?" Some may say it is too much responsibility to raise a child. It certainly is, but someone has to do it and perhaps some one not as well able to care for it as you are. I say that any couple that can care for themselves can care for one little orphan child and their love will repay you tenfold.

COMFORT sister and reader, MRS. PEARL LACKEY.

Mrs. Lackey. It is very good of you to share your little girl with us. I've often wondered about her, ever since you sent us the other picture. Our best wishes to her, and her parents.—Ed.

PATERSON, N. J.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

I am a city girl, twenty-four years old, and want to ask the sisters if they can help me find a home in the country. At present I am working in a silk mill and as my health isn't so very good I would like to leave the factory and get out in the country, so if anyone knows of a place on a farm (perhaps with some lonesome old couple) where I could have a good home and could work for my living, I would be very grateful if you would let me know. I am a home loving girl, of good character and come from a respectable family. Send letters to Mrs. Wilkinson. MISS E. V. O.

COLORADO.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I wish to sympathize with Mrs. G. W. B. E. A little over a year ago I married a man I did not love and while he is a good, trustworthy man and provides me with all I need and is good to me, I am not happy in the fullest sense of the word. I am twenty years of age and my husband is ten years older. I would like to ask the COMFORT sisters' advice as to whether it would not be wise for me to go away for a while, till I can know if I care enough for my husband to live the remainder of my life with him. Somehow I feel as though somewhere in this world the man I will love is going to meet me. What should I do if that should ever happen? I married because I needed a home and my health was broken down considerably from overwork. I had no parents, so I simply closed my eyes and made the plunge. I knew I was doing wrong when the minister performed the ceremony and tears came to my eyes and he looked so accusingly at me. I have nothing to say against my husband for he took me and gave me a good home. He has one fault, however, that worries me and that is his lack of education. He was not able to go to school very much and as a consequence his grammar is very poor, as is his spelling. Doubtless I am wrong when I let this worry me. I feel as though I have thrown my life away. What would you do?

Mother of Three, by all means have your children's adenoids and tonsils removed. It is a simple operation and I have cared for many cases in the hospital where I trained as a nurse. The adenoids and tonsils are a decided detriment to your children's health. Not only that but a child's intellectual faculties are not so good as when they are removed. It will be worth the money spent to have it done.

Just a word about hospitals. I believe it is just as economical in case of sickness to go to a hospital and it is much safer. In case of dangerous complications, aid can be given immediately and there are so many modern conveniences at hand that render first aid more efficient. In the home everything would need to be improvised. If possible, have a private nurse for there will be many little things to be done that will require a good deal of the general nurse's time. A general duty nurse has all she can attend to and is often in such a rush that a patient hesitates to ask her to do the many little things that patients always want. Be courteous to the nurses for they are human as well as anybody.

Sincerely, MRS. V. M.

V. M. Of course it is best to keep our nasty dispositions under cover, but I feel it my duty (did you ever notice how people get around something unpleasant by calling it their "duty") to say that if anyone has thrown their life away, you, certainly, are not the one. Many women would appreciate such a man as you have; however, so long as you haven't met that belated true love of yours, why don't you try loving your husband until you do. What do the sisters think about it? Really V. M., I'm not so disagreeable as I sound and can understand how you feel about it, only won't you try and look at the matter in a different light for you will be much happier. Maybe you are just tired and nervous now. Don't try to look ahead the remainder of your life. You know you can live only one day at a time, so make the most of each day.—Ed.

A great aid to food economy

Royal Baking Powder saves eggs in baking

In nearly all recipes eggs may be reduced in number and often left out altogether by adding Royal Baking Powder, about a teaspoon, in place of each egg omitted. The following recipes are practical examples.

These recipes also conserve flour as urged by the Government.

Corn Meal Griddle Cakes

1½ cups corn meal — 1 teaspoon salt
⅔ cup flour — 1 tablespoon shortening
¾ cup milk — NO EGGS — 1 tablespoon molasses
1½ cups boiling water — 4 teaspoons Royal Baking Powder

Scald corn meal in bowl with boiling water; add milk, melted shortening and molasses; add flour, salt and baking powder which have been sifted together; mix well. Bake on hot greased griddle until brown.

(The old method called for 2 eggs)

Corn Bread

1¼ cups corn meal — 1 tablespoon sugar (if desired)
¾ cup flour — NO EGGS — 1 teaspoon salt
4 teaspoons Royal Baking Powder — 1½ cups milk
2 tablespoons shortening

Sift the dry ingredients into bowl; add milk and melted shortening; beat well and pour into well greased pan or muffin tins. Bake in hot oven about 25 minutes.

(The old method called for 2 eggs)

Equally satisfactory results in saving eggs may be obtained by using Dr. Price's Cream Baking Powder, also made from Cream of Tartar, and now manufactured by this Company.

"55 Ways to Save Eggs," a new booklet mailed free. Address Royal Baking Powder Co., 130 William Street, New York.

Cream of Tartar, the chief ingredient of Royal Baking Powder, is of pure fruit origin, derived from grapes, and has no substitute for making a baking powder of the highest quality.

The Girl He Loved

by Adelaide Stirling

"Tell me my Nel," he said softly; "do you love me ever so little?"

The Umbrella, indeed!

With a curious lingering touch, Lady Annesley pushed her to the glass.

My ring!" she cried wildly.

CHAPTER I.

SWEETHEARTS.

"THOMAS, my son!"

The voice came darkly from the scullery window, and Sir Thomas Annesley gave a guilty start where he knelt in the kitchen garden.

"Oh! it's you!" he cried with relief. "I thought it might be her ladyship, and I didn't want her."

He hastily covered in a small grave he was making in the parsley-bed, and his sister poked her bronze head from the open window with some curiosity.

"What are you doing?" she inquired.

"Oh, nothing! Just putting away something. There is nothing like a hole in the ground. What on earth are you doing in the scullery?" eying the unwonted smartness of as much of Miss Ravenel Annesley's toilet as was visible. "What have you got on your Sunday frock for? Have you been blacking the family boots in it?"

"If it's anything to eat you've buried, the cats will dig it up again!" loftily ignoring his question, except for a guilty glance at her lilac muslin gown.

"No cat"—calmly—"will dig this up, for I'm going to do it myself first! Come out, why don't you?"

"I'm coming." Miss Annesley vaulted nimbly from the window with much display of her only pair of black silk stockings. "You don't see her ladyship anywhere, do you, Tommy? Because I've an—an errand in the quarry, and I don't want her to sniff it out."

"She can't sniff a quarter of a mile"—comfortably. "She's gone down to sit by the lake without any hat; said she had neuralgia. But I know she's gone to bleach her golden hair."

"She does bleach her hair," Ravenel remarked thoughtfully. "It was the most awful color yesterday—a sort of green! I heard her giving it to the Umbrella for making a mistake."

Sir Thomas Annesley lit a contraband cigarette.

"And yet," he said blandly, "it was not the Umbrella who changed the bottle! Her ladyship kicked Mr. Jacobs, and any one who kicks my dog has misfortunes. I'll walk over to the quarry with you!" affably.

"No, Tommy dear!" with guilty haste. "I—I don't require you."

Sir Thomas coughed.

"Don't blame me then if her ladyship sends the old Umbrella all over the country for you when you're missed. I'll have to kill that maid some day! Do you know, she listens at the door when we're alone?"

"Much good she'll get!" contemptuously, marching on under the blossoming apple-trees with the sun flecking the lovely bronze of her hair with red gold. "Look here, Tommy, you come as far as the hedge, and just give a cooee if you see the Umbrella or her ladyship."

"Can't. I'm going over to the barracks to see Gordon."

"I wouldn't! It would be"—she was not looking at him—"a waste of time."

"Oh!" Sir Thomas winked vulgarly, as he observed a lovely carnation grow and deepen in his sister's cheeks. "I see. Well, go on, my dear! I don't blame you; only," in hasty addition as they reached the hedge, "keep your eye peeled. The Umbrella is active, and also far-sighted. I don't recommend the quarry myself; it is too like being a mouse in a bowl. Give me a wood for such undertakings! And mind you're back by dinner, for if her ladyship sees you sneaking in with your Sunday blouse on she'll put two and two together. Meantime, I've gone over to the barracks to see Gordon. You mind that when you come home!"

"You're a duck, Thomas, some day I'll reward you," returned the vision in mauve muslin, disappearing with some pains through the white-thorn hedge.

But Sir Thomas only grunted. He approved of his sister's adorer because Lady Annesley did not, but he privately considered that meeting a handsome, penniless hussar was wasting time.

"However, Mr. Jacobs," he observed, as that disreputable bull-terrier joined him, "anything for business, and we're growing old. And it is my belief that my lady wants to marry Ravenel to that old Lord Levallion, and I'll see her blowed first."

He sat down on the bank at the foot of the hedge and pulled his hat over his eyes. They were worldly wise eyes for a boy of sixteen; but to have Lady Annesley for a stepmother was a liberal education. Old Sir Thomas had married her in haste, and, fortunately for himself, had died too soon to have time to repent at leisure. He was poor: his new wife had been supposed to be rich; but her fortune turned out to be about as real as her complexion—there was just enough of it to swear by. Annesley Chase was mortgaged too deeply for the widow's small income even to pay the interest; when young Sir Thomas came of age it would be foreclosed and sold over his head, unless money came from the skies. And yet Lady Annesley, even while she sat and saw the interest piling up against her, had no idea of letting Annesley Chase go. A snug old age in the dower-house appearing to her more inviting than spending her declining years in a semidetached villa, she was even now taking steps to secure it by the simple scheme of a rich marriage for Ravenel, and later and harder, for Sir Thomas. In the meantime, she provided the stepchildren, who were her only stock in trade, with bread and butter. Thin bread and thinner butter, perhaps; but still she fed them. And they hated her cordially—Ravenel from having seen her father's last days made wretched; Tommy from a far-sighted distrust that grew on him every day.

But Ravenel just now had no thoughts for her stepmother, nor of how she was improving the long hours of the May afternoon. Over the short grass of the field above the quarry pits she was walking with the air of one having an infinity of time and no particular destination. Her heart might be galloping before her, but it was not good for captains of hussar regiments to know it. She sailed on demurely under the shade of an ivory-white parasol—it was one of Lady Annesley's, and her stepdaughter hoped devoutly there would not be a hue and cry for it while it was out—as if she had not a care in the world. Yet a sharp color came to her clear cheeks as she neared the quarry pit.

Suppose he had not come!

The thought made her feel chilly in the warm May sunshine. For one breathless moment she was afraid to lift her eyes from the short grass lest she might look in vain for Adrian Gordon. And so nearly walked over him where he lay stretched on the warm, green sod at the edge of the quarry.

Miss Annesley dropped her pirated parasol.

"Oh!" she cried, as he sprang to his feet. "I nearly walked over you."

"Tread lightly then, for my heart is under your feet," quoted the man, with a little laugh of pure pleasure. He took both her hands and looked down into her gray-blue eyes.

"I began to think, Miss Annesley," he remarked gravely, "that you were not coming. Another ten minutes and I should have walked up to your hall door and paid a polite visit," his strong, fine hands holding hers with utter content.

The girl looked up at him where he stood bareheaded, the sun on his close-cropped, fair hair. How tanned and strong and good to look at he was! And how sweet his gray eyes and his mouth under his fair mustache.

He caught her hands a little closer.

"You see," he said: "you were just saved having to receive me under her ladyship's nose. I would have braved even her tea rather than have gone back without seeing you." He stooped to pick up her parasol, and she drew her hands from his left one that held them both.

"It wouldn't have been any good your coming in state," she returned calmly. "You would only have had 'not at home' said to you. Her ladyship is engaged today in renovating her charms."

"I should have met you at the door if I'd started when I first thought of it! Would you have sent me away?" seating himself beside her in the shade of a flower-filled thorn-tree on the sharp slope down to the quarry. "I believe you would!" rather dashed.

"I should not, for an excellent reason. I didn't come by the front door, but out of the scullery window," gaily. "Her ladyship supposes I'm darning table-cloths. I've left Tommy down by the hedge to warn me if my flight is discovered."

The laughter left Captain Gordon's handsome eyes. He laid his brown hand on Ravenel's white one.

"Tell me, my Nel," he said softly: "do you love me, ever so little?"

"No!" very low. "Ever so little!" Did she not love him with all her soul and body, as she loved no one else in God's world?

"How much do you love me? That much?" measuring off a tiny space with her two hands, for he had them both now, and Lady Annesley's lace parasol had rolled where it would down the quarry.

"Not at all?"

"Not at all," but she barely whispered it.

"Do you mean that, Nel?" he was whispering, too. "Because I love you—oh, you know how I love you!" he let her hands go. "Tell me, quick, do you mean it?"

Miss Annesley made no answer, only raised her eyes to his for the briefest instant. But it was long enough for Adrian Gordon.

"Sweetheart," he said, and kissed her. "Nel, look at me: won't you kiss me?"

"I—I don't know." But she did look at him, and, somehow, without either of their wills, their lips met. And at that long, gentle touch of the man's lips on hers Ravenel Annesley gave her heart and her soul to his keeping, forever.

"My sweet," he said, letting her go, "do you know, I've no right to ask you to marry me? I've no money."

"Neither have I," gaily. "Would you like to be off your bargain?"

"Don't say it!" quickly. "It hurts too much. But money I must and will have to marry you. I mean the girl of my heart to have all she wants in this world—gowns and horses and happiness. It would kill me to see you as I've seen the wives of lots of poor men. Can you wait for me, sweet, for two years, while I go out to India?"

"India! What for?" the color left her face.

"Well! I've a second cousin, who has some influence. He's not a man I like much, but he surprised me the other day by telling me that a friend of his out in India would offer me an appointment on his staff—he's a general—if it were certain I'd accept. I—I said I would. It's more than three times the pay I'm getting now and a chance in a thousand to get on in the service. I'd have to leave my regiment, but I'd do that—for you."

"Adrian—not now!" she whispered. "We're so happy." Her heart fairly turned over at the thought of Annesley Chase without Adrian Gordon quartered ten miles off, of the long, empty summer days.

"We'll be as happy again," he answered wistfully, "and the sooner I go the sooner I'll be back. But I wouldn't go at all if I saw any other way. I'm afraid to leave you with your stepmother."

"She can't marry me out offhand to a slug or a snail, and those are the only visitors we ever have. My charms"—dryly—"have doubtless not yet been noised abroad."

"I believe you wish they had been!" quite as dryly. "You're a bundle of vanity, Miss Annesley, and I believe you've got a temper—and you're proud——" he paused eloquently.

"Go on," returned his charmer calmly. "Don't mind me! And when you're done I'll tell you what I am—quite good enough for you!"

Her eyes met his with sweet insolence, fearless for all their softness, and the man's face changed.

"You're too good, that's one thing," he said slowly. "And for another, you're too proud. I know you! If anything went wrong between us, and it was my fault, you'd never give me a chance to explain."

Ravenel looked at him, as he sat beside her, with the May sun full on his face, that was meant to be fair, but was turned a clear-pale-bronze by wind and weather; full on his tawny, gold mustache, and the clear-cut lines of his cheek and chin. Strong and cold and proud that face was, till you looked at the man's eyes or saw him smile. But now he was not smiling and a quick pang caught at the girl's heart. Adrian Gordon to talk of pride!

She flung out both her hands to him, as she had never done before.

"Listen!" she cried passionately. "It's you who are proud; not I! Offend me, and I will give you all the chances on earth to explain; but you—oh, I don't believe you would ever forgive anything."

Her eyes, that had been so gay, so full of sweet mockery, were brimming with tears, and Gordon caught her to him jealously.

"There will never anything come between us," he said as he kissed her, "not between the girl I love and me!"

CHAPTER II.

THE PERSON IN BLACK.

Behind a rock, not two yards from Captain Gordon's flat young back, something stirred—stirring so faintly that even a thrush in its nest in the hawthorn bush did not hear it. Perhaps the sour-faced person in black who knelt on the grass, ostensibly digging dandelions for a complexion salad, had been there for a long time; or, perhaps, it had not been hard to evade the sentry on the hedge and bring up in good ear-shot of the two people who were blind and deaf to everything but themselves.

"Heaps of things can come between us," Ravenel was retorting dolefully. "Lady Annesley can. And Tommy says the Umbrella—that beast of a maid of hers—tells her everything we do."

The person in black bridled angrily behind her rock. She had come from curiosity; she would stay now for spite. The Umbrella, indeed!

Gordon laughed.

"Why do you call her that?"

"Oh, because she's a framework of bones with limp black silk over them—just like an umbrella shut up! But she's a vicious wretch, too, and I hate her."

The unseen listener's eyes narrowed in her flat face.

"Well, never mind her; she can't worry us!" hastily. "This is the only thing that matters just now. My cousin wired for General Carmichael that I'd accept his offer, and—got an answer. Nel, I must go in a week!"

"Well?" She did not look at him.

"Well, I'm going!" his handsome face drawn and hard. "But I won't leave you like this. I want you to marry me before I go."

"But you couldn't take me with you?" a wild hope made her voice shake.

"No! But I could send for you, or come when I could get leave and carry you off. Look here, my heart," with gentle strength, "if I must go I want to leave my wife behind me. Then I shall know nothing can ever come between us."

"Oh," her cheek reddened, "I can't marry you! How could I?" though the very thought of being Adrian's wife made life heaven.

"There's Tommy."

Gordon smiled.

"Is that all? Only Tommy! When I come back for you we'll take Tommy, too; will that do? Or, do you think you'll find me an insufferable husband? Tell me. Why don't you look at me, sweetheart?"

"Because I don't want to," returned Miss Annesley, with scarlet cheeks and a truthful tongue.

"Say you'll marry me!" he demanded. "Say yes—unless you don't love me."

Very deliberately she looked at him, saw the love and truth in his eyes, the strength and beauty of his face, that was pale with earnestness.

"Yes," she whispered, so that he could hardly hear; but he knew without hearing—and the silent woman behind the rock knew, too, and strained her ears.

"Then will you do this?" said Gordon. "The curate at Effingham went to school with me. He'll marry us if I get a special license. All you'll have to do is to walk over to Effingham—which is really your parish church, though you don't go there—with me, and be married. No one will know, unless you like to tell Tommy. And I'll bring you straight home from the church door. But you'll belong to me, and I can defy her ladyship or any one else to make trouble between us. Will you do that?"

She nodded, her face like a crimson flower.

"Yes, Adrian," he prompted: but she spoke with a sudden flash of her spirit.

"Your wife or no one else's in the world!" she cried, "unless—you change your mind and throw me over."

Gordon caught her up like a child.

"Oh, you silly, silly!" he cried. "I'll not give you a chance to be any one else's wife; don't flatter yourself. But I've no right to so sweet a thing as you. What you ought to do is refuse me and marry my cousin."

"I don't even know his name."

"That's a trifle. He has money enough to buy this country and not know it."

"He hasn't money enough to buy me!" with a quick flash of her eyes. "Oh!" with sudden remembrance of the world about her, "I must go! Look how long the shadows are."

"Wait—just one second! I've something for you," he was feeling in his pocket. "I meant it to be diamonds, but they say these things—though of course it's nonsense—less then light if things go wrong with—any one you care for!"

He drew out a velvet case, and there shone into Ravenel Annesley's eyes the green fire of a half-hoop of emeralds, curiously set in a kind of mosaic of small diamonds and opals. The thing was wonderful in a queer, barbaric way as it blazed in the sun. The girl who looked at it stood speechless.

"Don't you like it?" his face falling, for he had searched London for a ring unlike any others.

"I—I love it! But——" she stopped with dismay.

Opals—every one knew what luck opals brought. And emeralds all the world over meant "forsaken."

"Opals aren't lucky," she said hastily, and left the green stones out of the question; "but this is too beautiful to bring bad luck. And I suppose it's all nonsense really! Adrian, do you know, I never had a ring in my life?" shaking from her the senseless dread she felt of this one.

"You're going to have two now. This today and another next week," he was slipping the fiery-green wonder on her third finger. "'Till death do us part,'" he quoted softly. "That belongs to the next ring but I can say it with this one."

"Death or Lady Annesley!" sharply her eyes full of quick tears. "She hates me, Adrian, and she dosen't like you."

"It can't hurt either of us, Nel!" with the little backward jerk of his head the girl loved.

"Why do you never call me Ravenel?" she said irrelevantly, for there was no sense in wasting good time talking about her ladyship.

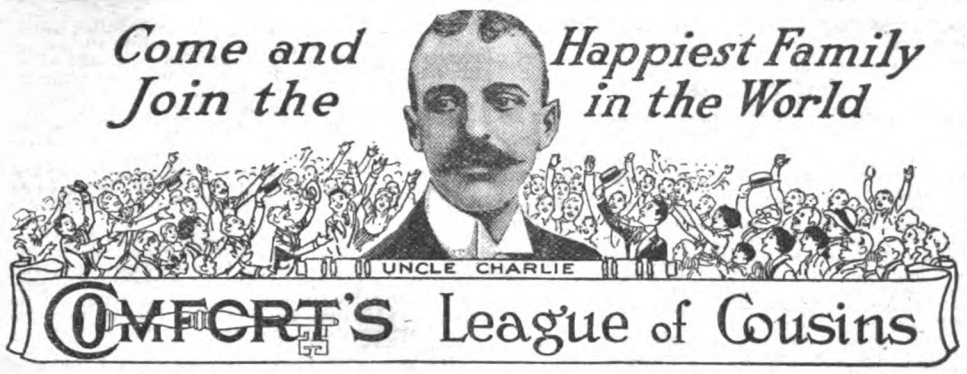
"Not like you!" promptly. "Means some one quite different. Mind you, never let any one call you Nel till I come back again," with a sudden curious jealousy.

"No one will want to," dolefully. "Oh! Adrian; do you really mean to go next week?"

"I must," his face grew dark, hard-bitten; for it was like dying to leave her. "And the worst of it is I'll be so busy. I'll have to go to London to get my kit, and say a decent word to my cousin, and sit through a farewell dinner at mess—that'll be about as lively as a funeral!—the night before I leave, when I shall be mad to be with you. But we'll have one day together if everything goes undone. And you'll go with me to Effingham, Miss Annesley, and come back Nel Gordon!"

But she sat pale and quiet.

"It seems so mad, so impossible!" she said at last, as if it were wrung from her. "And I believe my stepmother would kill me if she found out."



"That's about the only thing she couldn't do," shortly. "Do you think I won't take care of her claws for you? Look here, besides, the day we go to Effingham there'll be the duchess' garden-party. I'll manage to get there. If I can't, I'll send you a note to say what day I am coming to take you to Effingham. After that, sweet, we can laugh at her ladyship."

"You'll be gone! We won't be able to laugh at anything!" forlornly.

"You'll be my wife," something flashed into his eyes that boded no good to any one that dared lift a finger against Adrian Gordon's dearest. "I'll be able to write to you and you to me. Some day I'll come and carry you off, no matter what Lady Annesley may be pleased to say. The only thing is," a sudden pity in the masterful protecting hand on hers, "it's a pretty poor match for you, my Nel. And a doleful wedding in an empty church to a man who can't even keep you is a selfish bit of work—it makes me feel a beast! You ought, you know, to marry a lord—with a choral service, and two bishops, and a church full of fine people to make it all proper," his voice was jesting, but his eyes were sad enough, and he held her hand as if he never could let it go.

"Don't talk like that!" she cried sharply. "It makes me feel as if some one were walking over my grave. What have I got to do with lords and bishops at my wedding? I'd be miserable. I'd——" she could not go on. What made her see, as if in a vision, a strange church, filled

MANY of our readers write me complaining bitterly of the disloyalty of socialists and the socialist press. Seventeen socialist publications have been denied the use of the mails, and others are in line to get the axe. You need not get very excited about what you see in the pro-German, anti-American, so-called "socialist" press right now, for that press is not interested in socialism. All it is interested in at present is promoting anarchy, hate, disorder, and rebellion, blatantly rooting for our common enemy Prussia, deriding and discrediting every action of our government and its policies, and slurring and reviling our allies and trying by every means in its power to continue to fool and mislead the gullible dupes, who eagerly gulp down this insidious poison, so that the pennies by which these peace-for-profit fanatics and traitors live, may continue to flow in. The socialist party, which is a party no longer, has degenerated into a narrow, bigoted, traitorous, alien sect, largely composed of German nationalists, Jewish anarchists, economic paranoiacs, Marxian mannikins and soulless materialists, is hopelessly in the hands of an element that is bitterly anti-American, anti-Christian, anti-everything except anti-Kaiser. What Kaiser Billy and Germany do is all right, or at least they can always find plenty of excuses for Germany's murderous acts and piratical behavior. The socialists of all the warring nations have rallied to the support of their governments. The German socialist is a German before he is a socialist, so is the Frenchman, so is the Briton, so is the Russian. In this country however, if a man wants to be an American as well as a socialist, there is nothing left for him to do but get out of his party or be thrown out, and so those socialists who love their native land in spite of its faults, the really big, worth-while men of the party, have gotten out of it and left it to a rapidly dwindling, noisy, arrogant, foreign element, whose bitter hatred of this country and its institutions, has made it ignoble and contemptible and one may also add, treasonable. But you need not take my word for this, let W. J. Ghent, a man honored and respected by all progressive thinkers and socialists the world over, tell you what he thinks about it. Writing recently to the New York Times, he says: "The socialist majority has proved disloyal to the cause of democracy and civilization. It has echoed virtually every demand of the German foreign office. Its members have taken part in activities financed by the German government. It has in effect sanctioned the employment in this country, by the German Government, of an army of spies and agents provocateurs and has ridiculed the efforts of the government to apprehend them. * * It has denounced the sale of munitions to the Allies and the efforts of our own government to prepare itself against German aggression, and thus gives its sanction to German preparedness, while obstructing preparedness at home. It has no word to say against the German declaration of war, but it has officially declared that the entry of the U. S. A. into the conflict was a crime against humanity. It is now in many devious ways obstructing the operation of the draft. Its disloyalty to the nation of which it is a part, is matched by its disloyalty to internationalism and world-wide humanity. It has uttered no word of protest against the invasion of neutral Belgium. Against the exactions of capital it has much to say, but against the frightful exactions of the German army in Belgium, it has kept studiously silent. Regarding the seizure and transportation to Germany of the machinery, rolling stock and raw material by which the Belgian workers make their living, it has said nothing. The pathetic and desperate plea of the Belgian working class to the working class of America * * * * * * was wholly ignored by the majority of the American party * * * * the unparalleled atrocities in Belgium, Serbia, Roumania and Austria, have wrung from it not even a whisper of protest. It has more or less openly justified such violations of international law as seemed to aid the German cause. The slaughter of women and children has moved it to no concern whatever * * *. It has ignored the murder of civilian workmen. Whatever this element professes to stand for and whatever it may really think it is trying to promote, the record shows it has given its support to spoliation and massacre, the perpetration of infinite cruelty and to the denial of reparation."

A. M. Simon, who has resigned from the party, writing in the New Republic recently says: "There is a blatent antagonism to religion (in the socialist party) that is also un-American. At a time when the American people are turning against the liquor traffic, the party allows itself to be dragged at the heels of the brewery and saloon forces. Socialists in legislative halls have joined hands with the worst enemies of labor in order to protect the liquor interests. The pacifist movement has also been manipulated in the pro-German direction and most socialists pose as pacifists."

Now listen to what Upton Sinclair, who is both a patriot and a socialist and famous the world over, has to say: "This war must be fought until there has been a thorough and complete democratization of the governments of Germany and Austria. Any agitation for peace that does not include this demand is pro-German agitation. If Germany be allowed to win this war, then we in America shall have to drop every other activity and devote the next twenty or thirty years to preparing for a last ditch defense of the democratic principle. I have lived in Germany and know its language and literature and the spirit and ideals of its rulers. Having given many years to a study of American capitalism, I am not apt to be blind to the defects of my own country, but in spite of these defects, I assert that the difference between the ruling classes of Germany and America is the difference between the seventeenth and the twentieth centuries. I find those with whom I have talked utterly unable to cenceive what the Prussian ruling class is. They cite its modernness, its use of science, failing to realize that this is precisely the thing that makes it dangerous—a beast with the brains of an engineer. They cite the good care it takes of its workers, failing to realize that every farmer who fattens animals for the slaughter house, does the same thing, and from the same motive.

"The Appeal to Reason, the paper to which I have been a continual contributor for sixteen years, refused to allow me to put my ideas be its readers."

The socialist press howls about the capitalist press suppressing the truth on important matters, concerning the working class. Here we catch the socialist press doing the same dirty work. By the way here is what the Appeal to Reason has to say about itself: "The Appeal firmly believes that our entire scheme of propaganda generally adopted by socialists during the last twenty years has been built on preconceived notions not applicable to conditions in the United States. We confess that we ourselves have aided and abetted * * * the infliction of these undemocratic and ineffective methods and ideas. * * * * *But we shall do so no more."

Chester M. Wright, former editor of the New York Call (Socialist) in resigning from the party has this to say: "It (the Socialist Party) has lost all color as a working class organization."

John Spargo the intellectual giant of the party, who lives at Old Bennington, Vermont, and who recently resigned from its executive committee says: "The present Socialist party is entirely out of touch with American life, and incompetent to interpret it."

Never were truer words spoken. Spargo and other progressives are organizing a new radically progressive American political party on the wreck of a discredited movement. Spargo, Russell, Upton Sinclair, Phelps Stokes and others, who though radicals, have won the respect of the American public, will engineer this party, which will probably sweep into its ranks the Farmers' Non Partizan League, Single Taxers, Progressives, Organized Labor, Woman's Party, etc. Those who have been misled and become entangled in the present traitorous, anarchistic America-hating, pro-enemy organization of alien soreheads had better get out while the getting is good.

The so-called "Socialist" party pretends to be wild with delight over the overthrow of the Czar by socialist Russia, but its members refuse absolutely to strike a blow to aid their Russian comrades in their fight to retain their hard won liberty, which will be utterly lost if Germany triumphs. That ought to be sufficient to convince even the most hopeless Henry Dubb of the real nature of this seditious bunch of rabid hypocrites, trouble fomenters, treason spreaders and peace-for-profit fakers, who are rapidly making the word socialism a stench in the nostrils of all decent, fair-minded, red-blooded American people.

The I. W. W. anarchists and fake socialists are too blinded by hate, treachery and treason to realize, or too tricky and foxy to admit that they will benefit more than anyone on earth from the sacrifice that our gallant soldier boys are making for them, and these dastardly ingrates have the brazen audacity to call our soldiers "Scabs" and "Ruffians and rowdies in uniform." That ought to make the blood in every decent American body boil with indignation. Frank Little, the I. W. W. agitator who was lynched in Butte, addressed the Governor of Arizona thus: "I don't give a damn what your country is fighting for." Later he said: "A city ordnance is simply a piece of paper that can be torn up. The same can be said of the Constitution of the United States. If the mines are taken under Federal control, we will make it so hot for the government that it will not be able to send any troops to France." People who talk treason in war time must not wonder if they meet a traitor's fate—death. I'm glad to note Union Labor realizes the menace of the I. W. W. movement and is now fighting it tooth and nail.

Charles Edward Russell, a man who is both a socialist and an American, who was sent with a message to the Russian people by our President in spite of the howls of the envious socialist Kaiser cuddlers, found that nearly all his attempts to give the Russian people a correct idea of conditions in this country were blocked by Russian socialists and anarchists, naturalized American citizens (Jews everyone of them I'll bet) who hurried to Russia to blacken this country in the eyes of the Russian people before Russell could get there. These scheming miscreants came to this country to fatten and batten on Uncle Sam's best, they make themselves utterly obnoxious in every walk in life, they spit on our flag, curse our country and its institutions, root for our common enemy, Germany, and plot against us wherever they go.

The fake socialist malcontents are whining because a parade of theirs was broken up by soldiers on Boston Common. The paraders (almost entirely foreigners) came from countries that we are going to shed our blood to make free and happy. These miserable ingrates knew we were at war on their behalf and yet they dared to carry banners bearing such sentiments as these: "Who Stole Panama, And Crushed Hayti?" "The United States Has Ordered Two Hundred Thousand Coffins." "Liberty Bonds Are A First Mortgage On Labor." What these miscreants need is a good dose of Prussian tyranny or the lash of the Cossack whip. That medicine might put them in a mood to use and not abuse the liberty and freedom which is given them, all too bountifully in this great land of ours. Let me warn you to keep your eye on the People's Peace Council, as well as on the I. W. W. pests and other pro-enemy organizations. The purpose of these pestiferous traitorous pro-enemy gangs, is to make the conduct of this war impossible and so bring about a German peace which would be only a truce, and which would give the Prussian tiger a chance to profit by the million mistakes he has made in this campaign, and to complete his bloody schemes for world domination a few years later. These organizations are determined to stab Uncle Sam in the back, while he is shedding the best blood of his noblest sons, so that all nations may have a chance to develop along lines of freedom and democracy and attain higher standards of living than have hitherto been known. Fight these enemy ingrates whenever you have a chance and ship the whole viperous bunch of reptiles back home to their ghettos and rathskellers in Europe directly the war is over, and write to your Congressman and insist that the foreign language press be suppressed immediately. We can never have a united America or any decent American citizenship while these traitorous sheets are permitted to do their dirty, treacherous work.

Now remember this you reformers and dreamers. No political party no matter how idealistic and beautiful its theories and noble its aims can ever hope to win the confidence and support of the American people unless it is genuinely American in its scope, purpose and sympathy, and ready at all times to fight and shed its blood that democracy may be safe the world over and our people, country and flag given that protection which manly men and self-respecting nations are ever ready to give to the things they love, honor, prize and cherish. We want reform and we want reformers, but we want reformers who are real Americans, patriotic citizens who are anxious to build and create not dastardly rascals whose only purpose is to tear down and destroy—to loot and revolute.

Don't forget that Uncle Charlie's four wonderful books may still be had. Start in at once to obtain them,—they cost you no money, only a very little time and effort,—and keep at it until you have the entire set. The book of Poems is beautifully bound in ribbed silk stiff covers; the Story Book is bound in two styles, the one in ribbed silk stiff covers like the Poems, the other in paper covers; the Song Book is bound only in heavy paper covers and the Picture Book in handsome stiff covers. Poems or the Story Book in ribbed silk stiff covers, either one for a club of four subscriptions; the Song Book or the Story Book in handsome paper covers or the Picture Book in pretty stiff covers for a club of only two subscriptions. These four books are a library of endless joy and merriment, the best medicine to drive away the blues and the best gifts in the world.

My picture book, too, has started a deluge of inquiries: Is Billy the Goat my daughter, is Maria her Ma? Is there an Aunt Charlie? Is the big boy in the picture book my only baby? I have had a little leaflet specially printed answering all these questions fully, and those who are interested will find the same in every copy of the four Uncle Charlie Books sent out this season.

Now for the letters.

STRASSEL, OREGON.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I am twelve years old. My brother takes the COMFORT. We have three horses and about thirty chickens. I am fond of fishing and hunting. What kind of bate is best for common trout?

Yours sincerely, ESPEY DAVIS.

Espey, I regret to say I am not an expert on piscatorial subjects. I am a fisher of men and humans generally and not of trout. I generally address Billy the Goat as "you poor fish," but he is more goat than fish. Before telling you what kind of "bate" to use that is best for common trout, you will have to tell me what "bate" is, and what particular attraction "bate" has for fish anyhow. The Goat says he thinks you mean bait. If it is bait you mean I would suggest that you get on a hook and jump in the river and make a noise like a worm; or you might make a hole in the middle of the water and sit by the side of the hole, then when the fish fall into the hole, you might jump in and pull them out by the legs. If their legs are too slippery I suggest you grab their arms, and if they don't have any arms you might grab them by the whiskers or the left big toe. You might also sit on the bottom of the river bed and when the fish go to bed and get well asleep, you could grab them by the ears and eyebrows and pull them out. You might also try drinking all the water until the river is dry. All the common trout that went into your mouth you could keep for yourself, and all the aristocratic millionaire trout you might gather up from the river bottom and send to me. I much prefer fish as an article of diet to meat. So do most people I guess when they have only got one tooth. If these suggestions fail to help you Espey, maybe some of our readers will come to your assistance.

HALE, COLO.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I am fourteen years of age and passed the eighth grade last year and want to go to high school next year. We live in the country on a large ranch of about 1,600 acres. We are about thirty-five miles from a rail road and five miles from a post-office. I have three brothers and three sisters, my oldest brother graduates from law school this year and one of my other brothers teaches school. Two of my sisters

CHAPTER XXXIII.

MR. BRYANT MEETS WITH UNEXPECTED DIFFICULTIES.

LET us now return to Edith, to ascertain how she is faring under the care of her new friends in New York.

On the morning following her arrival Mr. Bryant called at the house of his cousin, Mrs. Morrell, as he had promised, to escort our fair heroine to his office, to meet Mr. Louis Raymond, who had been so anxiously searching for her.

The gentleman had not arrived when they reached the place that was so familiar to Edith, and "Roy," as she was slyly beginning to call him, conducted her directly to his own special sanctum, and seated her in the most comfortable chair, to await the coming of the stranger.

A few moments later Mr. Raymond was ushered in, and Roy, after greeting him cordially, presented him to Edith.

It was evident from the earnestness with which he studied her face that the man had more than an ordinary interest in her; while, as he clasped her hand, he appeared to be almost overcome with emotion.

"Pardon me," he said, as he struggled for self-control, "but this meeting with you awakens memories that have proved too much for my composure. You do not resemble your mother, Miss Edith," he concluded.

"No?" the fair girl returned, flushing, and feeling half guilty for allowing him to believe that she was Mr. and Mrs. Allandale's own child.

But she had determined to let him tell his story, or at least reveal the nature of his business with her, and then be governed by circumstances regarding her own disclosures.

"If you will kindly excuse me, I will look over my mail while you are conversing with Miss Allandale," Roy remarked, thinking, with true delicacy, that the man might have some communication to make which he would not care to have a third party overhear.

Then, with a bow and a smile, he passed from the room, leaving the two alone.

"I cannot tell you how gratified I am to find you, Miss Edith," Mr. Raymond remarked, as the door closed. "I have met only disappointment of late, and, indeed, throughout most of my life, and I feared that our advertisements might not meet your eye. I was deeply pained upon returning to America, after many years spent abroad, to learn of the misfortunes of your family, while the knowledge of your mother's privations during the last two years of her life—as related to me by Mr. Bryant—has caused me more grief than I can express."

"Yes, mamma's last days were very, very sad."

"Tell me about them, please—tell me all about your father's death, and how it happened that you became so reduced financially," said Mr. Raymond.

Then the fair girl, beginning with the loss of her young brothers, related all that had occurred during the two years following, up to the time of her mother's death, while she spoke most touchingly of the patience and fortitude with which the gentle invalid had borne their struggles with poverty and hardship.

When she had concluded her story her companion remained silent for a few moments, as if to fortify himself for the revelations which he had to make; then he remarked:

"Your mother and I, Miss Edith, were 'neighbors and playmates' during our childhood—'schoolmates and friends' for long years afterward, she would have told you; but—ever since I can remember, she was the dearest object the world held for me. This affection grew with my growth until, when I was twenty-one years of age, I asked her to marry me. Her answer was like obscuring the sun at midday, for she told me that she loved another; she had met Albert Allandale, and he had won, apparently without an effort, what I had courted for many years. I could not blame her, for I was but too conscious that he was my superior, both physically and mentally, while the position he offered her was far above anything I could hope to give her at least for a long time. But it was a terrible blow to me, and I immediately left the country, feeling that I could never remain here to witness the happiness that had been denied me. During my exile I heard from them occasionally, through others, and of the ideal life they were leading; but I never once thought of returning to this country until about six months ago, when, my health suddenly failing, I felt that I would at least like to die upon my native soil. You can, perhaps, imagine the shock I experienced, upon arriving in New York, when I learned of Mr. Allandale's misfortunes and death, and also that his wife and only surviving child had been left destitute and were hiding themselves and their poverty in some remote corner, unknown to their former friends. I searched the city for you, and then, discouraged with my lack of success, I put my case into the hands of Mr. Bryant, from whom I learned of the death of your mother and your brave struggles with want and hardships; whereupon I commissioned him to spare no effort or expense to find you; hence the advertisement which, his note to me last evening told me, met your eye in a Boston paper, and brought you hither."

"What a strange, romantic story!" Edith murmured, as Mr. Raymond paused at this point; "and, although it is so very sad, it makes you seem almost like an old friend to know that you once knew and loved mamma."

"Thank you, dear child," returned the man, eagerly. "I hardly expected you to greet me thus, but it nevertheless sounds very pleasant to my unaccustomed ears. And now, having told you my story in brief, my wish is to settle upon you, for your dear mother's sake, as well as for your own, a sum that will place you above the necessity of ever laboring for your support in the future. During the last ten years I have greatly prospered in business—indeed, I have accumulated quite a handsome fortune—while, strange to say, I have not a relative in the world to inherit it. The disease which has attacked me warns me that I have not long to live; therefore I wish to arrange everything before my mind and strength fail me. One half of my property I desire to leave to a certain charitable institution in this city; the remainder is to be yours, my child, and may the blessing of an old and world-weary man go with it."

As he concluded, Edith raised her tearful eyes to find him regarding her with a look of tender earnestness that was very pathetic.

"You are very, very kind, Mr. Raymond," she responded, in tremulous tones, "and I should have been inexpressibly happy if mamma could have been benefited by your generosity; but—I feel that I have no right to receive this bequest from you."

"And why not, pray?" asked her companion.

"Because—truth compels me to tell you that I am the child of Mr. and Mrs. Allandale only by adoption."

"Can that be possible?" cried Mr. Raymond.

"Yes, sir; it hurts me to speak of it—to even think of it; but it is true," she replied.

Then she proceeded to relate the circumstances of her adoption, so far as she could do so without casting any reflections upon the unhappy young mother who had been so wronged in Rome.

"Of course, I loved papa and mamma just the same as if they had really been my own parents," she remarked, in conclusion, "for I had not a suspicion of the truth until after mamma died. I was always treated exactly as if I had been as near to them as the children who died."

"And have you no knowledge of your own parents?" Mr. Raymond inquired.

"Not the slightest. The only clews I possess are some letters in my mother's handwriting and the name Belle that she signed to them. Strange as it may seem, there is not a surname nor any reference made to the locality where she lived in her youth, to aid me in my search for her relatives."

"That seems very singular."

"It is not only that, but it is also very trying," Edith returned. "Of course, my mother is dead; my father"—this with a proud uplifting of her pretty head—"I have no desire even to look upon his face. I could never own the relationship, even should we meet; but I would like to know something about my mother's family, for, as far as I know, I have—like yourself—not a relative in the world."

"Then pray, Miss Edith, for the sake of that other Edith whom I loved, regard me, while I live, as your stanch, true friend," said Mr. Raymond earnestly. "The fact that you were the child of Edith Allandale only by adoption will make no difference in my plans for you. To all intents and purposes you were her daughter—she loved you as such—you were faithful and tender toward her until the end; therefore I shall settle the half of my property upon you for your immediate use. I beg that you will feel no delicacy in accepting this provision for your future," he interposed, appealingly, as he remarked her heightened color. "Mr. Bryant had full instructions to carry out my wishes, and the money would have been yours unconditionally, had I never been so happy as to meet you. The only favor I ask of you in return is the privilege of seeing you occasionally, to talk with you of your mother."

"You are very kind," she said, when she could command her voice sufficiently to speak. "I have no words adequate to thank you, and it will be only a delight to me to tell you anything you may wish to know about her who was so dear to us both. I could never tire of talking of mamma. More than this, I trust you will allow me to be of some comfort to you," she added, earnestly. "When you are lonely or ill I shall be glad to minister to you in any way that I may be able."

"It is very thoughtful of you, Miss Edith, to suggest anything of the kind," Louis Raymond responded, his wan face lighting with pleasure at her words, "and no doubt I shall be glad to avail myself now and then of your kindness; but we will talk of that at another time."

He arose as he concluded, and, opening the door leading into the outer office, requested Mr. Bryant to join them, when the conversation became general.

Later that same day, at Mr. Raymond's desire, the papers were drawn up that made Edith the mistress of a snug little fortune in her own right, the income from which would insure her every comfort during the remainder of her life.

The man was unwilling that the matter should be delayed, lest something should interfere to balk his plans.

When Roy took Edith back to Mrs. Morrell's he expressed his admiration and sympathy in the highest terms for the generous-hearted invalid.

"When we make a home for ourselves, darling, let us invite him to share it, and we will try to make his last days his happiest days. What do you say to the plan, sweet?" he queried, as he bent to look into the beautiful face beside him.

Edith flushed painfully at his question and hesitated to reply.

"What is it, love?" he urged, forgetting for the moment the resolve he had made earlier in the day.

"Of course, Roy, I would be glad to do anything in the world for one who was so devoted to mamma, and who, for her sake, has been so considerate for my future; but——"

"Well, what is this dreadful 'but'?" was the smiling query.

"I am afraid that you are too sanguine regarding our prospects," returned the fair girl, gravely. "I am somehow impressed that we shall meet with difficulties that you do not anticipate in the way of your happiness."

"Do not be faint-hearted, dear," said her lover, tenderly, although a shade of anxiety swept over his face as he spoke. "I am going immediately to look up that woman with whom Giulia Fiorini told you she boarded, and ascertain what evidence she can give me to sustain my theory regarding Correlli's relations with the girl."

He left Edith at Mrs. Morrell's door, and then hastened away upon his errand.

He easily found the street and number which Edith had given him, and, to his joy, the name of the woman he sought was on the door.

A portly matron, richly dressed, but with a very shrewd face, answered his ring, and greeted him with suave politeness.

"Yes, she remembered Giulia Fiorini," she remarked, in answer to his inquiry. "She was a pretty Italian girl who had run away from her own country, wasn't she? Would the gentleman kindly walk in? and she would willingly respond to any further questions he might wish to ask." Roy followed her into a handsomely furnished parlor, that was separated from another by elegant portieres, which, however, were closely drawn, thus concealing the room beyond.

"Yes," madam continued, "the girl had a child—a boy—a fine little fellow, whom she called Ino, and she did remember that a gentleman visited them occasionally—the girl's brother, cousin, or some other relation, she believed"—with a look of perplexity that would lead one to infer that such visits had been so rare she found it difficult to place the gentleman at all.

"No, she did not even know his name, and she had never heard him admit that the girl was his wife—certainly not!—nor the child call him father or papa. There had always been something mysterious about Giulia, but she had appeared to have plenty of money, and had paid her well, and thus she had not concerned herself about her private affairs."

Roy's heart grew cold and heavy within him as he listened to these suave and evasive replies to his every question.

It was evident to him that she had already received instructions what to say in the event of such a visit, and was paid liberally to carry them out.

He spent nearly an hour with her trying to make her contradict or commit herself in some way, but she never once made a mistake; her answers were very pat and to the point, and he knew no more when he arose to leave than he had known when he entered the house.

He was very heavy-hearted—indeed, a feeling of despair began to settle down upon him; for, unless he could prove that Emil Correlli had taken Giulia Fiorini to that house, and lived with her there as her husband, he felt that he had very little to hope for regarding his future with Edith.

Madam ushered him out as courteously as she had invited him in, regretting exceedingly that she could not give him all the information he desired, and hoped that the matter was not so important as to cause him any especial annoyance.

She even inquired if he knew where Giulia was at that time, remarking that she "had been invariably sweet-tempered and lady-like, and she should always feel an interest in her, in spite of a certain air of mystery that seemed to envelop her."

But the moment the door closed after her visitor madam's keen, black eyes began to glitter and a shrewd smile played about her cunning mouth.

A little gurgling laugh of triumph broke from her red lips as she returned to the parlor, when the portieres between it and the room were swept aside, and Emil Correlli himself walked into her presence.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

AN UNEXPECTED MEETING RESULTS IN A WONDERFUL DISCOVERY.

"Well done, madam! you managed to pull the wool over his eyes in very good shape," the man remarked.

"Certainly, Mr. Correlli," the woman returned, in a tone of serene satisfaction. "Only give me my price, and I am ready to make anybody believe that black is white, every time; and now I'll take that five hundred, if you please," she concluded, as she extended her fat hand for the plump fee for which she had been so zealously working.

"You shall have it—you shall have it; I will write you a check for it immediately," said Monsieur Correlli. "But—you are sure there is no one in the house who knows anything about the facts of the case?"

"Yes, I am sure; I haven't a single servant now that was with me when the girl was here."

"Have you any idea where they went after leaving you?" asked the man, with evident uneasiness.

"Lor', no; you needn't have the slightest fear of their turning up," responded his companion, with a light laugh. "That lawyer might as well try to hunt for a needle in a haymow as to seek them as witnesses against you; while as for the lodgers who were here at that time, not one of them knew anything about your affairs."

Presently, he slipped into her hand a check for five hundred dollars.

"Now, in case this matter should come to court I shall rely upon you to swear that the girl's story is false and the lawyer's charge simply a romance of his imagination," he remarked.

"You may depend on me, sir—I will not fail you," madam responded, as, with a complacent look, she neatly folded the check and deposited it in her purse.

Emil Correlli had arrived in New York very early the same morning, and, not caring to have his presence there known, he had sought a room in the house of the woman with whom Giulia had boarded for nearly two years.

Having partaken of a light breakfast, he went out again to seek the policeman to whom he had telegraphed to detain Edith.

He readily found him, when he learned all that we already know of the man's efforts to obey Correlli's orders.

"That was the girl, in spite of the lawyer's interference. You should have never let her go," he exclaimed, when the officer had described Edith and told his story.

"But I couldn't, sir—I had no authority—no warrant—and I should have got myself into trouble," the man objected, adding: "The lawyer was a shrewd one and had a high and mighty way with him that made a fellow go into his boots and fight shy of him."

Monsieur Correlli knew that the man was right, and saw that he must make the best of the situation; so, taking possession of Roy's card, and making his way directly to Broadway, he prowled about the vicinity of his office to see what he could discover.

He had not waited very long when his heart bounded as he caught sight of Edith coming down the street and escorted by a handsome, manly fellow; whose beaming face and adoring eyes plainly betrayed his secret to the jealous watcher, who gnashed his teeth in fury at the sight.

The happy, unconscious couple soon disappeared within an office building, whereupon Correlli went back to his lodgings to lay his plans for future operations.

Some hours later, while he was conversing with his landlady in her pretty parlor, he was startled to see Edith's champion of the morning mounting the steps of the house.

Like a flash he seemed to comprehend the object of his visit there; but he was puzzled to understand how it was possible for either Edith or him to know that he or Giulia had ever lived there.

A few rapid words were sufficient to reveal the situation to his landlady, to whom he promised a liberal reward if she would implicitly follow his directions.

The result we know; and, although his bribe had been a heavy one, he did not begrudge the money, since he believed he had thus securely fortified himself against all attacks from the enemy.

Later in the day he attempted to dog the young lawyer's steps, hoping thus to ferret out Edith's hiding place; but nothing satisfactory resulted, for Roy, after his hard and somewhat disappointing day, simply repaired to his club, where, after partaking of his dinner and smoking a cigar to soothe his nerves, he retired to rest.

But the next morning, feeling secure of his position, Emil Correlli boldly presented himself in his rival's office and demanded of him Edith's address.

Roy was prepared for him, for his fruitless visit to Giulia's former landlady had aroused his suspicions that Monsieur Correlli was in the city.

Therefore he had resolved neither to evade nor parley with him, but boldly defy the man, by acknowledging himself the wronged girl's champion and legal adviser.

"I cannot give you Miss Allandale's address," he quietly responded to his visitor's demand.

"Do you mean to imply that you do not know it?"

"Not at all, sir; the lady is under my protection, as my client; therefore, in her interest I refuse to reveal her place of residence," Roy coolly responded.

"But she is my wife, and I have a right to know where she is," said the would-be husband.

"Your wife?" repeated the young lawyer.

"Certainly—I claim her as such; my right to do so cannot be questioned."

"There may be a difference of opinion regarding that matter," Roy calmly rejoined.

"But we were publicly married on the twenty-fifth."

"Ah! but there are circumstances under which even such a ceremony can have no legal significance."

"But I have my certificate, and can produce plenty of witnesses to prove my statements."

"The court will decide whether your evidence is sufficient to substantiate your claim," Mr. Bryant remarked.

"The court?—will she take the matter into court?—will she dare create such a scandal?" exclaimed the man.

"I do not feel at liberty, even had I the inclination, to reveal any points in my client's case," coldly replied the young lawyer. "This much I will say, however," he added, sternly, "I shall leave nothing undone to free her from a tie that is both hateful and fraudulent."

"I warn you that you will have a battle to fight that will cost you something," snarled the baffled villain.

"That also remains to be seen, sir; but whether you or I win this battle, let me tell you, once for all, that Miss Allandale will never submit to any authority which you may imagine you have acquired over her by tricking her into this so-called marriage; she will never live one hour with you; she will never respond to your name."

Royal Bryant arose as he concluded this defiant speech, thus intimating to his visitor that he wished to put an end to the interview, for the earth that he was putting upon himself was becoming almost unbearable.

"Well," Correlli remarked as he also arose, while he revealed his white teeth in a vicious smile, "it may be in her power to carry out that resolution, but one thing is sure, she can never free herself from the fetters which she finds so galling—she can never marry any other man while I live."

"As I have twice before observed, sir, all these things remain to be seen and proved. Now, can I do anything further for you today?"

The man could not do otherwise than take the hint; besides, there was that in Roy's eye which warned him that it would not be safe for him to try him too far. So, abruptly turning upon his heel, he left the room, while the young lawyer, with tightly compressed lips and careworn brow, walked the floor in troubled thought.

After leaving his office Emil Correlli repaired to the hotel where his letters were usually sent, and found awaiting him there a telegram announcing the sudden death of his sister and requesting his immediate return to Boston.

Shocked beyond measure, and grieved to the soul by this unexpected bereavement, he dropped everything and left New York on the next eastward express.

We know all that occurred in that home where death had come unexpectedly; how, after the burial of Mrs. Goddard, Emil Correlli had suddenly found his already large fortune greatly augmented by the strange will of his sister, while the man whom she had always professed to adore was left destitute, and to shift for himself as best he could.

The day after he had turned Gerald Goddard out of his home, so to speak, the young man dismissed all his servants, closed the house, and put it into the hands of a real estate agent to be disposed of at the best advantage.

He made an effort to find Giulia and her child, with the intention of settling a comfortable income upon them, provided he could make the girl promise to return to Italy and never trouble him again.

But she had disappeared, and he could learn absolutely nothing regarding her movements; and impressed with a feeling that she would yet revenge herself upon him in some unexpected way, he finally returned to New York, determined to ferret out Edith's hiding place.

Meantime the fair girl had been very happy with her new friends, who were also growing very fond of her.

But she would not allow herself to build too much upon the hope of attaining her freedom which Roy had tried to arouse in her heart shortly after her arrival in New York.

He had, however, filed a plea to have Edith's so-called marriage set aside, and was anxiously waiting for some time to be appointed for a hearing of the case.

Edith and her new acquaintance, Mr. Raymond, were fast becoming firm friends, in spite of the suspense that was hanging over the former regarding her future.

One day Mrs. Morrell and Edith went to attend a charity exhibition that was under the supervision of a friend of the former, at her own house.

Upon their arrival they were ushered into the drawing-room, which was beautifully decorated and hung with many exquisite paintings, while some rare gems were resting conspicuously upon easels.

In one corner, and artistically draped with a beautiful scarf, Edith was startled, almost at the moment of her entrance, to see a painting that was very familiar.

It was that representing a portion of an old Roman wall, with the lovers resting in its shadow, which had attracted the attention of Mrs. Stewart on the last night of the "winter frolic" at Wyoming.

With an expression of astonishment she went forward to examine it more closely, and to assure herself that it was the original, and not a copy.

Yes, those two tiny letters, G. G., in one corner, told their own story and proved her surmise to be correct.

"How strange that it should be here!" she breathed.

She had hardly uttered the words when some one arose from behind the easel, and—she stood face to face with Gerald Goddard himself.

The girl stood white and almost paralyzed before him, and the man appeared scarcely less astonished on beholding her.

"Miss Allen!" he faltered. "I never dreamed of meeting you here!"

"Oh, pray do not tell Monsieur Correlli that you have seen me," she gasped.

"Do not be troubled—he shall learn nothing from me," said the man, reassuringly. "Correlli and I are not very good friends just now, simply because I told him that I should do all in my power to help you prove that he had no just claim upon you."

"Thank you," said Edith.

"I suppose you have heard of my—of Mrs. Goddard's death?" he remarked, after a moment of silence.

"Mrs. Goddard—dead?" exclaimed Edith.

"Yes, she died very suddenly, the second morning after you left Boston."

Edith was about to respond with some expression of regret and sympathy, when she saw him start violently, and a look of agony, that bordered on despair, leap into his eyes.

Involuntarily she turned to see what had caused it, and was both surprised and delighted to behold Mrs. Stewart—whom she supposed to be in Boston—just entering the room, and looking especially lovely in a rich black velvet costume, with a hat to match, but brightened by two or three exquisite pink roses.

At that instant a lady, to whom she had recently been introduced, laid her hand upon Edith's arm, remarking in quick, incisive tones:

"Miss Allandale, your friend, Mrs. Morrell, is beckoning you to come to her."

Again Gerald Goddard started, and so violently that he nearly knocked his picture from the easel.

He shot one quick, horrified glance at the girl.

"Miss Allandale!" he repeated, in a dazed tone, as all that the name implied forced itself upon his mind.

Another in the room had also caught the name, and turned to see who had been thus addressed.

As her glance fell upon Edith her beautiful face grew radiant.

"Oh, if it should be——" she breathed.

The next moment she had crossed the room to the girl's side.

"What did Mrs. Baldwin call you, dear?" she breathlessly inquired, regardless of etiquette, for she had not yet greeted her hostess. "Was it Miss Allandale?"

"Yes, that is my name," said Edith, flushing, but frankly meeting her look of eager inquiry.

"But you told me——" Mrs. Stewart whispered.

"Yes," interposed the young girl, "while I was in Boston I was known simply as Edith Allen—why, I will explain to you at some other time; but my real name is Edith Allandale."

The woman seemed turned to stone for a moment by this unexpected revelation, so statue-like did she become, as she also realized all that this confession embodied.

Then, as if impelled by some magnetic influence, her eyes were drawn toward the no less statue-like man standing by that never-to-be-forgotten picture on the easel.

Their gaze met, and each read in that one brief look the conviction that made one heart bound with joy, the other to sink with despair—each knew that the beautiful girl, standing so wonderingly beside that stately woman, was the child that had been born to them in the pretty Italian villa hard by the old Roman wall which Gerald Goddard had so faithfully reproduced upon canvas.

CHAPTER XXXV.

"THAT MAN MY FATHER!"

Isabel Stewart was the first to recover herself, when, gently linking her arm within Edith's, she whispered, softly:

"Come with me, dear; I would like to see you alone for a few minutes."

She led her unresistingly from the room, across the hall, to a small reception-room, when, closing the door to keep out intruders, she turned and laid both her trembling hands upon the girl's shoulders.

"Tell me," she said, looking wistfully into her wondering eyes, "are you the daughter of Albert and Edith Allandale?"

"Yes."

The Girl He Loved

with sweet people, whispering indifferently while the organ pealed, and the bride, all in white—with a heart of stone—came up the aisle on feet that would hardly carry her, since it was not Adrian Gordon who waited at the altar? There was a look on her face as she stared in front of her, wide-eyed, that made Gordon catch her to him. A prescient look, as of one who sees for a shuddering moment the curtain lifted from the future.

"What's the matter? You're not afraid?" he whispered. "I'll take care of you, my sweet; you know that! May God treat me as I treat you, my wife."

Lip to lip, soul to soul, they kissed each other. She was shaking when he let her go; afterward it was small comfort to him to remember it, nor the real terror in her voice when she spoke.

"Oh! I've stayed too late. And the ring, I daren't wear it. You mustn't come with me. She mustn't know you were here." She dragged up her neck-ribbon and put the ring on it, slipping it round her neck, inside her collar, pushing it out of sight with miserable care. And the watcher behind the rock—who was stiff and much fatigued—saw her do it.

"Rings!" she reflected, coming cautiously out as the pair vanished, and rubbing one foot that had gone to sleep, "and weddings at Effingham—we'll see!" pins and needles adding vigor to her thoughts. "Old Umbrella, indeed!" and her ladyship's confidential maid moved stiffly off in a devious direction that took her to Annesley Chase quite unobserved.

CHAPTER III.

A GIFT OF JUDAS.

"Oh!" said Ravenel Annesley to the empty schoolroom, the ill-spread breakfast-table. She stared at the small envelope that lay on her plate with a breathless, helpless joy. Since this four days past she had hoped for it in vain.

"I never thought he'd write by post!" she thought pouncing on it and inspecting every inch of it, from the London postmark to the last letter of the address. "But her ladyship couldn't have suspected it was from Adrian, or I never would have seen it! It was just that London postmark that saved me!"

She turned it over sharply with the horrid thought that perhaps she had only got it after Lady Annesley knew what was in it, for the post-bag always went to her bedroom, and her ladyship's prejudices were few. But the clean, red seal on the back of it reassured her no one had tampered with that clear-cut A. Tommy, sauntering in, whistled as he looked from his sister's face to the envelope she was tearing open.

"My Nel," she read breathlessly.

"I find I can go to the duchess' tomorrow. I was afraid I couldn't manage it. My ship sails on the 15th, so the 14th is our only day. I have arranged everything, got the license, seen the curate at Effingham, and I'll come to the back gate for you at three on the 14th, which is our only chance for Effingham, as my ship sails a day sooner than I thought. Will it be very hard for you to get away? But you'll do it, won't you? Bring Tommy if you like. It does not seem true that the next time I see you will be on our wedding-day, does it, sweetheart? I feel as though I were hurrying you brutally, but it is our only chance. Excuse pencil and haste, but I'm writing in another's man's rooms, and his ink won't work.

"Always yours—my very dearest, ADRIAN."

But Miss Annesley bestowed no attention on the pencil-scrawl or the dates written in figures, which Lady Annesley would have considered tempting Providence.

"Today is the twelfth," she thought joyfully. "I'll see him tomorrow at the duchess'. Oh, if I only had something fit to wear!"

"Look here," said Sir Thomas suddenly. "When you have done moaning over that precious letter I wish to discourse. Are you going to marry Gordon?"

"Shut up, Tommy!" she was scarlet. "Some one might hear."

"Who could?" scornfully. "The Umbrella's at her breakfast. Are you? Because, I should if I were you! It may be your only chance," significantly.

"Yes, I am!" she said defiantly, and afterward was glad she had told no more.

"But what do you mean?" for his face was sober.

"Only that somehow I think her ladyship's in mischief. She's been eying you like a cat lately. I feel afraid she may be on to you and Gordon."

"I don't care if she is." Somehow she could not tell all her wild plan to Tommy. "I'm engaged to him. Why should I care?"

"You don't now, but you will when her eye's on you," shrewdly.

"I'll soon find out. She wants me after breakfast," bestowing Adrian's note in a safe pocket. "I suppose it's about the duchess' party tomorrow. Do you know I'm to go?"

The boy nodded.

"Good old duchess!" he said disrespectfully. "Ever see her on a bicycle? She's gorgeous. You'll never be a fine woman like that unless you make her ladyship give us more to eat," dolefully.

"What do you bet—she's having sweetbreads up-stairs?"

"Don't bet," concisely. "Met them going up. I'll go up myself now, Tommy, and hear the worst."

She marched out of the untidy old schoolroom, where she and Tommy had their meals, and through the bare passages to the only luxurious room in the house. It was like going into another world, a world of scent and rose-colored hangings and mirrors, silver-topped bottles and cushions. On a sofa sat its owner and in the tempered light she was beautiful still. Yet she looked enviously at Ravenel standing in the doorway. With half her looks Sylvia Annesley would have married a duke.

"You wanted me?" Somehow Ravenel was nervous.

"Yes," pointing to a chair; about tomorrow. Have you anything to wear?"

"My Sunday frock," coloring as she remembered when she had last worn it.

Lady Annesley let a gleam of amusement come into her eyes, since her back was to the light.

"That lavender thing! It can't be fit."

"It's all right," hastily. "It doesn't matter what I wear."

"Except that I fancy the duchess would like to see you decent." So carelessly that no one would have dreamed that all her schemes might be made or marred by her stepdaughter's toilet at a country garden-party.

"It's my lavender or nothing!" returned that young person not too amiably.

Lady Annesley's answer made her jump.

"Not at all! I am going to give you a gown. I sent for you to try it on."

"You!" It sounded more candid than polite. "Why? What for?" For her life she could not get out any thanks. Lady Annesley, who let her go cold in winter to suddenly present her with a new dress. "I—I'd rather not," she ended stiffly.

"Oh, you might see it first," rather dryly. "Adams, Miss Ravenel's gown!"

Ravenel watched the Umbrella go to a wardrobe.

"If she made it," she thought, "I'll never put it on!"

Sylvia Annesley read the obstinate face like print.

"You see," she said lightly, "the whole county will be there tomorrow, and all the soldiers! You simply can't go in a tumbled old muslin."

All the soldiers! And Adrian had never seen her in a frock that was even new. Lady Annesley saw her waver.

"That is the little gown," she said quickly. 'Slip it on and decide afterward," thinking that mention of the soldiers had done the business, and blessing the discretion of her maid without which she might have given her stepdaughter ten gowns and not known how to make her wear them.

For Ravenel had risen and was staring at the ivory-white, silk-lined muslin the Umbrella held.

There was not a spot of color about it, and as she gazed the girl knew that Adrian had never even dreamed of her as she would look in that filmy white frock.

"I can't take it," she faltered, but she let the Umbrella put it on her.

"The hat, Adams!" cried Lady Annesley quickly. "In the next room. Give me the scissors first. The collar is too high in the back."

She snipped hastily once or twice, but Ravenel hardly felt the cold scissors as she stared down at her long skirt.

"There, look at yourself." With a curious lingering touch, Lady Annesley pushed her to the glass. But the girl gave a little cry of astonishment.

Was this her very own self who stood so thin and tall, her bronze hair gleaming, her cheeks rose-red, her eyes—she turned from the mirror with sudden passion. No matter who gave her the gown she would wear it! would go all in white for Adrian Gordon's eyes.

"Do you know it is very good of you?" She faced the woman in the yellow silk morning gown honestly. "I don't deserve it."

"It is not new. I had the things," slowly. "Just turn and let me see how the train hangs." She stooped gracefully, pulled the bodice down under the skirt, settled the train. She also had not been prepared for the dream of peach and carnation the girl looked in the white gown; had doubted if her one card were strong enough to play against the world-worn shrewdness of a man grown old in society. But she was confident enough now.

"I can snap my fingers at Captain Gordon, I fancy," and she tightened her small hand. "He can't blame anyone but himself," but she kept the scorn off her face till Ravenel had put on her every-day clothes and departed.

"Tommy," the girl cried, bursting into the schoolroom and recounting the extraordinary tale, "fancy her giving me a dress! Do you think it means she's beginning to like me?" wistfully.

"I don't think—I know," said Sir Thomas bluntly. "It means Lord Levallion. You bet your boots he's going to that party."

"What do you mean?" blankly. "I never heard of the man."

"Her ladyship dropped that out of the window," producing a torn envelope. "It blew slap in my face. Darkblue coronet, 'Levallion' on the back and 'Lady An——' torn through in front. And, sent by hand!"

"I don't see what that's got to do with the garden-party!"

"Don't you?" getting up. "You're a girl and can't see past your nose. I tell you Levallion's staying with the duchess. Aren't you hungry? I'm going out to get that ginger beer I buried. I hooked some buns, too. We hadn't too much breakfast."

"We'll get less after tomorrow," following him briskly into the garden. "For I'm not going to speak to any nasty old Lord Levallion—not for ten gowns. I'm going to——" She stopped short, white with terror.

"My ring!" she cried wildly. "I took off my dress before her. She must have seen it."

Both hands at her throat, she fumbled for her treasures; and leaned back against a convenient tree with her knees giving under her.

Ring and ribbon were gone!

CHAPTER IV.

"A HORRID OLD MAN!"

Lord Levallion was bored.

He hated garden-parties, and he had patiently endured the Duchess of Avonmore's country omnium-gatherum from four o'clock until six. He could not go home, because he was staying in the house, and, retreat being impossible, he had revenged himself for his martyrdom on his old friend, Lady Annesley, by departing hastily on her eager offer to introduce him to her step-daughter.

"I don't see her just now," Sylvia Annesley had said, with the smile he had once known so well, "but if you will come with me we shall easily find her!"

"No, thank you, Sylvia; I don't care for little girls."

Lord Levallion had the rudest drawl in the world when it pleased him, and he enjoyed Lady Annesley's rage at it now. It was all very well to write her a note by way of amusing himself on a wet day, but it was another story to have her introduce him to a bread-and-butter miss.

"The woman wears well, though," he reflected, as he adroitly drifted away from her. "Who would imagine it was fifteen years since I loved and rode away! I think a cigarette might assist me to endure to the end, if I can get away from this madding crowd. I'll get back to town tomorrow, that's one thing certain. The country is less in my line than ever."

He pursued his leisurely way through the magnificent old gardens, round the end of the lake, and finally found a seat on a retired bench in the heart of a grove of trees. There was not a soul to be seen, and if it had not been for the mellow sound of a distant band Lord Levallion would not even have been reminded that he was at a party. He had smoked one cigarette, and was lighting another with a contented sigh, when he heard a quick step and a rustle of silk which caused him to look up sharply. Pray the gods Sylvia had not tracked him!

But it was not Sylvia. It was a strange girl, all in white from her hat to her shoes, and she did not even see him as she walked toward him along the quiet path where the light came dim and green through overarching boughs. She was magnificently handsome—and she was blind with tears that streamed down her face. Her white gown trailed unheeded on the gravel as she fumbled in her pocket for a handkerchief.

"Something must be very wrong," Levallion reflected swiftly, "to make her ruin her skirt round the hem!"

But even in her tears she was gloriously beautiful, and he was not going to let her pass him.

Lord Levallion got up, dropped his cigarette, and took off his hat.

"I beg your pardon," he said gravely. "I will go." But he did not move.

Ravenel Annesley started furiously.

"I didn't see you," she said, with a sob in her throat. 'I thought there was no one here. And—I wanted to be alone."

She wiped the tears from her eyes savagely, with a morsel of a handkerchief; but they came again, and Levallion saw her chest lift with an uncontrollable sob.

"Do you want to stop crying?" he said quietly.

Ravenel stamped her foot.

"Of course I do, but I can't!" she cried childishly.

"Then don't be alone," he returned. "If you stay by yourself you will cry till you are not fit to be seen. Sit down here by me instead, and talk. Oh, I know you're wishing me miles away; but just try it! When you get to my age you will find it is always better to stop crying."

His voice was cool and hard. It came on her nerves like iced water. She did not answer him, but she sat down on a corner of the bench limply, as if her feet could carry her no longer.

"Do you mind my cigarette? No," as she shook to join your happy band? It is needless to say I am an ardent admirer of the Sisters' Corner. It is impossible to tell how much may be learned by reading the letters from the many sisters from all over this great country of ours. Although we cannot all agree in everything we can each express our views on certain topics and after weighing in the balance other people's ideas with our own, we are in better condition to form our own conclusions. This is one advantage of correspondence, both personal and through a magazine, and this is one reason why I like COMFORT above all other household magazines.

Of the topics being discussed, I stand for universal woman suffrage and since I deem that an undebatable question I will merely say that since women are created equal to men they should enjoy the same privilege as men when it comes to supporting a government which concerns women as much as it concerns men. As to the arguments of "women being superior, or inferior, to men," "not being able to be homemakers and have the privilege of voting," that, "the hand that rocks the cradle is the hand that rules the world," are too disgusting for words. Woman Suffrage does not mean the flocking to office by women. The men all have the right to vote but do they all hold office? Why cannot a woman vote for what she thinks is right and yet be a homemaker? Some women are more suited for lawmakers than homemakers. Why withhold from them what is their right because of the selfishness of certain individuals who never look beyond their horizon of life?

Another topic I agree with is divorce. I think, in the first place, the couple should be well suited so divorce would never be necessary, but if a great mistake is made it is wrong to keep them together when their presence becomes distasteful to each other.

I do not admire the habit of getting extracts from the Bible (which is centuries old) to prove the great questions rising before us today. In fact, I think the Bible represents a civilization of centuries past and not the word of God; at least, it isn't the word of my God. In my mind, God would not give to His people such vulgar things as are in parts of the Bible, as His word. Nor do I believe in the Devil. I think the prinkings of our consciences for the evil deeds we do on earth, is punishment enough. God, in my mind, must be a great power composed of love, righteousness and all that is pure and good. His word is transmitted by Nature and is the happenings of the universe. He has nothing to do with war; that is the work of man. He has nothing to do with plagues, disease or the like; that is the work of germs (I agree with Uncle Charlie about germs) assisted by the filth, carelessness or ignorance of man.

Many of you may not agree with me, but then, all have a right to express their opinions on different subjects.

Here is a poem which expresses my sentiments pretty well:

Not Much of a Creed

"He didn't have much of a Creed,
And his doctrine was not very deep;
His faith wasn't one he could read
In volumes expensive or cheap.
He helped all who asked when he could,
He comforted all when they grieved,
He believed in the right and the good,
And he lived up to what he believed.

"He didn't have much of a Creed,
His doctrine was simple and plain;
But he seemed to have all that we need
To balance life's pleasure and pain.
He wasn't a fellow to shirk
With burdens that could be relieved,
He believed 'twas his duty to work,
And he lived up to what he believed.

"He put out his hand here and there,
To succor the weak and distressed;
And when he had burdens to bear,
He bore them by doing his best.
He refused to take profit or gain,
That was won by another deceived;
He believed in a life without stain,
And he lived up to what he believed.

"I reckon, when toiling is o'er,
And all our struggles are through;
When no one needs help any more,
And there are no good deeds to do,
When the last of life's dangers is braved,
And the judgment of all is begun,
Not by what we believed, we'll be 'saved,'
But by what, through believing, we've done."

I should like to hear from the sisters and cousins and would highly appreciate receiving pressed flowers from the various states as I am trying to get a collection of flowers.

With best wishes, MISS DOLLY I. HULL.

DAMSON PIE.—Scald the plums and set aside to cool. Take out the stones. Sweeten and put in pie tins lined with paste. Dredge with flour and cover with rich top crust and bake.

MISS JENNIE C. KEENE, West Alton, Mo.

ORANGE PUDDING. (Requested.)—Peel and slice three oranges and cover with sugar; let stand half an hour and pour over them a custard made of one pint sweet milk, three tablespoons corn-starch, yolks of two eggs, six tablespoons sugar, boiled together four minutes. Put the beaten whites on top and set in oven to brown. Serve cold. MRS. ELDRIDGE, Hot Creek, Wyo.

COCOANUT RICE PUDDING.—Cook carefully one half cup rice, with a pinch of salt added. When well done add the following and let stand on the stove about ten minutes longer: One well-beaten egg, one half cup sweet milk, one half cup sugar, any desired flavoring, a sprinkle of nutmeg and half a cup of shredded cocoanut. Pour over cooked rice. Serve with cream and sugar. MISS LELAH DEMOSS, Grangerville, Idaho.

COMBINATION SALAD.—Have prepared one cup of crisp shredded cabbage, one large tomato cut in small pieces, half a cup each of cubes of apple and celery. Take one large ripe tomato, cut in eight sections but leave so it will hold together in center of salad dish. Around it arrange the apple, tomato and celery and on top the shredded cabbage. Sweet pepper, onion, radish and cucumber may also be used in this way. Pour over French dressing just before serving.

FRENCH DRESSING.—In a cup put half a teaspoon of salt, a pinch of pepper and three tablespoons of olive oil. Beat until salt is dissolved, then very gradually add two teaspoons of vinegar and beat till it somewhat thickens. Use at once.

SULPHURED APPLES.—Prepare firm apples as for canning, put them in a loose-mesh basket and hang it in the top of a box or barrel in which sulphur should then be burned in the proportion of one half cup sulphur to half bushel of apples. Shake up apples occasionally so all will get a smoke. Pack in stone jars and they will keep solid and fresh as when first prepared. Before using, wash in cold water, then stew and all flavor of sulphur will disappear, while flavor and color of the apples remain.

To prevent insects from getting into dried fruit, give the fruit a fifteen-minute sulphur smoke before putting away.

Left over green tomatoes may be sliced and pickled exactly as for "krout." If sliced green mangoes are added, a fine flavor results. May be eaten raw or boiled with a bit of pork.

CREAM CARAMELS. (Requested.)—Four cups granulated sugar, one half cup corn syrup, one cup cold water. Boil, stirring occasionally, until it forms soft in cold water, then add cup of rich sweet cream and a pinch of salt. Boil again until it hardens in water, add flavor, remove at once and pour in a buttered pan, three quarters inch thick. When cool, mark off in squares.

ONCE to EVERY MAN

PART TWO.

STRICKLAND shook in inarticulate fury as Coit, without having spoken after his chastisement of the older man, moved unhurriedly to the door. Before he reached it, some seismic change took place in the man in the chair.

"I say, Coit, I want you, curse you! Will you come?"

"I am on my way to the Pierrepont now to pack," was the unexpected reply as Coit left the room. Alone, Strickland felt of his insulted lips, chuckling in unholy mirth.

Winter, even in northern New York, held off late that year and during the pleasant days of the prolonged autumn, Diana and Coit inevitably drifted into a warm friendship.

Diana Strickland was the first mature woman—she had told him that she was thirty—with whom Coit had ever been thrown for his mother had died in his infancy. Diana's forbearance under great provocation, the dignity which even her dissolute husband had not been able to unseat, appealed to him strongly.

It was not long before he began to feel for her an emotion beside which his love for Frances Fuller had been a feeble flame. Her beauty, her loyalty, her acceptance without a whimper of the blows of life, aroused in him an almost savage devotion.

Strickland seemed not to mind the dangerous relationship. Indeed, he watched its growth, an amused gleam in his half-shut eyes, devouring, meanwhile, salacious literature, in an effort to galvanize into life his jaded senses. It was with difficulty that Coit tolerated the picture of decadence, but for Diana's sake, he stayed on.

During the hours which they spent together, Diana told him about her life. She had been married ten years—had married Strickland knowing what he was—as the price of freedom for her embezzling father.

There had been a daughter of Strickland's by a previous marriage. Angela had lived with them until her father's recurrent attacks had made too dark a shadow for a young girl's life. She was with an aunt now, in Japan.

"A woman has no business to violate a contract which she made with her eyes wide open," Diana said to Coit one day when they had been exchanging confidences.

"But your eyes weren't open, Diana; how could a girl foresee such a ruin of manhood? I love you, dear. You knew that after that first night. I want to get you away from this where I can protect you. Diana, do you love me a little?"

His dark eyes devoured her face.

"Could there possibly be two answers to that question?" she replied, smiling. "You are the first man who has suggested protection without a too-heavy price. Of course I love you, Murray; it would be idle to deny it."

"Diana!" He reached for her, his desirous arms outstretched. "Then nothing else matters. Come!"

But Diana drew back.

It was during such a scene that Strickland's man approached Diana one day with a request from her husband for her immediate presence in his room.

A little pale, Diana went, and Coit in the grip of a primitive rage that the woman he loved should be subject to the whims of a beast, loitered in the hall outside Strickland's suite.

An hour later Diana, ghastly and unnerved emerged, and Coit met her, a question smoldering in his eyes.

Diana shook her head and, Coit's arms being open, for the first time, she crept into their shelter.

"You can't love me, Murray," she shivered. "I feel so old and soiled and——"

"Love you, my darling?" interposed Coit; "I love you so much that I would wade through a sea of slime to reach you."

But his arms relaxed suddenly at a sound from Strickland's room.

With a leap Coit, followed immediately by Diana, reached his door. The man, in rising from the couch where he had been lying, had pitched forward in an attack, and in falling had cruelly twisted his head beneath his arm.

It was obvious that he was strangling. The sounds that he uttered became more guttural while the two stood looking at each other, the dark pupils of Diana's eyes dilated till they looked black, the feet of the two of them riveted to the floor.

It was Coit who recovered himself first and sprang to the aid of the helpless man; it was Diana who arranged pillows on which to ease her husband. Together they worked over him, loosing his clothing, administering stimulants, furnishing every comfort.

When the attack had passed, Strickland, pale and shaking, regarded the two with an odd smile. Some occult messenger seemed to have conveyed to him their thoughts as they had faced each other in the presence of his danger.

"Good sports!" he taunted, grinning.

Diana wheeled and left the room and when he was able, Coit followed. He met her in the hall in her riding kit.

"I am going for a canter," she said. "Nothing but this fresh wind will set me right."

"Wait for me on the ledge," he begged, and she nodded and went on while he hurried away to dress.

When Coit joined Diana he thought he had never seen her so desirable. Exercise had brought an unusual and delicate color to her small, pointed face; a loosened curl of her dark hair had crept from beneath her tricorne hat and lay softly against her temple; she looked adorably young and boyish in her well-cut coat and breeches as, with gauntleted hand, she flicked her crop against her boots.

He would have taken her in his arms but she repulsed him and he drew back, hurt.

"You don't love," he charged; "you are Artemis, as I said the first night I saw you—a modern Artemis, untouched by love."

"Not untouched by love," she corrected, "but unsoiled by love."

"How can you say that after what Strickland has put you through?"

"Love had nothing to do with that. He has not besmirched my soul, Murray. No one can do that unless I am willing." She looked off across the rippling lake.

"I am trying to make you see, dear," she went on, "that I am paying a legally-incurred debt."

"But it was paid long since, dear. Can't you see that it isn't possible for us to go on like this? Didn't what happened this afternoon teach you that? Leave him, darling! Leave him to his money and his beastiality. It is time you had release. You have held a poor hand in the game of life, Diana."

Her head went up superbly. "But I wish always to be able to reflect that I played it well," she said.

"This is final? There isn't any way by which I can have you—now?"

She shook her head, her eyes remote.

He was silent for an instant. "But afterwards ——" he began.

She gave him her eyes and he was satisfied.

In silence they rode back to the house. Strickland's querulous voice came to them from his room and Coit went to him at once.

"Lord!" he began. "Where have you two been?" His ferret eyes were fastened on Coit's face. "It isn't any use, Coit," he added with a sneer.

Coit approached him, his jaw set. "Shouldn't you, perhaps, like to make your meaning a bit clearer, Strickland?"

"Lord, no!" and he grinned wickedly as he reflectively stroked his lips.

To Coit the winter passed swiftly if not always pleasantly, and as the weeks wore away the old, terrifying weariness became a vague memory. It was hard to see Diana playing her hand so gamely, but there were mitigating hours when they tramped or rode or read together in the embrasured windows of the fire-lit library.

Sometimes Strickland joined them there. He had formed a curious liking for the only man who had ever taught him the wisdom of bridling an offensive tongue.

Toward spring it began to be clear that Strickland's faltering heart could not be stimulated much longer, and in March Coit advised their immediate return to New York.

In May Strickland died and Coit assisted Diana through her final ordeal with him.

Strickland, it was found, had, in a last diabolical caprice, left his wife only a small annuity and Whispering Pines. The rest of his vast estate went to Angela.

"Do you care, Murray?" questioned Diana.

"Care, girl? Why, I'm glad! I don't want his money in our lives. I suppose you will go to Whispering Pines for the summer, dear?"

"As soon as Angela arrives. She lands in San Francisco on Saturday. When shall you be able to get up?"

"On my return from Montana. It looks as though you and I were going to be rich, honey."

"That doesn't interest me nearly so much as the fact that you are coming up to the country. Next summer——"

"Next summer is my affair," Coit interrupted, smiling, and he bent to kiss her lips.

It was a late-June day when Diana met Coit at the little country station. She was driving her own stout roadster.

"How goes life, sweetheart?" he asked when they were off.

"Peacefully, dear. And with you?"

"Right merrily. Uncle Tim's estate is going to relieve us of any worriment over money. And I'm as fit as a fiddle; Doctor Roberts says so; he is in a hurry now to teach me to carve; also he wants to meet you; he fished for an invitation up here. But most of all, I find life good because I am here with you."

He looked into her face, thankful that the hard years had left no scars. She glanced at him, flushing slightly under his gaze.

"Angela is here; did you know it?"

"Drat Angela!"

"Wait until you have seen her. She is very handsome, Murray."

But Coit was not interested in Angela.

They were on the piazza overhanging the terrace that led down to the lake when Coit had his first sight of Angela Strickland. She padded out to them as unconcernedly as the diminutive puppy that trotted at her pretty heels.

"Angela!"

Coit came to his feet and turned to meet the amused flicker in the girl's reddish brown eyes. She was clad in a one-piece bathing suit of finest jersey which perfectly defined her figure. She had dispensed with stockings, and her flesh against the black of her garment looked like Parian marble. The whorl of her copper-colored hair was partialy concealed by a vivid green cap which few could have worn so effectively.

She was, Coit remembered, nineteen, but the mature perfection of her body made her look older, even, than Diana. Practically nude, she regarded Coit undismayed with what might have been the innocence of youth or the design of a seductive woman. Coit wondered from which source her manner issued and the doubt intrigued him.

She held out a slim, warm hand.

"Diana is much too shocked to present you. You are Doctor Coit, of course. I am Angela Strickland. I always go for a dip in the afternoon. Will you join me? Diana declines repeatedly. I suspect that she apprehends rheumatism." She laughed with the insolence of youth.

"No?" she went on as Coit begged to be excused. "Too bad." And she sauntered down the steps and across the terrace, frolicking unconcernedly with her puppy.

"Grief doesn't visibily bow down her heart," Coit commented, his eyes on the retreating figure.

Diana's eyes followed Angela also. "I never saw that outrageous garment before," she said. "I am afraid that Angela has had her head rather too long."

"It would be rather a pity, don't you think, to curb so fine an animal?"

He was thinking that Angela was like her father, but he forced the thought aside. It was sacrilege to compare that young divinity with her grossly-fleshed father.

Conversation languished between him and Diana. She seemed thoughtful, and Coit, quite frankly, watched the girl who was sliding gracefully through the water.

"I say, Diana, I believe that jolly little brigand is right. Let's go for a swim."

"Not I, thank you. You go, Murray; you will find everything you need in the dressing-room of the boathouse."

Protesting reluctance, Coit went.

"I thought you would come," Angela greeted him as he swam out to the raft where she sat trailing her pink toes in the water.

"Well, now that I am here, what are you going to do to amuse me, Circe?"

"Whatever you like."

He climbed up beside her and she removed a jewelled case from her cap and, taking a cigarette, she lit it and passed the box to Coit.

"Diana disapproves of me." She blew smoke reflectively toward the house. "She thinks I'm 'not exactly naughty and not exactly nice.'"

"Well, are you?"

"Which?"

Their blended laughter reached Diana in her room. Later she saw them come up to the house, with the manner of old and intimate friends.

As she dressed for dinner, Diana tried to shake off a haunting sense of fatality—a feeling that the Stricklands, father and daughter, had declared a vendetta against her.

Angela, with characteristic willfulness, had refused to wear black, and she came down that night in a gorgeous green frock, above which her shoulders and throat rose like a lily from its perfect calyx.

She made the one spot of color in the shadowy room, and during dinner Coit looked at her again and again, as one's eyes return involuntarily to a spot of color in a somber landscape.

He kept near Angela that evening, but he wanted Diana there, also; she, however, went early to her room.

Coit followed her into the hall. "Tired, sweet? I hate to lose you so early. Tomorrow we must have a long day together—just you and I."

He kissed her as Angela's colorful voice in the Bedouin Love Song reached his ears, and as Diana ascended the stairs, he hurried back to the drawing-room.

"You and Di love each other," Angela swung about and confronted Coit.

"And why not?"

She shrugged her perfect shoulders. "Why not?" she echoed. "It is a glorious night," she went on; "let us go down to the lake and watch the moon-path on the water."

They returned very late. "I suspect that I am going to enjoy myself here very much," Angela remarked as they parted in the hall.

Coit's long hours with Diana did not materialize the next day, nor in the days which followed. Angela always had plans and she had a genius for seeing that they were executed. There was no strife between the women, no warfare, for Diana was too proud to fight.

"She doesn't care," Coit told himself with a bitterness which was unconsciously feigned.

But Diana did care. She spent long hours pondering the chemistry of youth. She began, for the first time, to feel old; the three years which lay between her age and Coit's seemed like a decade. The contour of her face sharpened slightly. There were faint circles, tokens of her sleepless nights, beneath her eyes. More and more she shrank from placing herself near Angela. The contrast, she felt, was cruel.

She had ordered some lovely frocks, but she wore none of them. She wished not to confuse Coit's mind nor his judgment. Marriage, she knew, was an endurance test for which a pretty face and an artfully decked body were insufficient equipment.

If his love was worth while, Coit would come back, and if it were not, God knew that she did not crave it. She had had her fill of the substitute for love. So she assured herself. But philosophy sits uneasily on the shoulders of love.

There were days when she indulged in bitterness. She had played fair—had, in the face of temptation, stood by her moral code. To what purpose?

Through August Coit was constantly at Angela's side. He was suffering no pangs over his moral accounts, for he quite simply refused to meet them, putting them off as one does an insistent creditor, with promises and excuses and sophistries.

One day he and Angela started off for an all-day picnic which Diana had declined to share. In the afternoon, seated in a sheltered nook overlooking the lake, Angela cast aside her book. "Diana is a fool!" she said abruptly.

"What do you mean?" sharply demanded Coit.

"To have philandered along the primrose path with you."

"If you mean——" but Coit's indignant words were drowned in a peal of thunder and almost simultaneously great drops of rain began to fall.

"Come!" Angela was on her feet, her hands outstretched. "The fire lookout's cabin is near."

Hand in hand they scurried to the unoccupied cabin and took shelter in its one, storm-darkened room.

"Murray! I am frightened!" Angela cried as Coit dropped her hand. "Love me, dear!" And she held out desirous arms.

Involuntarily Coit drew her close and for a dizzy instant their bodies clung. He bent her bright-tinted head backward, thrilled at the nearness of her white, pulsing throat, her melting, beckoning lips. Enraptured, he bent to obey their call when Angela opened her feverish eyes.

He caught her glance, paused, and his arms relaxed so suddenly that the girl half fell against the wall. Coit had seen in Angela's eyes the same expression that had beastialized her father's—that had outlived every other light in Strickland's own.

"I am going back to the house at once," he said, starting for the door. "I advise you to wait here till the storm is past. You will be perfectly safe."

She was beckoning him still through half-shut, brilliant eyes and Coit, observing it, laughed.

"Did you think you had me, Angela? You? You have offered me more than any woman can afford to give a man. And, frankly, I don't want it. Your day is over. Men weary of flesh alone. Remember that, Angela. You are monotonous—like a tune picked out with one finger on an instrument. Life may add the chords and the notes and the accidentals to make a harmony. I don't know. It depends entirely upon yourself. At present you are a rather disgusting girl playing at being a vampire. It is a perilous game and a losing one, and any decent man will tell you so."

Angela cowered against the wall and Coit left her there to fight his way through the storm-punished woods to the house.

As he came within sight of it he saw a group of servants huddled together on the piazza overlooking the lake and the old man who pottered about the grounds was down at the dock, wet to the skin.

"What is it?" called Coit above the storm.

"She's out there, sir; she was trying to get in when the storm broke. I can't manage a boat with a sea like this running."

"I'll get her, John, never you fear. Give me a hand here."

In a few moments he was shooting through the angry water. "Coming, Diana!" he called and she heard him above the pounding water.

She was still clinging to her overturned boat when he reached her.

"You'll go over yourself, Murray, if you try to get me into your boat, and neither of us can swim in this."

"Hold steady, girl, and obey orders!" he commanded sternly.

An hour later, Diana was lying on a chaise longue in front of an open fire for the storm had brought a chill to the air. Coit hovered about protectingly, a vast thankfulness in his heart.

"Where is Angela?" Diana finally inquired.

She looked into his eyes and found them clean. It was as though some master surgeon had relieved a pressure upon his soul. He not only was healed, but he seemed not to remember what had taken place in the days of his delirium. Between him and Diana that period was never mentioned.

In the days which followed, Angela went about, thoughtful. Coit had reached some stratum of good in her and she seemed to be trying to make a harmony out of her life. Already, with Diana's help, she was planning serious work for the winter when they should be in town.

In September, Doctor Roberts ran up to Whispering Pines. He entirely approved of Diana. His courtly manner toward her and his eyes, softening always as they met hers, proved that.

On his first evening, after Diana and Angela had left them, Coit turned to the man whose colleague he was to be.

"Well?" he said.

"If I were ten years younger, Coit, I'd give you a race," he said with a whimsical smile. "You seem to have passed with honors," he added after a moment of silence.

"Passed?" Coit puzzled.

Doctor Roberts looked reflectively at the end of his cigar. "I know none of the details," he said; "I do not wish to know them; but your face tells me that you have passed the test of temptation which comes once to every man."

Coit's head went up. It was his accolade.

Some Beauty Conveniences

AMONG my girls are many who would like to know of simple toilet conveniences that would make it easy to keep one's self well-groomed. And so, this month, girls, let's talk this over.

First, our brushes and combs. Our hair can't be live and "springy" if, every time we brush it we give back to it from our brushes some of the soil from the time before. Our brushes must be immaculate and they won't be unless we take particular pains to keep them so. Shake well after using, and wipe off with a damp (not wet) cloth, letting the brush stand in the sun afterwards. Twice a week wash the brush thoroughly in soapy water, rubbing between the bristles with one's fingers, and getting out every particle of dust. Do not have the water too hot, as it yellows the bristles—just lukewarm. Rinse by dipping in a flat dish of water to which has been aded a teaspoonful of boric acid powder.

USING A BATH MITTEN WILL WORK SMOOTH SHOULDERS LIKE THESE.

Your comb must be cleaned after every using. Ingenious contrivances come for this purpose—little round very stiff brushes with a handle like a shaving brush, for one thing; but an even more convenient arrangement is a sort of strop made of innumerable strings woven just at each end into a firm strip but left loose for about eight inches, between the strips, and having a metal hook at each end. One hook is put over a nail or dresser-drawer knob, and the other is held in the hand, while the comb is passed back and forth along the loose strings, which thus cleanse the teeth of the comb of any specks of dust or other soil from the hair. This comb cleaner must be washed thoroughly daily, but with its aid one's comb can be kept in perfect order. You could make a similar contrivance by braiding for an inch at one end a hundred fine strings about ten inches long, then braiding at the other end, and sewing on tape loops at each end.

An eyebrow brush is almost as indispensable as a hairbrush, for dust lodges in the brows, and if we use powder they become regular storage warehouses. Always brush the brow toward the nose first, that the hairs may be dislodged from their normal position, and any dust be shaken loose, then brush away from the nose, carefully shaping the brow and going over and over it until it is smooth and glossy. The eyebrow brush, like the comb, must be washed as soon as used.

Always dry toilet articles in the sun, and stand brushes on their side, so the moisture will not soak down into the back of the brush.

A complexion brush, of course, you must have. Be sure it is of camel's hair or it will be too stiff for your face.

A bath mitten will serve to rub the body into a healthy glow and keep the skin smooth and fine, if used after your daily body bath. You can buy a bath mitten for a very small sum, or you can make one of a piece of an old Turkish towel by laying the hand on the toweling and cutting a mitten without a thumb, about an inch longer all round than the hand. Sew two pieces of this kind together, bind the seam and the wrist edge with tape, and there you have your bath mitten.

Try all these things, girls, and see how convenient they are. By the way dainty washcloths, tied in packages of six, make delightful Christmas presents, and it isn't too soon to begin to think about your friends!

Answers to Questions

Brown Eyes.—The spots on your face need a physician's attention, as they indicate some blood trouble. The use of iodine, as you suggest, will not "color" them and render them invisible. Iodine colors the skin yellow—a brownish yellow. It is a good thing to use on a bruise or cut or other portion of the skin where there is infection, because it kills the germs and so prevents further trouble, but it will not conceal any spot. You should not use powder on your face until it is healed. A zinc ointment, which you can get from your druggist, might be rubbed on the spots at night, and in the meantime you should see that your bowels move freely every day, and that you drink quantities of water. You can carry off many impurities by being careful about these two things, and oftentimes clear up a mild skin trouble.

Young Beauty.—A thirty-six-inch bust is not too large for you. I should let it alone. It may be your flesh is a little soft and flabby. Dash cold water on your skin, always (except when you are not feeling well) after bathing, and this will keep the skin firm. Any of the arm exercises I give from month to month in COMFORT are good to keep the bust firm. You say you have fat fingers, hands and arms. Exercise the arms as much as possible, and do not eat quite so many sweet things. Perhaps you are rather fond of cake, pie, candy, and such foods. A good exercise for fat wrists and arms is this:

For Fat Wrists and Arms

Extend the arms on a level with the shoulders, closing the hands to form a fist. Arms should extend sideways instead of in front. Now, clenching each fist as tight as possible, turn the hand in a circle, without letting the arm drop below shoulder height. First, turn hand with clenched fingers up, then turn so they face backward, then so they face frontward, then downward, then turn upward from the downward position. You will find this exercises the muscles of the arm and works off surplus fat.

A good exercise for fat fingers is to extend arm on level with shoulder, spread the hand as wide as possible, and then stretch with the fingers as if trying to reach something just beyond. Close the hand, then stretch, close hand, stretch and continue for fifteen or twenty times. Shaking the hands from the wrist as if they were limp rags is also good for them. But I have an idea you need to cut down sweets, first of all. Tennis would be a good game to help you get rid of flesh on fingers, hands and arms, or any game that exercised the arms violently.

J. P.—I should not worry about those "too red cheeks." If you knew how anxious hundreds of girls are to have red cheeks, you would be congratulating yourself. Don't wear any tight clothes—collars, sleeves, shoes, waistbands. Of course you don't wear corsets at fifteen, and won't for several more years, as it isn't fashionable and certainly isn't healthful. Don't eat too much at a time—eating too much gives one a stuffy feeling and makes one red in the face. I am quite sure you don't eat too much, but I just mention this. About your hair, if your forehead is high I should part the hair in the middle. Combing it straight back will make your forehead higher and probably not be so becoming to you. I think I have suggested ways of wearing the hair at fifteen, lately, but let me repeat that the most fashionable way among wealthy people is for the girl to wear the hair in one long braid with loosened ends. You can part the hair in the middle, or a trifle to one side, then comb each half back and join them in one braid in the back. A good way is to part the hair from ear to ear, as well as from the forehead back. Then take half of the front hair and roll it gently away from the face, pinning it with hairpins or side combs halfway back of the ear. Do the same with the other half, then braid the ends of the two halves of the front hair in with the back hair. Another way to dress your hair is to part from forehead to nape of neck, braid in two braids, and tie the end of one braid to the top of the other with a bow, and the end of the second to the top of the first with another bow, making two looped braids at the back of the neck.

Lawrence.—Never use powder without first rubbing the skin with cold cream, and it will not chap nose or cheeks. Also rub in cold cream well at night. Just smearing the face with cream is not enough; you should gently rub it in, over and over and over, until the skin has absorbed it. When you apply it before powder, wipe off any surplus of cream with a bit of absorbent cotton. For the hands which need whitening, give them a good scrubbing in warm soapy water, then rinse thoroughly. After this, rub in the following lotion:

For White Hands

Rosewater, four ounces; orange-flower water, four ounces; borax, one half dram; spirits of benzoin, one dram; bruised almonds, one ounce. Put the bruised almonds in the orange-flower water and rosewater, let stand twenty-four hours, strain through cheese-cloth, add the borax, shake until thoroughly dissolved, add the benzoin, a little at a time, constantly shaking. This is an excellent whitener for the hands.

Polly.—You say you have been taking "from one quart to a gallon of milk a day," but are not gaining as you should. I expect the reason is just that "from one quart." The way to take milk is to stick to a regular amount daily. If you are not taking solid food, you should take two glasses of milk every hour during the day, "chewing" each mouthful before swallowing. You should drink a glass of hot water on rising, and should eat, fifteen minutes later, half-a-dozen prunes which have been soaked all night in a tumbler of water. Chew the prunes thoroughly and drink the juice. If you will stick to these directions, you will gain steadily. When you have gained a considerable amount, you can take less milk, a glass and a half of milk every hour until about four o'clock, and eat supper, but nothing like cabbage, which you mention! Cabbage is difficult to digest. You could eat some broiled meat (never fried), but of course not pork or veal, as they, too, are hard to digest. Any green vegetable would be good for you, and you could eat a baked apple with or without cream, or any other fruit (but not preserves). You should not eat cake, pie or candy, of course, nor drink coffee or tea. Do your best to follow these directions, and I shall hear good news of you, I know.

Tutsy.—I am sorry your letter was not in time for the September issue. However, I hope my advice will help you, now that it does reach you. If you have a good complexion naturally, I should not use either cold cream or powder. You say your nose is full of blackheads—that is probably because you rub cold cream in, and do not get it out, so your pores are all clogged up. I suggest that you give your face a good scrubbing at night with warm soapy water, and a camel's-hair complexion brush. You should then rinse and rinse the face. A gentle squeezing of one side of the nose between the two forefingers will probably unload some of the pores; treat the other side of the nose the same way. Your nose will be red, as a result, but as you are going right to bed, that does not matter and the redness will be gone in the morning. Of course you must not be too strenuous in your squeezing, nor do I mean that you are to do this every night. I am suggesting it for one night, to get those pores unloaded. In the morning do not use soap on the face, but tepid water, and finally dash on cold water. This will close the pores and keep out blackheads—which are nothing more nor less than dirt or other foreign matter lodged in the pores of the skin. In your case I have an idea you have loaded them with cold cream and never got them unloaded. A little cold cream is good for most skins, but it must be washed off once a day and the pores emptied. I should leave the whiteheads alone for the time being, just being careful about scrubbing your face at night, using the cold water dash in the morning, and being sure to have plenty of exercise during the day, drink plenty of water, and keep the eliminative functions active. You may find that all these troubles of yours will disappear. As to the hair on your arms, shaving would only make them worse—it is a very bad plan indeed. You can use a depilatory. Using peroxide on them will bleach them and render them unimportant. For the hairs under nose and lower lip, if they are just a downy fuzz, let them alone. If they are more serious, dampen them one day with ammonia, the next day with peroxide, and in time they will become inconspicuous. The ammonia will finally kill the roots. This is a perfectly safe treatment, will not bring back the hair later, and really does the deed if you are patient. It is slow, however. I should say your eyes were hazel, as hazel eyes have a greenish tinge and yet are brown. Don't use alcohol on your hair, it is very bad for it, drying up the oil which keeps it healthy and makes it grow. Give your hair a shampoo once in two weeks or three weeks, with a simple soap jelly (white soap shaved into hot water, dissolved on stove, and let stand until cool), being careful to rinse many times and thoroughly. There is no objection to using lemon juice in the water if you wish to, in rinsing. It helps to keep the hair light. But you are probably going to have darker hair, as many people do, when they get older. It will probably be a very pretty color, and I should not worry about it, nor should I try to do anything to affect its color. Keep it perfectly clean, don't use alcohol or any other drying lotion on it, brush it persistently at night, and you will have pretty, healthy hair. If the cords in your neck enlarge when you are nervous or excited, your circulation is probably not good. Perhaps you wear clothes a little too tight in some place—at neck or wrist, or waist. Even tight shoes will restrict the circulation. Keep the bowels in good condition, choose your foods carefully, rub the skin well after your daily body bath (whether you take it with a sponge or wash-cloth, standing on a towel, or in a bathtub), sleep in a room with the windows wide open, and you will soon find yourself better in this regard. And in the meantime try to be calm and deliberate about everything. If you are tired after singing two or three songs, you probably do not use your throat properly. The "frog in your throat" would result from a cold in the head or a catarrhal condition. Clear the nose thoroughly each morning on rising, and on going to bed. A good exercise for the lungs is as follows:

To Develop the Lungs

Stretch arms out at the sides on a level with the shoulders, keeping the elbows stiff. Throw the arms forward violently, letting the hands meet each other, but being careful not to let arms drop below shoulder height. Now, throw arms back as if trying to make them meet in the middle of the back, keeping them on the same level as before. Of course you can't make them meet, but each time you will get them a little farther back. Repeat this exercise fifteen or twenty times, and continue daily.

Miss Blue Eyes.—Indeed, I am glad to answer your letter. If you are five feet nine inches tall, you should weigh about one hundred and fifty pounds. If you only weigh one hundred and thirty, you are under weight and it won't do you a bit of harm to try to gain. If you have a large frame, you may look as if you weighed more than one hundred and thirty. "Is it proper for you to have more than one sweetheart?" It is proper for you to have as many friends as you want, but that means friends, without any sentiment or lovemaking or the slightest familiarity. I hope you know many nice men and that you like them and they like you. But in many small places, it is customary for a girl to go with one young man. This does not necessarily mean that they are sweethearts and should not mean that there is any lovemaking unless they are engaged to be married. No, it isn't proper for a girl of your age, or a girl of any age, to have more than one sweetheart. A sweetheart is supposed to be the man one loves and is going to marry, and you could hardly love more than one man, could you, now? And certainly couldn't marry more than one! Surely you may ask all the questions you want, at any time. I couldn't possibly guess what grade you are going to enter at school in the fall, but am glad to say in answer to your question that there were no grammatical mistakes in your letter. There were one or two misspelled words, however, and you might put a little drill on your spelling. I hope your school work this year will be very successful indeed.

Troubled.—At sixteen, many girls are troubled with pimples periodically, but this condition will soon pass away. Do not put anything on the pimples, but try to drink lots of water to help carry the impurities away from the body in that manner and keep them from coming out in pimples, look after the bowels daily, chew your food well, eat fruits and vegetables, and no fried foods. A red nose can come from a stomach which is out of order, has too heavy food to digest, or food not properly chewed, so be careful. Chew every mouthful of food until it is liquid before swallowing it, and don't eat hot biscuits or griddle cakes or fried potatoes or fried eggs or other food which is hard to digest. A soft boiled egg is easily digestible, so is a baked or boiled potato, and stewed or roast chicken or broiled or roasted beef, while fruits and green vegetables are excellent for you. If your nose is sunburned, apply steaming hot cloths, replacing as fast as one becomes cool. Do this for ten minutes before going to bed. Rub a little cold cream into the skin of the nose on going to bed also. Ever so much good luck to you.

Why We Say "Hello"

Long, long ago wolves were numerous in all parts of the world, especially in England. Wolf hunting was a favorite sport with the gentry and to kill wolves was regarded as the sacred duty of all Englishmen. In fact, an old law reads: "All barons must hunt and chase a wolf four times a year."

French was the language of the court at that time, so the burly old English hunters used the cry of the French wolf hunters, which was "Au loup!" "Au loup!" (To the wolf.)

These words heard at a distance sounded like "A loo," but the English, who always put an H on wherever they possibly can, put it on the words "A loo," and when wolf hunting shouted "Ha loo." This form we use when we call "hello," as no word has been found that carries so far or so well as hello.

For this reason it is the accepted form of the telephone companies the world over.

Cubby Bear's Friends Say Good-By

By Lena B. Ellingwood

Copyright, 1917, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

"WHAT are you thinking about so soberly, Cubby Bear?" asked Mamma Bruin one morning.

Cubby looked up from the porridge he was not eating.

"I am thinking," he said, "of my little friend Kiddie Goat, who stayed with us after his leg was broken until it got well. He was such a DEAR little goat, and I have not seen him for a long, long time! I would like to go to the big pasture today, to visit him and Lillie Lambkin."

"You may go if you like," Mamma Bruin told him. "I think you would be quite safe in the pasture, but do not go near the farmhouse."

So Cubby Bear started off happily to visit Kiddie Goat and Lillie Lambkin. The summer days were past, and it was a beautiful autumn morning. There had been a little frost earlier, but that had melted away in the bright sun. The air was warm and beautiful, and with the hush that comes in autumn, when the falling leaves rustle as they touch the ground, and every dropping nut can be plainly heard.

Pine and spruce and cedar trees, in their lasting greenness, made the bright colors of the maples gayer by contrast. How pretty the autumn leaves were, thought Cubby Bear, with their shining gold and glowing scarlet and crimson. You will never see a lovelier sight than the woods on a sunny day in autumn.

Cubby Bear heard a sweet song, and thought, "That sounds like Robbie Reddie. I will see if I can find him."

He hurried along, and sure enough, there was his sweet-voiced little bird friend, perched on a maple twig, his red waistcoat just the color of the leaves around him.

"Good morning!" called Cubby Bear. "What are you singing about?"

"Listen," answered Robbie Reddie, "and you shall hear:

"When the autumn days grow colder,
And the frost is on the leaves,
When the ripened fruits are gathered,
And the grain is in the sheaves,

"Then we know that soon the winter,
With its storms and ice and snow,
Will be here, and so we robins
To a warmer country go.

"We will spread our wings, and flying
Through the sunny autumn sky,
Soon we'll reach our winter dwellings,
Good by, Cubby Bear, good by."

"Good by," said Cubby Bear. "Good by, Robbie Reddie, and thank you for singing to me. You will come back again when the winter is gone."

As Cubby Bear went on, he heard the tap-tap-tapping of Redtop Woodpecker's sharp bill, clear and loud in the still air.

"He may be going away, too," thought Cubby Bear. "I must try to find him, and say good by." But the tapping soon stopped, and though Cubby Bear spent some time looking about, he did not find his brisk little friend with the red topknot.

Chirpy Chipmunk came running along, his cheeks puffed out with acorns which he was carrying to his home.

"What are you hurrying so for?" asked Cubby. "Come for a walk with me this fine day. I am going to see Kiddie Goat and Lillie Lambkin."

Chirpy took the nuts out of his mouth, so he could speak, and held them in his paws.

"Do not bother me," he said. "I am very busy.

"Don't you know that summer's past?
Summer, with its pleasant heat?
Freezing winter soon will come—
I must gather food to eat.

"In my warm and cozy nest
I must store these nuts away,
I am working hard and fast,
And I have no time for play.

"You should see the things I have—
Hazlenuts and acorns too,
Corn and seeds of many kinds!
They must last the winter through."

Then Chirpy said good by, and popping the acorns inside his cheeks again, hurried away. Chirpy never thought he had enough food stored away, and the autumn was a busy time for him.

"Chickadee! chickadee!" called a little voice, and Cubby Bear looked up to see the little bird who had shown him the way to Betty Badger's house when he went to the west Forest with Dr. Squilly Porcupine's good medicine for the sick little Badgers.

"How do you happen to be so far from home?" asked Cubby in surprise.

"I'm going, I'm going away and away!
When cold weather comes, I no longer can stay.
I'm leaving my nest in the green forest tree
To fly to the south—Chickadee, chickadee!

"I'll fly over mountains, and cities, and streams,
I'll bask in the warmth of the sun's tender beams
In a sweet southern clime, by a murmuring sea!
Farewell, Cubby Bear! Chickadee, chickadee!"

"Good by, little Chickadee Chirrupee," said Cubby Bear. "The forest will be lonely with all the birds away."

Soon after, Cubby Bear reached the big pasture. He spied Kiddie Goat and Lillie Lambkin not far off. They welcomed him gladly, and soon the three were having a merry game of tag.

The cows, browsing about on the scant, late grass, or lying on the ground, calmly chewing their cud, looked at Cubby Bear with mild interest. But the horses, sniffing the air, pricked up their ears and trotted down to the pasture fence nearest the farmhouse.

"Why do they run away?" asked Cubby. "I'm afraid they do not like me."

"Never mind!" said Kiddie Goat. "I like you. I remember how good you were to me when my leg was broken."

"YES," ADMITTED WOLLIE, "I ALWAYS GET FAT AND SLEEPY IN THE FALL."

As they were running about at play, Cubby Bear tripped over something among some tall, dead ferns, and nearly fell.

"Be careful, can't you?" cried a familiar voice, and Cubby Bear was surprised to see Wollie Woodchuck. "I shall have a black-and-blue spot on my head where you gave it such a bump, with your awkwardness!" grumbled Wollie.

"I am sorry," said Cubby. "I did not mean to hurt you."

"I suppose not," answered Wollie, with an astonishing yawn. "I must have been napping. I am sleepy these days."

"How fat you are getting!" said Cubby.

"Yes," admitted Wollie. "I always get fat and sleepy in the fall. I am going home now from the farmer's garden, where I have been eating. When I feel cold weather coming, you see, I eat and eat and eat—all I can—then I curl up in my warm, safe hole and sleep sweetly—oh, such a long, happy sleep! Good by, Cubby Bear, you may not see me again for months."

"I am going home soon," said Cubby Bear. "Wait, and we will walk together."

"I will start now," Wollie decided. "You may overtake me. Perhaps I shall go to sleep on the way," and he started slowly off, stumbling along sleepily.

"Oh, come, let us play!" said lively Lillie Lambkin.

"Too soon will come the dreary time
When freezing winter days
Will keep us close within the barn,
And stop our merry plays.
Then gambol and skip,
With frolicsome trip,
While sunshine and freedom are ours.
We'll merrily play
This bright autumn day,
And gather the beautiful flowers."

"Late autumn flowers were blooming in the pasture, golden-rod and blue wild asters, and Kiddie Goat and Lillie Lambkin helped Cubby Bear pick a large bouquet to carry home to Mamma Bruin.

"I think I must go now," said Cubby. "Next summer I will come to see you again."

They went with him as far as the tamarack tree, where they bade each other good by.

As Cubby walked along, keeping watch for Wollie Woodchuck, his good friend Shinyblack Crow came flying to meet him.

"I am going away, Cubby Bear," said Shinyblack Crow, "and I wanted to say good by to you.

"My coal-black wings are large and strong,
And never tire as I fly along,
Mile after mile through the pure, free air,
On and on, with never a care!

"Caw, little Cubby, caw!
The southern lands the bird-tribes draw,
But back we'll come with spring's first thaw!
Caw, little Cubby, caw!

"I'm going far away from here,
Where never comes the winter drear,
I've sung no sweet-voiced songs for you,
But always gave you friendship true.

"Caw, little Cubby, caw!
Some day in spring, with eager claw,
I'll grasp your friendly little paw,
"Caw, little Cubby, caw!"

"Good by, good Shinyblack Crow. I shall look for you in the spring."

"Mamma Bruin," said Cubby Bear soberly, after he had reached home, "so many of my friends have said good by to me today, and I shall not see them again for months. The winter will be long and lonely."

"Oh, no, Cubby Bear," Mamma Bruin said, as she smiled at him kindly.

"Safe in our warm and cozy home
We'll sleep away the days,
My little Cubby Bear and I,
While boisterous winter stays.

"The flowers, too, will be asleep,
Beneath the winter's snow,
Till southern breezes whisper
'Tis time for them to grow.

"Then all the forest people
With gladness once again
Will greet the springtime's sunny warmth
From burrow, house and den."

are going to school in Greeley and my oldest sister does the housework.

Well, Uncle Charlie what do you think about the war? Don't you think it wrong to go across the ocean to fight Ido.

Your niece, JOICE MAHER.

Joice, so you want to know whether I think it wrong to go across the ocean and fight "Ido." Before giving an opinion on this vital matter I would first like to know who "Ido" is and what he has done, for to be truthful I never heard of him before. That such a person exists however is very evident or you would not be so perturbed about him and so anxious to know whether we should cross the ocean and grab Mr. Ido by the seat of his pants and dash his brains out in Europe, or calmly wait for his appearance on our shores and fight a battle to the death with him, either in the streets of New York or somewhere along the American coast, or wherever Mr. Ido found it most convenient to land. If Mr. Ido could be arrested on landing and handled by the police then I suggest we wait until the gentleman arrives before dealing drastically with him. If however, Mr. Ido is a leader of millions of efficient fighting men and is a real menace to civilization, then I think we should be an awful bunch of fools if we waited for him to attack us and spread ruin, death and devastation on our shores instead of our attacking him and making him do all the suffering. When fire breaks out we do not sit quietly in our homes until the roof is in flames. We rush to the spot where the fire started and fight it before it can spread. It is quite enough to have it destroy one house without letting it spread all over town, and it is quite enough to have Germany destroy Europe without giving her an opportunity to make a Belgium out of the United States as she is fairly itching to do. I quite understand why you, Joice, think it foolish to go to France. Living in the center of the country, as you do, where an enemy cannot reach you, you are quite willing for Mr. Ido (who I strongly suspect is the Kaiser in disguise) and his hordes of barbarians to tear the country to pieces as far West as Omaha, but if they got to Omaha you would begin to get just a wee bit nervous, now wouldn't you? Then perhaps you would say: "Well, I guess it would have been better after all to have fought Mr. Ido in his own country, and not let him land here and tear the bowels out of our beloved land and menace my home. Please remember young lady, that our Eastern coastline belongs to the United states just as much as Colorado does, and that we Easterners strenuously object, even if you do not, to having Mr. Ido lay waste our cities, slaughter our people, outrage our women, dig up and empty the caskets containing the bodies of our dead and fill them with filth, and treat us as though we were vermin. It is sad to see a young lady whose parents own 1,600 acres of good American soil (a royal domain that even a king might be proud to call his own, and whose brothers and sisters are doing a million times better here than they could in any other country on earth) hesitating in her duty toward her native land. The French sent us Lafayette, and to France we owe our liberty, but, alas, the present selfish, ungrateful generation doesn't even remember who Lafayette was or what he did. The French did not hesitate to cross the ocean to help us fight Mr. Ido King George, and it took many months in those days to make a trip that now takes but a few days' pleasant steaming. France, England and Russia have spilled rivers of blood for us, and we should be dastardly cowards and ingrates if we did not go to the aid of those who have so long and nobly fought our battles. The French however were brave, they had ideals, and the La Follettes, Gronnas, Bill Stones, pacifists, I. W. W.'s, anarchists and socialists weren't around in Lafayette's days to poison their minds and make cowardly curs of them. This war is being run by experts trained in the arts of war, gallant American soldiers and sailors who know their business and not, thank God, by pacifist lunatics, slushy sentimentalists, Kaiser owned socialists, I. W. W.'s and other half baked dreamers, traitors and copperheads, who are doing their darnedest to make this country into a Prussian slave pen. Germany has decreed that we must go to France or go to hell. With ice at its present price, I prefer France.

MONROE, WASHINGTON.

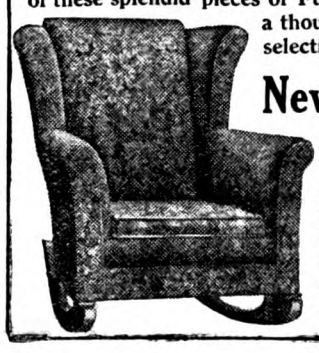
DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I quite agree with all you have said to Cousin C. in the April issue of COMFORT for although I don't believe in war unless it is absolutely necessary I do not believe that we should permit any nation to treat us as though we were dogs and dirt. Both of my grandfathers were soldiers and I believe that in case of need that I can show myself worthy to be called a soldier's granddaughter.

Last Wednesday afternoon all of the Monroe people that wanted to attend the big patriotic parade at Everett were taken down in automobiles, free of charge.

The Red Cross, soldiers and marines were well represented, and children from nearly all of the schools, and high, from all over the county marched in a mass. The papers said that ten thousand, two hundred and fifty-two people marched and every one carried Old Glory.

I am a senior in high school. I live on a farm about two miles from Monroe, which is a small town. My favorite pastimes are reading and roaming through the woods hunting for new kinds of flowers and mosses and watching Mother Nature's children frisk and play. I dearly love animals, especially dogs and horses.



MURIEL MCCORMICK.

Muriel, you say you do not believe in war. No rational, decent, well-balanced, God-loving individual "believes" in war, any more than we believe in smallpox, earthquakes, hydrophobia, leprosy, dirt, filth, flies or typhoid germs. If we could get rid of these things by not believing in them it would be lovely, but you can't keep flies out by not believing in them, you have to use a screen, or poison, or a swatter to fix them. You can't keep smallpox out by not believing in it. You have to fight disease unless you want disease to kill you. Life is a battle from the cradle to the grave. It is a fight against hunger, poverty, sin, selfishness and heaven only knows what else, and the finer the fight we put up the greater and more glorious the victory. Life is just one eternal scrap, and directly you quit fighting the wrong, the evil and the destructive forces in the world, directly you quit standing up for right, righteousness and justice, then you begin to slide downward to destruction. If Germany had not believed in making war her chief national business and glorifying war and conquest, and scorning peace and ease, substituting Nietsche's doctrine of the superman, the man on horseback, the haughty conqueror for the lowly Christ, whose doctrine was love and unselfishness, peace, good will and brotherhood, we should not be fighting Germany today. We must conquer wrong or submit to wrong, and thank God there is enough of the spirit of our forefathers still left in us, in spite of the treachery and treason that exists on all sides, to nerve our arms in the day of battle and make us victorious. There are a lot of hen-brained idiots who will tell you that war accomplishes nothing and settles nothing. When these mush brained lunatics tell you this, reply thus: War made the white man ruler of this, the red man's continent. War replaced British with American rule and drove out the troops of the British German King, George the Third, and gave us Washington, the Father of

Home Dressmaking Hints

Forecasts for Fall Fashions

By Geneva Gladding

THE Fall coat will have smart pockets and jaunty revers. Cheviot, serge, double-faced cloakings, jersey cloth, pile fabrics, plush and velvet will be used.

Tucks are again in fashion, especially for dresses of silk, chiffon and other soft fabrics.

Simple one-piece frocks of serge are nice for afternoon and general wear. Some of the latest models on this order are made without belts, and worn like coats or outer garments. These frocks may be draped on one side, while the other side hangs straight from shoulder to hem.

The Masked Bridal

It was all the answer that Edith, in her excitement, could make.

The beautiful woman caught her breath gaspingly, and every particle of color faded from her face.

"Tell me, also," she went on, hurriedly, "did you ever hear your—your mother speak of a friend by the name of Belle Haven?"

Edith's heart leaped into her throat at this question, and she, too, began to tremble, as a suspicion of the truth flashed through her mind.

"No," she said, with quivering lips, "I never heard her mention such a person; but——"

"Yes—'but'——"eagerly repeated her companion.

"But," the fair girl continued, gravely, while she searched with a look of pain the eyes looking so eagerly into hers, "the evening after mamma was buried, I found some letters which had been written to her from Rome, and which were all signed 'Belle'."

"Oh!——"

It was a sharp cry of agony that burst from Isabel Stewart's lips.

"Oh, why did she keep them?" she went on, wildly; "how could she have been so unwise? Why—why did she not destroy them?"

At these words a light so eager, so beautiful, so tender that it seemed to transfigure her, suddenly illumined Edith's face for they confirmed, beyond a doubt, the suspicion and hope that had been creeping into her heart.

"Tell me—are you that 'Belle'?" she whispered.

"Oh, do not ask me!" cried the unhappy woman.

"Ah, I am sure you are!—I am sure that I have found my mother, and—I am almost too happy to live."

"Child! my own darling! Is it possible that you can thus open your heart of hearts to me?" sobbed the astonished woman, as she clasped the slight form to her in a convulsive embrace.

"Oh, yes—yes; I have longed for you, with longing unspeakable, ever since I knew," Edith murmured.

"Longed for me? Ah, I never dared to hope that Heaven could be so kind. I feared, love, that you would despise me, as a weak and willful woman, even after I should tell you all my story, with its extenuating circumstances; but now, while knowing and believing only the worst, you take me into the arms of your love, and own me—your mother!"

She broke down utterly at this point, and both clasped in each other's embrace, sobbed in silent sympathy for a few moments.

"Well, dearest, this will never do," Mrs. Stewart at last exclaimed, as she lifted her face and smiled tenderly upon Edith; "we must at least compose ourselves long enough to make our adieus to our hostess; then I am going to take you home with me, to have all the story of our tangled past unraveled and explained. Come let us sit down for a few moments, until we get rid of the traces of our tears, and you shall tell me how you happened to be in Boston under the name of Edith Allen."

She drew her toward a couch as she spoke, and there Edith related how she had happened to meet the Goddards on the train, between New York and Boston, and was engaged to act as madam's companion, and how also the mistake regarding her name had occurred.

"And were you happy with them, my dear?" inquired Mrs. Stewart, regarding her curiously.

"Indeed I was not," she replied, "I think they were the strangest people I ever met."

Almost as she spoke the door of the reception-room opened, and Gerald Goddard himself appeared upon the threshold.

He was pale to ghastliness, and looked years older than when Edith had seen him in the drawing-room a few minutes previous.

"Pardon me this intrusion, Miss—Edith," he began, shrinkingly, while he searched both faces before him with despairing eyes; "but I am about to leave, and I wished to give you this note before I went. If, after reading it, you should care to communicate with me, you can address me at the Hotel Mammoth."

He laid the missive upon a table near the door, then, with a bow, withdrew, leaving the mother and daughter alone again.

"That was Mr. Goddard," Edith explained to her companion, as she arose to take the letter; but without a suspicion that the two had ever met before, or that the man was her own father—the "monster" who had so wronged her beautiful mother.

Mrs. Stewart made no reply to the remark; and Edith, breaking the seal of the envelope in her hands, drew forth several closely written pages.

"Why!" she exclaimed, in a startled tone, "this is Mrs. Goddard's handwriting!"

She hastily unfolded the sheets and ran her eye rapidly down the first page, when a low cry broke from her lips, and, throwing herself upon her knees before her mother, she buried her face in her lap, murmuring joyfully:

"Saved! saved!"

"Darling, tell me!—what is this that excites you so?" Mrs. Stewart pleaded, as she bent over her and softly kissed her flushed cheek.

Edith put the letter into her hands, saying, eagerly:

"Read it—read it!—it will tell its own story."

Her companion obeyed her, and, as she read, her face grew stern and white—her eyes glittering with a fiery light which told of an outraged spirit aroused to a point where it would have been dangerous for the woman who once had deeply wronged her, had she been living, to have crossed her path again.

"If I had known!—if I had known—" she began, when she reached the end. Then, suddenly checking herself, she added, tenderly, to Edith: "My love, it seems so wonderful—all this that has happened to you and to me! We must take time to talk it all over by ourselves. You can excuse yourself to your friend, can you not, and come with me to the Supremacy? Say that I wish to keep you for the remainder of the day and night, but will return you to her in the morning."

Edith's face beamed with delight at this proposal.

"Yes, indeed," she said, rising to comply at once with the request. "I am sure Nellie will willingly give me up, when I whisper the truth in her ear. My dear—dear mother!" she added, tremulously, as she bent forward and kissed the beautiful face with quivering lips.

"Edith, my child," gravely said Isabel Stewart, as she held the girl a little away from her and searched her face with anxious eyes, "after learning what you did of me, from those horrible letters, is there no shrinking in your heart—is there no feeling of—of shame or of pitiful contempt for me?"

"Not an atom, dear," whispered the trustful maiden, whose keen intuitions had long since fathomed the character of the woman before her; "to me you are as pure and dear as if that man—whoever he may have been—had never cast a shadow upon your life by the shameful deception which he practised upon you."

"My blessed little comforter! you shall be rewarded for your faith in me," returned Mrs. Stewart, her lips wreathed in fondest smiles, her eyes glowing with happiness. "But go excuse yourself to Mrs. Morrell, then we will take leave of our hostess, and go home."

Ten minutes later they were on their way to the Supremacy.

Upon arriving at her hotel Mrs. Stewart led the way directly to her delightful suite of rooms, where, the moment the door was closed, she turned and once more gathered Edith into her arms.

"I must hold you—I must feel you, else I shall not be quite sure that I am not dreaming," she exclaimed. "I find it difficult to realize my great happiness. Can it be possible that I have

The Kingdom of Our Birthright

In running this series we are not advocating belief in astrology or faith in the pretended talismanic charm of birth-stones, although these beliefs have persisted from remote antiquity and have not a few devotees even in this present age of reason. Yet as myths and superstitions that have dominated through the ages they possess historic interest and educational value. Miss November will appear with a pleasing message next month.—EDITOR.

Copyright, 1917, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

SCORPIO is the zodiacal sign that rules between October 23 and November 22, and persons born under its influence will be magnetic, ardent and zealous, and very averse to doing manual labor. They are very tenacious in upholding whatever popular sentiment decrees; are proud and conservative, and are circumspect in all their outward behavior. So opposed are they to any departure from accepted rules and customs, that they may sacrifice their own individuality, and therefore should strive not to be so sensitive to public opinion, and remember that wealth and aristocratic appearances are not of half so much value as the hand-grasp of one genuine friend, that self-respect outweighs the applause of the multitude and the flattery of sycophants.

MISS OCTOBER.

These persons excel as managers or superintendents, as they have the power of holding their own popularity, and at the same time are extremely exacting and determined that all measures entrusted to their management shall be executed with order and precision.

Positions of confidence and trust in the departments of the government are frequently held by men born under Scorpio, and they conduct themselves with a quiet dignity and decorum that befit their position and command respect. They should marry women who have gained self poise and will gracefully submit to be ruled by their husbands. They will be more generous with money than praise, yet will be very proud of a wife who has a commanding presence and easily fills a place among rich and influential people.

Women born under this influence have the same deference for popular conventionalities and superior external appearances, and are inclined to be self-indulgent. They like to be leaders and have a great admiration for persons in exalted positions of life. They are apt to marry more for wealth and position than for love. They will rule their home with womanly dignity and be particularly fastidious about their dress and in a business-like way will be devoted wives, ambitious for the success of their husbands and children.

Children born under this sign will have strong likes and dislikes and a dominant will power. Their training should commence when they are babes in arms, with exceeding patience and kindness, qualities which must be instilled into their minds, else their naturally cold and exacting natures will greatly retard their development. They will study hard and uncomplainingly follow set rules. A systematic course of suitable reading should be adopted, and along with this a course in music, if they have a taste for music; but it is useless for those who have no music in their souls to try to cultivate this art. Try not to cross them in choice of wearing apparel; only insisting that it be simple, for they will evince much concern regarding their personal appearance. Praise them, and work through their pride to the development of self-control and the elimination of outbursts of temper. Teach them to do unto others as they would have others do to them.

The Lucky Opal is the October Birth-Stone

For centuries past the opal has been esteemed the talisman of "good luck" and now, in modern times, it is worn as the October birth-stone to symbolize hope that eternal springs in the human heart.

Hope inhabits the poor man's hut, as well as the abode of the rich, and presses forward and befriends when all else fails. True sentiment is one of the great blessings to the human heart, and when illumined by hope, it gives to all humanity a brighter forecast of days to come, that cheers and helps people over the difficult places in their lives.

In the early centuries the opal was called "beryl," and this pretty legend of ancient date proves the opal has been long associated with hopeful expectations:

"When fair October to her brings the beryl,
No longer need she fear misfortune's peril."

Selecting Birds for Next Season's Breeding

LAST week I went to a large poultry meeting and demonstration where there were representatives of many large plants in the East. Mr. Roy E. Jones, who is in charge of the extension work being conducted by the Storrs Agricultural College, gave some interesting and valuable demonstrations in selecting birds to be kept for next season's breeding pens, and explained at length how every one could cull out the birds not worth feeding through the winter. I was so favorably impressed by his talk that I am going to repeat it as nearly word for word as possible:

"Breeders should be selected first for vigor, second for high fecundity, and third for longevity. Vigor is of first importance in the breeding stock, hatching eggs, chicks, growing stock, and laying hens; for, without vigor, nothing can be accomplished. High fecundity, or the ability to transmit high egg production should be coupled with vigor. Longevity, or the ability to live and produce a profitable number of eggs for three years or over, eliminates the expensive necessity of renewing the larger part of the flock each year. These qualities may all be produced in the same bird by careful methods of selection and breeding.

Breeders should be selected in the fall while the marks of the year's production are evident and may be used for a guide. This, of course, eliminates the pullet from the breeding pen. Let the first year be for eggs only, then select the best birds, and keep them as long as there is reasonable production and a goodly number of strong, healthy chicks can be produced each year.

One very noticeable characteristic in the high producer is the lack of yellow pigment at the end of the laying year. It takes a lot of color material to make egg yolks, and the pullet that starts the year with bright yellow legs and beak will, if a high producer, finish with practically no yellow color. The vent is most easily affected and loses the yellow color after a very few eggs are produced. The earlobes are next easily affected, and may become quite pale after two or three weeks of heavy production. The earlobe test, of course, applies only to those breeds having white earlobes. The beak is affected next, usually losing its color after about three or four months of heavy production. When a bird stops laying the different parts gradually recover their color in the same order, earlobes first, beak next, and shanks last. Only strong, healthy birds should be considered, as sickness may, in some cases, cause a loss of yellow color.

High producers may be detected by the condition of the plumage at the end of the laying season. Birds do not, as a rule, lay and moult at the same time, although exceptions to this rule may sometimes be found. The birds that stop laying and moult in August or early September should be disposed of, as it appears that birds moulting late usually start laying again just as early in the winter as those that moult early. Trap nest records show that the birds that lay late and moult last are the birds that started laying first the previous fall. The late moulting birds are the highest producers, those moulting in November or later should be the best for breeding stock.

When selecting breeding stock, the pelvic bones may be used as an indication of present production. The pelvic bones are the two little bones either side of the vent between which the eggs must pass. If these bones are what poultry men term one finger apart, we may know the hen is not laying. If these bones are two, three or even four fingers apart, we may know that the hen is laying, provided she is not over fat or abnormal in some way. If these bones are widespread, thin and pliable, it indicates a high producer. If these bones are hard and rigid, even though they may be spread and the bird producing at the time, it indicates a low producer.

High producing hens must have a large capacity in order to allow for well-developed egg-producing organs. They must also have a large capacity for food materials and a strong digestive system. As the pullet matures and comes into laying condition, the breast bone is forced downward and forward to make the necessary room in the body cavity. Other things being equal, the capacity may be rated by the distance from the pelvic bones to the rear end of the breast bone. Relative measurements may be obtained by comparing birds of the same breed, as different sized birds would not be comparable.

High producing individuals invariably show what might be termed as quality, that is, soft, pliable skin over the breast bone and the abdominal cavity, and absence of hard fat. Some over fat birds may have widespread pelvic bones and show large capacity, but they are entirely lacking in quality, and consequently should be eliminated from the high producing class.

The activity of a bird is a very good indication of her production. The high producer must have more to eat of everything that a hen requires for production, consequently she is the first down in the morning and the last to roost at night. She will range farther and is always looking for something to eat. The best layer is the best worker every hour in the day.

From the time the breeding stock is selected in the fall, it should receive the very best of care, ever keeping in mind the fact that strong, fertile, hatchable eggs during the breeding season are essential to success. Health, vigor and vitality are necessary, and the winter should be spent in storing reserve energy which may be thrown into the hatching eggs.

Clean, dry quarters are absolutely necessary for good health. The house should be located where good water and air drainage may be had. Where the soil is suitable, and rats are troublesome, dirt floors are probably best. On damp land, moisture proof cement floors, well covered with soil or sand, are most satisfactory. Small flocks in small houses usually give slightly better results than large flocks.

Fresh air and sunshine are necessary in every poultry house. They are even more important in the breeding-house than in the laying-house. The open front, cloth front, or combination of glass and cloth seem to give the best results. In any case, the location of the openings should be such that the sun may reach every part of the house at some time during the day, and provide an abundance of ventilation without drafts in all kinds of weather. Sunshine is the best disinfectant, and fresh air is the best tonic.

Do not crowd breeding stock; allow four square feet of flour space or over to each bird. Allow the breeding stock to run out of doors every day in the year, but make the house so much more comfortable that they will not care to go out in bad weather. Clean litter in the houses, and a sheltered run outside, will encourage exercise.

Feed of the breeding stock need not be so different from that for the laying stock except that the protein in the mash may be reduced, and a larger proportion of whole grain fed. The ration should be quite bulky and rather low in beef scrap. The method of feeding is quite as important as the kind of food used. Scatter the grain in clean, dry litter, and keep the mash always before the birds. Use every possible means to encourage the birds to work.

Green food in some form is necessary every day in the year. Mangels are perhaps the most convenient and cheapest source of green feed. Hens will consume during the winter about one ton per one hundred birds. Cabbage or sprouted oats are also very satisfactory. The green food problem may be greatly simplified by using clover hay or at least a part clover hay for litter. Where clover is home grown, it is not an expensive form of litter, as the hens recover all the food value in the leaves, and the stalks are even better than straw. A fresh grass and clover sod is, of course, the best source of summer green food.

Sour skim-milk seems to be the most satisfactory single food that we have for poultry of all ages. When fed to breeding stock during the winter, better egg production, higher fertility, higher hatchability, and stronger chicks may be expected. Results will warrant paying at least one cent and sometimes two cents per quart for the breeding stock.

The whole object in caring for the breeding stock during the winter is the production of strong, healthy chicks. Remove from the breeding pen any chicks that show signs of sickness or weakness during the winter. The campaign for the eradication of Bacillary White Diarrhea by means of the agglutination test has proved beyond doubt that all breeding stock should be tested and any reacting individuals removed. This is the only means by which any breeder can be sure that his stock can be free from the disease. Quality in hatching eggs is more important than quantity. Quality in eggs means more and better chicks with much less expense in labor and equipment.

The one desire in incubation is the production of strong, viable chicks, that is, chicks strong enough to stand outdoor life rather than weak chicks that will require constant attention. Failures in incubation are due to poor eggs more often than to poor incubators, although the incubator usually gets the blame.

Even though the breeding birds may have been carefully selected, there will always be some eggs produced that are unfit for incubation. If possible, select only eggs that weigh about twenty-six ounces to the dozen. The extra large eggs are as undesirable as the extra small ones. Select eggs with strong shells, free from ridges or blind checks. So far as possible, select eggs of uniform color and shape.

Hatching eggs should be collected at least twice each day. They may be injured by cold weather in winter or broody hens in summer. They are also apt to get soiled or broken in the nest. An ample supply of good nesting material and some kind of nesting or padding in the basket or pail used for collecting eggs is desirable.

Much better results may be expected if eggs are incubated as soon after they are laid as possible. Eggs saved for hatching may be packed in cases and held at a temperature of about fifty to fifty-five degrees. If eggs are held more than four or five days, it would be well to turn the cases over each day or two. Where eggs are held more than ten days or two weeks, poor hatches and weak chicks are usually the result.

An incubator usually gives best results if operated in a cellar or basement. This is usually due to the fact that a uniform temperature and a moist atmosphere may be more easily maintained. Where an incubator is operated in a very dry atmosphere, it is advisable to add moisture either by using a moisture pan under the egg tray, or by sprinkling the eggs. The room where an incubator is operated should be well ventilated.

During incubation eggs are more easily injured by extreme heat than by extreme cooling. In spite of this fact, it is probable that more hatches are ruined by too low an average temperature than by too high an average temperature. Where the incubator is operated in a cold room it should be, as a rule, run a little high. With any reliable make of incubator, the manufacturer's directions are usually the safest guide for the beginner to follow.

It is quite an exertion for the chicks to pick their way out of the shell, consequently they should remain in the incubator at least thirty-six hours and be given time to rest and recover strength. If Bacillary White Diarrhea which is transmitted to the chick from the mother hen be present in any of the chicks, it will be voided in the droppings from the very first. To prevent the spread of this disease from chick to chick by the picking up of infected droppings, the incubator should be darkened as soon as the first chick is out and be kept darkened until the chicks are removed to the brooder. There is very little danger of disease spreading by this means after the chicks are moved to the brooder and have a chance to take food into the digestive system.

In brooding chicks, the whole object is to give the chicks the best possible start in life. Vigorous, active youngsters will grow and mature under unfavorable conditions, while poorly brooded chicks will not make satisfactory gains under the best conditions.

When chicks are removed from the incubator, it is time well spent to examine each individual and cull out all weaklings and cripples. Inferior chickens can never be disposed of any cheaper than when they are first hatched. Inferior chicks never make satisfactory gains, they are susceptible to disease, and are very often carriers of disease.

Chicks should be carefully moved from the incubator to the brooder and not subjected to any sudden change of temperature. Move the chicks in the afternoon, and allow them to run only a little way from the hover by placing cardboard or boards about a foot from the hover all around. The hover temperature should be about 98 degrees near the floor at the time the chicks are put in. After that, the chicks themselves are the best guide. The temperature should always be such that the chicks will lie around the outside edge of the hover. The general tendency with either lamp or coal burning brooders is to keep the room or compartment outside of the hover too warm. A warm hover and a comparatively cool room will do away with crowding in the corners and keep the chicks more healthy and vigorous. The heat should be reduced as rapidly as the comfort of the chickens will allow.

Sour skim-milk seems to give little chicks a better start in life than any thing else that can be fed. It is worth while to take each chick individually and dip its beak in sour milk so that it will get at least two or three good swallows at the time it is put into the brooder. Sour-milk is best fed in shallow pans with inch-mesh wire across the top. The milk should be kept before the chicks all of the time. Many breeders are having good results feeding milk and no water the first week or ten days, and even longer.

Pullets should be changed to their permanent winter laying houses before egg production starts. If pullets are moved after egg production is well started, a drop in egg yield will result and the fall moult will be encouraged. The fall moult may be caused also by light feeding on the range followed by heavy feeding in the laying houses. A colony system where the chicks are brooded, reared and allowed to stay as layers in the same house, is an ideal condition, there being less opportunity for a setback.

If pullets are allowed to remain in crowded colony houses, allowed to roost in the trees a little too late or allowed to crowd under the open front in their new winter quarters, fall colds are usually the result. Fall colds creep in quietly and are very hard to get rid of. To prevent the spread of colds, use permanganate of potash in the drinking water. Make a stock solution and use enough to color the water a deep cherry color. Copper sulphate may also be used at the rate of four ounces to one gallon of water for a stock solution, and one ounce of the stock solution to a gallon of drinking water. Where pullets are badly affected with colds, withhold the drinking water until about eleven o'clock, then use a solution of the disinfectant, and the pullets will disinfect their whole heads in their efforts to get at the water."

S. P.—I think the birds must be infested with some small mite or insect. Better rub the comb and wattles once a day with carbolic vaseline, or a mixture of lard and flour of sulphur.

R. P.—I fear this is a case of cholera. At the first symptoms of such bowel trouble as you describe, immediate measures should be taken to prevent the disease spreading as it is very contagious.

Cholera

In the majority of cases the so-called wholesale destruction of flocks is not cholera at all, but the work of lice. On some farms where the hens hide away at night here and there, for want of some kind of suitable shelter, the trees, woodpile, sheds, and under the barns, will be swarming with lice; and the dead hens will be found every morning, being literally eaten alive by myriads of lice, the cause being attributed to cholera or some disease, because the owner cannot compreaend how lice can be so destructive. On such farms there may be also found an apology for a henhouse, the floor of which will be covered for a foot or more with droppings, being the accumulation of years; but the house will be found useless, as the hens will prefer exposure to all kinds of weather rather than venture in the pest hole filled with lice and called a poultry house. Some farmers wonder how it is that they get no eggs, and they naturally ascribe their failure to there being "no money in chickens," when the fact is that if they were as negligent of their horses, cows, sheep and hogs as they are of their hens, they would go into bankruptcy the first year. Before undertaking to cure cholera, examine for lice, as in many instances the lice are at the root of all difficulties.

Genuine cholera is a disease that exists, however. It is shown by great thirst, greenish, profuse droppings and prostration. It can be distinguished from indigestion or roup, as it kills the bird in from twenty-four to forty-eight hours, or else recovery ensues. There is no lingering illness connected with it. The best remedy ever, add ten drops of the acid to each gill of water, and with the water mix together meal and shorts, slightly parched and browned, and force a tablespoonful of such soft food down their throats twice a day. Give no water to drink at all. If it is given however, add ten drops of the acid to each gill of water. Keep the sick birds in a dry, warm place, and separate from the others.

Every poultry keeper should cultivate the habit of scrutinizing his or her flock at meal time. A suspicious looking bird should be caught and removed to quarantine quarters immediately. The symptoms of cold, influenza, canker, diptheria and roup are in the earlier stages almost identical—watery eyes, sneezing, discharge from the nostrils, or the nostrils being stuffed up (nostrils are the two small holes at the base of the bill.) When the bird is noticed to have any one of these symptoms, open the bill and look down the throat. Should there be no signs of trouble, you may be sure that there is nothing but an ordinary cold to fight, which a few days in hospital will cure.

Give light and easily digested food, such as stale bread soaked in scalded milk and squeezed almost dry, or corn-meal which has been well steamed. Put ten drops of spirits of camphor on a lump of sugar; then dissolve the sugar in a half pint of water and use in the drinking cup. If, however, examination reveals yellow spots on the mouth or in the throat, or a thick, slimy discharge from the eyes and nostrils, it is a serious case of catarrh or roupy cold, which may, if neglected, develop into malignant roup. Throughout the entire list of roupy diseases there is no special odor until malignant roup is positively developed. Then there is a most offensive and unmistakable odor.

Treat all diseases which overstep a common cold as roup and you will err on the side of safety. In the last and most malignant cases of roup, the face and eyes or head are likely to be severely swollen, and if things have progressed to such a condition before the bird has been removed from the flock, it is well to take the precaution of disinfecting the drinking and feeding dishes and generally clean up the poultry house, and add a disinfectant to the drinking water for a few days. Permanganate of potassium is what I generally use, because it is cheap and most effective as a germ killer. Dissolve one teaspoonful in a quart of warm water, and you will have such a strong solution that for all ordinary purposes it can be diluted again at the rate of one teaspoonful to five of water.

F. K.—As the other birds in the same hatch are all well and strong, it seems safe to conclude that it is some individual weakness rather than any disease. Poultry—in fact, all animals—are sometimes born with faulty bodies or constitutions, which produce conditions which are beyond our knowledge or skill. I had a chicken which walked with its legs rather far apart when it was first hatched. It seemed strong and healthy, and we thought it would outgrow the weakness, but when it was about six weeks old it got worse, and commenced to fall about and at last we killed it. An examination showed that the backbone stopped just where the joints of the thigh commenced, and from there down there was nothing but flesh, and of course, as the bird got older, it affected its gait more and more. Of course, it was just a malformation, for which there is no cure.

Wonderful Egg Producer

Any poultry raiser can easily double his profits by doubling the egg production of his hens. A scientific tonic has been discovered that revitalizes the flock and makes hens work all the time. The tonic is called "More Eggs." Give your hens a few cents worth of "More Eggs" and you will be amazed and delighted with results. A dollar's worth of "More Eggs" will double this year's production of eggs, so if you wish to try this great profit maker, write E. J. Reefer, poultry expert, 3047 Reefer Bldg., Kansas City, Mo., who will send you a season's supply of "More Eggs" Tonic for $1.00 (prepaid). So confident is Mr. Reefer of the results that a million dollar bank guarantees if you are not absolutely satisfied your dollar will be returned on request and the "More Eggs" costs you nothing. Send a dollar today or ask Mr. Reefer for his Free poultry book that tells the experience of a man who has made a fortune out of poultry.

Some Hints on Fall Practise

WHILE it is ruinous practise to allow the dairy cows or adult cattle to pasture the new grass and clover on the stubble in fall, as they eat the "heart" out of it and may thus practically spoil the hay crop the following season, young pigs, after having rings put in their snouts, may be allowed to graze on such fields if no other green stuff is available. If this is done, however, one must watch that they do not graze too close and they should not be allowed to graze at all if the fall is very dry and the new grass slow in growth. The hog pasturing only is safe if clover is "booming" from an abundance of rain.

Such pasturing by pigs will not be necessary if a "cover" crop was seeded in the corn when "laying it by" or giving it the last cultivation for the season. A good mixture for that purpose, whether it is to be pastured or left for plowing under as "green manure" in spring, is three pecks of rye and two to four pounds each of alsike clover and rape or turnips. If the season is favorable there will be a fine growth of these green stuffs in fall and sheep and cattle also may graze the combination with benefit and profit. Dairy cows, however, should not be allowed to pasture rape as it tends to taint their milk.

In some parts of the country a new plan of tackling marshes has been introduced and the work may well be done in late fall, unless rains have caused much surface water on such low lands. It has been found that where horses would mire down or tire themselves quickly by wading in soft bog tractor wheels compress the soil and travel successfully. The tractor therefore is coming into use for the plowing of marshes too wet for horses to work profitably and when they have plowed once it may be possible to use horses for the next plowing or working of the land. The other new plan is to dig ditches with dynamite. In doing so it has been found necessary to cut through the turf and peat at the sides of the proposed ditch and in the center, then about three pounds of dynamite to the rod will make a clean job of the dirt excavating so that little hand work will be needed.

Many farmers delay getting out manure until winter has set in and this we consider a great mistake. Thin even spreading of manure is of great importance and the harder the manure is frozen the more difficult will it be to spread it properly. Often the winter hauled manure is forked out in big chunks which do not break down until late in summer and thus much of the land does not derive its proper share of benefit from the manuring. By starting the spreading of manure as early as possible after harvest and silo filling the spreader can be used to care for all manure accumulated during summer; then the winter manure may be spread by hand as it is made daily. Where manure is spread by hand harrowing is necessary and too little practised. An English chain harrow is the best possible implement for such work. It adjusts itself to the field surface and breaks up the chunks of manure splendidly; much better in fact than can be done with the tooth harrow or drag. It is better practise to cover as much land as possible thinly with manure than to concentrate all of the manure too thickly upon a small area. Put the manure on the high spots and side hills, and preferably upon grass land unless the stubble is to be plowed forthwith.

Oats generally were very heavy crop the past season and as a result clover and Timothy seeded with that crop largely was smothered out; on the contrary grass seeded with wheat or barley did well. In all districts where the winter is not severe and fall rains have softened the ground reseeding should be done. In the middle west it can be done any time before the end of September, so far as Timothy is concerned and in mild climates alsike clover may be added. On most of the stubbles some clover can be seen and it will help to make a crop of hay the following season, but we believe in sowing at least two quarts of Timothy seed per acre in fall where the catch of grass has been poor and then putting on the clover when the soil is honeycombed in spring after a late snow. A good spring mixture is six pounds of medium red clover and two each of Timothy, alsike clover and alfalfa per acre. If alfalfa is not wanted crimson clover may be used if dairy cows are to consume the hay, or a greater amount of Timothy seeded if horses are to be fed.

When cleaning up the orchard before winter and protecting every young tree with wire screening against rabbits and other vermin it is a fine plan to heavily mulch each tree, young and old, with strawy manure and to remulch in the same way in spring. Many people simply pile the mulch close up against the trunk of the tree, whereas it should extend at least six feet on every side of the trunk and in big trees as far as the branches extend. Even a heavy mulch of weeds is beneficial, but strawy manure is better. Fruit trees, like other farm crops, need plenty of fertility if they are to bear well and the old sod-bound orchard that neither is worked, mulched or manured will not pay expenses. At this time of the year it also is a good time to remove or burn every brush heap in the orchard—and all growing brush that will harbor rabbits, vermin and insects.

Cattle may be made much more comfortable during winter if their backs are washed with strong salt water or a mixture of two teaspoonfuls of coal tar dip to the pint of water at the time they are put into winter quarters and later when one first sees signs of ox warble grubs along the spine and in the skin of the loins. At the same time the stables should be cleansed, disinfected, whitewashed, lighted and well ventilated so that lice will not abound and cause misery and lack of thrift. Before putting the young cattle into the stables for winter they should be carefully examined and if lice are found these should be destroyed by use of a coal tar dip solution made according to directions given by the manufacturer. Hogs should be similarly treated and then kept free of lice and the horse stable should be made comfortable in the same way. Vermin by biting, sucking blood and causing discomfort reduce profits in the feeding, milking or working of farm animals and should be made "conspicuous by their absence" on every well-managed farm.

Indigestion in Calves

From every side comes advice just at present to raise every calf that is worth raising and that advice no doubt is good; but it seems to us as important to advise against the unnecessary losses so common in calf raising. Indigestion, in one form or another, is for example almost general and it takes a severe toll of calf life and calf strength in its ravages. Scouring is perhaps its most common and deadly evidence and much has been written on that subject so that it is fairly well understood and every farmer has his favorite remedy for the complaint. Chronic indigestion, however, is little understood, and while it does not cause so many deaths it does more harm in the long run than diarrhea, as few young, hand-fed calves are free from the trouble and on account of it they fail to develop properly and profitably and consequently may be stunted for life and also fail to produce the amounts of milk that should have been possible to them from their breeding.

In looking for the cause of such prevalent indigestion let it be understood that man feeds calves in an absolutely unnatural manner and indigestion is the penalty. In nature the young calf sucks often taking comparatively small quantities of milk slowly into its fourth or true stomach. That stomach is the only one of the four compartments fully developed for reception and digestion of food by the young calf. It contains the rennet for curdling of milk and such curdling takes place quickly after the milk enters that compartment. When a calf sucks milk saliva which is alkaline freely mixes with the milk and prepares it for curdling. It prevents formation of a very tough, indigestible curd or clot. When a calf drinks a large quantity of milk quickly the milk is not acted upon by saliva, not properly prepared for action by the rennet and so forms a tough curd in the fourth stomach which cannot readily be digested by the calf.

Every young calf should suck its milk either from the teats or from artificial teats of a self-feeder. It is all wrong to let a calf drink a large quantity of milk, new or skim, just twice a day. It gets far too hungry for milk where this is done and so drinks too fast and suffers from indigestion. Better copy nature and feed the calf a little often and in some way that will necessitate sucking or at least slow drinking.

Many a dairyman has wondered why calves suck one another's ears or udders after drinking milk and will be interested to hear that in all probability this is an evidence of instinct which leads the calf to attempt correction of indigestion by inducing a flow of saliva into the stomach by the act of sucking. It is a well-known fact that the salivary glands are very active while sucking or chewing is going on and that they are practically dormant when the animal is not eating and when it is drinking. Every animal therefore should be given a chance to masticate its feed thoroughly so that saliva will have its full and necessary effect and in the same way the calf should suck, or take its milk very slowly to derive the needed benefit from saliva.

Fast drinking of milk by very young calves also may cause sudden death from spasm or convulsions (fits). Indigestion no doubt leads up to such attacks. They do not affect the sucking calf so long as the mother's milk agrees perfectly; but in some instances we have seen them killed quickly when something had rendered the mother's milk practically poisonous. More acute indigestion than we have been writing of may also be induced by allowing the very young calf to eat much coarse, bulky feed which cannot properly be digested in the fourth stomach. In the older animal such roughage is stored in the first stomach (paunch) and thence goes back to the mouth several times for perfect mastication and insalivation.

The lessons to be learned from what has been said here are to feed a young calf milk at least three times a day instead of twice, to make it suck its milk or drink it very slowly and to keep it from eating much roughage before its stomachs have developed sufficiently to care for such feed. It may be added that if possible the calf feeding should be done by a woman or trained feeder. Too often it is done by young children who neither have the experience or good judgment necessary for satisfactory results.

Taints in Milk

In answer to several inquiries relative to taints in milk we shall here set down some of the facts on the subject which should be understood by every dairyman, and at the outset it should be stated that prevention is of most importance in this connection.

It commonly is held by even quite practical owners of cows that bad odors inhaled by the cow always taint her milk. The writer was taught this as a fact but since has learned that it rarely if ever proves true in practise. Once we knew of a case that seemed to prove that inhaled smells do taint milk. At a time when foot and mouth disease was prevalent the walls of a stable in which several hundred cows were kept for the production of milk for city consumption were painted with a composition containing crude carbolic acid which has a strong odor. Next day the consumers complained as a body that the milk was badly tainted, and so it was. We believed at the time that the cows inhaled the carbolic acid tainted air and so tainted their milk. We now know that the new warm milk absorbed the odor at milking time when exposed to the tainted air.

The butter fat of milk very readily absorbs smells or scents. Try an experiment by exposing new warm milk to the scent of sweet clover, or even red, white or alsike clover in blossom, and it will be found that the scent is absorbed and will be noticeable in the butter; yet the milk and butter from cows fed on these clovers has no appreciable acquired scent or taste on that account.

Prevent so far as possible exposing milk to any strong odor. Even exposing it to the air of a dirty, badly ventilated stable will be enough to cause a disagreeable odor and taste and cream often is tainted for butter making by setting it in shallow pans in a damp basement where there is a marked "cellar smell" and the additional smell from potatoes and other vegetables.

Cows also taint their milk by eating plants that have a strong, rank taste and smell. Let a cow eat an ancient cabbage and the milk will be badly tainted in consequence and this danger of tainting makes dairymen afraid to feed cabbage, turnips, rutabagas and rape. By feeding just after milking there is less danger from this source. Wild onions in timber pastures in spring also give milk a most disagreeable flavor and we get more inquiries about this form of tainting than any other.

While taking every possible precaution to prevent milk from absorbing abnormal odors it is equally important to rid milk as quickly as possible from animal heat after milking. In big dairies this is accomplished by letting the new milk run in a very thin sheet or stream over the surface of a corrugated metal container of ice cold water. This cooling aerating of the milk quickly gets rid of animal heat and absorption of odors and growth of germs is thus largely prevented.

This plan of aeration even will remove much of the unpleasant taste due to the eating of cabbage or wild onions, but we can add another preventive or remedial measure and that is to give the cows sulphur and baking soda in their feed when tainting has been noticed. Give a teaspoonful of each twice daily at first and if necessary increase the dose to one tablespoonful twice daily. Give this treatment in every case where milk has a disagreeable odor and taste. We have also found powdered wood charcoal, freely fed, fairly effective when indigestion is the cause of "strong" milk.

Drying Potatoes

It is said that the German soldiers now fighting in the trenches are fed on potatoes grown four years ago. To the American farmer this seems impossible, but when he learns that the Germans have a process of drying potatoes, his disbelief vanishes.

Out of dried potatoes there is manufactured potato flakes, "flocken" and potato flour. These products have a considerable sale in this country and since this trade has been interrupted by the war, there is growing up here a new industry, that of drying potatoes. This industry promises much to the potato grower.

WHAT POTATO DRYING WILL DO FOR THE FARMER.—In the first place it will equalize the supply. In years of heavy production the extra supply will be dried and stored for future use. This will reduce the available supply of raw potatoes and better prices will result.

Second: it will enable us to carry over this dried stock in safe storage from year to year. Since the water is all evaporated it will reduce freight charges and the amount of space required for storage.

Third; it will utilize the small and inferior stock and throw on the market for table use a much higher quality of raw potatoes.

Fourth: it will have a steadying effect upon prices and thus enable farmers to be much more certain of the prices they will likely receive at harvest time.

HOW POTATOES ARE DRIED.—They are first put through a cylinder that catches the dirt and stones and pushes the potatoes along to another compartment where they are thoroughly washed. They then pass into a vat where they are cooked and let out between two steam heated rollers where they are dried in thin sheets in much the same manner that paper is made. From these cylinders they are scraped off in thin sheets and conveyed away to be packed in sacks as potato flakes or ground into potato flour.

As yet there is only a limited market for these products in this country but it is probable that such a market will grow as the industry develops.

Farming Without Horses

There is a man in Wisconsin who has never had a horse on his farm. Two years ago he settled on the cut-over land of Marinette county and began clearing his farm with a big tractor. For two years he has plowed and harrowed his land, planted, cultivated and harvested his crop, all without the aid of horse power.

This man's experience is but a forecast of what will inevitably happen, and that without doubt in a very few years. The horse will disappear from the farm when practical power becomes available as a substitute for horse power, just as surely and perhaps just as completely as he has already disappeared from city streets.

Shredded Corn Fodder

Shredded fodder excels corn-stalks as a feeding stuff for several reasons.

In the first place a large amount may be conveniently stored in a much smaller place and it can be blown direct from the shredder to the mow where it is to be stored.

In the next place shredded fodder is much more conveniently handled. It can be easily fed and the refuse used for bedding and finally thrown out with the manure where it is easily spread upon the land.

Shredded fodder has a higher feeding value than corn-stalks because more of it is eaten by stock. Only the coarsest parts are rejected and these make good bedding, as already suggested, and act as absorbents for the liquid manure which may otherwise be lost.

DIFFICULTIES IN SHREDDING.—It is harder work to haul corn to the shredder than it is to haul the stalks after the corn has been husked. However, the labor of husking, being done by machinery at the same time, is thus saved.

The danger of accident from being caught in the machine is greater in shredding corn than in any other farm operation. While it is possible to guard these machines, yet the necessary construction of the shredder is such as to invite accident, hence the greatest of care is necessary at shredding time.

The Questions and Answers constitute one of the most valuable features of this department and we urge our farmer subscribers to read all of them carefully each month, as you will find that they contain much useful information and advice on practical problems that are troubling you as well as those who have asked the questions. Cut them out and paste them into a scrapbook for future reference. This will save you the trouble of writing us and will avoid delay in getting your answer when you need advice on these same matters. We are glad to receive inquiries from our subscribers and to advise them on all matters pertaining to farming.

Questions and Answers

ONION MAGGOT.—Please tell me what to do for young onion plants so the worms will not destroy them. MRS. J. H. K., Menominee, Mich.

A.—The onion maggot is hard to control. Bi-sulphide of carbon poured on the ground in small quantities between the rows is the best remedy. It is too expensive to be profitable on a large scale. Garden crops should be rotated.

SOUTHERN TOMATO BLIGHT.—My early June tomatoes grew fine, blossomed and were full of large green fruit when the plants began to look as though they had been scalded and a white mildew came on them and the green tomatoes began to rot. The entire crop is a failure. Can you tell me what the trouble is and the remedy?

MRS. I. Mc. E., Spring Hill, W. Va.

A.—From your description it appears that your tomatoes are affected with Southern blight for which no remedy is known. Send samples to your Experiment Station at Morgantown, W. Va. for identification. Practise rotation of crops.

WEEVILS.—Please give me the name, and tell how to use the preparation for killing bugs or weevils that hatch in and destroy dry beans. We lose a great many beans in this way.

MRS. C. F. R., Littleton, Ky.

A.—Use carbon bi-sulphide. Place beans in a covered box. Put carbon bi-sulphide in open dishes on top to evaporate. Keep box covered and all fire away. Do not go near for twenty-four hours. Carbon bi-sulphide is both poisonous and explosive. Weevils in dry peas and grain may be treated in the same way.

WIREWORMS.—Worms about the size of wire, black with one white stripe, are eating the stalks of my potatoes, corn, tomatoes and cabbages, beginning just above the ground. After they get to work on a plant it soon wilts and dies. I have a half-acre garden and I hate to lose it. What can I do to get rid of these worms?

MRS. M. P. M., Strawberry Point, Iowa.

A.—For wireworms plow land in the fall and freeze them out. Also practise crop rotation. To destroy use arsenate of lead, one half ounce dissolved in a gallon of water. Make a sweetened corn meal mash wetting with this poison water, and sprinkle over ground near plant, or soak fresh clover in this poison water and place it under boards scattered about the field.

How to Handle the Spark

FROM observation it will be seen that practically every make of car incorporates some means of advancing the spark. Some engineers use what is termed the automatic advance which is an arrangement whereby the spark automatically advances to compensate for the different speeds of the motor. The common practise, however, is to install a spark lever usually on top of the steering wheel and which can be manipulated as the operator may see best fit. From reading over the instruction book furnished with the car one usually learns that the ignition timing is such that the spark takes place in the cylinder when the piston is at the height of its compression stroke or for the sake of safety, just as the piston has passed top center and has started to go down. If this is the case one is apt to ask himself the question why is a spark advance necessary as the ideal condition is to have the spark occur when the piston is at the height of its compression stroke. The facts of the case are that all electric current whether it be taken from a battery or magneto is primary, that is, it is not of sufficient pressure to jump the gap at the spark plug and therefore must be converted into a current known as secondary. This transformation is usually accomplished by use of a transformer coil. Many cars incorporate a high tension magneto and when such is the case no transformer coil is needed because the instrument itself incorporates both primary and secondary windings and therefore can handle the transformation. To complete this transformation from primary to secondary a certain amount of time is required and this time remains the same whether the engine be running at slow speed or high speed. The time for changing the current over is commonly referred too as the "lag." It is therefore obvious that if the spark will take place in the cylinder at top center when the engine is turned over by hand and there is a definite amount of time required for the transformation, at high engine speeds the spark would take place too late unless there was some arrangement to compensate for the lag. Still another reason for the necessity of advancing the spark is that it requires the same amount of time to fully expand the gasoline-air mixture in the cylinder. Although these so termed lags are but very short yet in view of the fact that the average engine is capable of anywhere from 1000 to 2000 revolutions per minute, at such speeds the lag would be sufficient to cause the spark to take place after the piston had started on its downward stroke, thereby lowering the compression and resulting in wasted fuel, lost power and decreased speed. It is impossible to set any one rule for the manipulation of the spark lever but one by which the operator will not go far wrong is to carry the spark lever as far advanced as possible without causing the motor to knock or labor.

A. Illustrating what takes place within the cylinder when the car is cranked with a slightly advanced spark. Note that the piston has not passed over the center point and were it not due to the power developed by the electric starter the motor would run in a reverse direction. If the motor was cranked with a hand crank a condition such as this is very apt to result in broken limbs.

B. The ideal condition. Complete combustion of the gases is taking place just after the piston has passed the center point and is starting on its downward stroke.

C. Somewhat exaggerated illustration showing what takes place if the throttle lever is advanced and the spark leve fully retarded. Due to the "lag" complete combustion does not occur until the piston has completed much of its down ward stroke. Such a condition results in lost fuel, decreased power and rapid carbonization of the cylinders.

Many drivers place the lever at the furthest advance point possible and then forget that there is any such part connected with the car. This kind of driver is the first to condemn design, construction, etc., when the car slows down on a hill and the engine commences to knock. The facts are that the knock and the sluggish operation are directly due to preignition. In other words full expansion of the gasoline-air mixture is taking place before the piston has passed top center and were it not for the momentum stored by the flywheel there would be a tendency for the engine to operate in a reverse direction. One of the first lessons taught the beginner is to make certain that the spark lever is fully retarded before starting the engine by means of the hand crank. Should the lever be in the advanced position the spark and complete combustion would take place before the piston had passed over top center and the result would be that the motor would be driven in a reverse direction, jerking the crank out of the operator's hand and many times breaking a few of his limbs. The reason for this back fire, as it is commonly termed, is that the operator cannot develop sufficient power to force the piston over the top center mark against the expanding gases.

Due to the fact that the majority of the present day cars are equipped with electric starters operators are inclined to be careless regarding the position of the spark lever when starting. Although the electric starter will no doubt develop sufficient power to carry the piston over the top center mark against the expanding gases yet in 99 cases out of every 100 damage will be done to the starter. The usual result is that the starter is made to hesitate momentarily thus allowing an excessive amount of current to be delivered to the starting motor commutator which naturally results in the burning of the commutator and brushes. Many an operator has seen fit to condemn the starter when it refused to respond when in reality he is to blame because of the manner in which he handled the spark lever. There is but one remedy for a burned starting motor commutator and that is to remove the the armature and place it on centers in a lathe. A small chip must then be taken with a cutting tool so as to bring the surface of the commutator smooth and true. Sand papering is not sufficient as the commutator would be oval shape and rapid brush wear would be experienced.

By referring to the sketches some idea may be gained about what takes place within a cylinder when the spark lever is incorrectly handled.

Gasoline Economy

In these days of high price gasoline one is often asked by his neighbor "What mileage are you getting?" and the usual reply is "How much are you receiving?" Due to the high price of fuel, owners and drivers are paying closer attention than ever before to gasoline consumption. However for the most part owners are becoming dissatisfied, due to the fact that they do not know how to accurately figure mileage. The usual method for the owner is to take the reading of the speedometer at different fillings of the gasoline tank, dividing the number of miles covered by the number of gallons of fuel used. This method is far from being accurate for the reason that much gasoline is consumed for which no mileage is recorded by the speedometer. There is but one accurate way of making an economy test and that is by affixing a special one gallon test tank to some convenient part of the machine connecting the auxiliary tank to the carburetor by a suitable length of rubber tubing. After the motor has become thoroughly warm the car should be driven on a straight away course until all gasoline in the special tank is consumed. It is obvious that the difference between the reading of the speedometer at the beginning and end of test is the actual mileage received to the gallon of gasoline. This is a conclusive test and the only reason that a satisfactory mileage is not received at other times is the way the car is handled. Many operators frequent congested districts and forget that they are called upon to make several stops and starts. This kind of operating eats up much fuel as it is necessary each time to accelerate the motor, run through the different gears, etc. Of course the character of the road, smooth, rough or hilly, makes a difference. Other operators will allow the motor to run idle for long periods at a time, for example, while stopping in front of the house, office, store or holding conversation with a friend. In fully 90 per cent of the cases an owner, if he will give the matter the consideration for which it calls, will realize that he has no complaint to register against gasoline consumption.

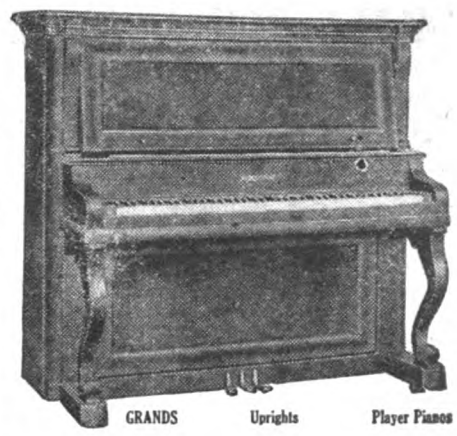
Go Easy on the New Car

All engineers and trained mechanics agree that there is nothing so injurious to a new piece of mechanism than to start right out and get the speed out of it. For example after a designer has finished a new boat he gradually "works in" the engines before submitting the job to a trial run. Likewise a locomotive designed to do 60 miles or better per hour is first given long loosening up treatment. Usually the engine is first given much dead head work, that is, drawn by another engine after which it is consigned to slow freight duty and then following the process of evolution, so to speak, is turned over to fast passenger service.

The same principle should hold good concerning the automobile, but this is not usually the case for the reason that the machine falls into the hands of an inexperienced operator who too soon has aspirations to rival Dario Resta, the speed king. It is true that a motor is given a thorough working out at the factory but after this workout it is customary to give all bearings a final adjustment. Therefore in order to work these bearings into a nice fit the car for the first 500 miles, at least, should not be operated at a speed greater than twenty-five miles per hour. Be content to know that the speed is there and that by exercising a little sound judgment for a while you are prolonging the life of the car, insuring a smoother operating motor and reducing repair bills.

How to Wash the Car

It is human nature that motorists should take pardonable pride in the highly polished finish of the new car. However, through ignorance on the part of the owner considerable damage can be done to the finish by improper washing. Usually when it is decided to wash the car there is an accumulation of mud or dust on the body. When such is the condition a stream of water of considerable pressure will have a tendency to drive the fine particles of dirt into the varnish causing the same to chip or at least lose its luster. The proper method of procedure is to soften the mud and dust by applying a very gentle stream of clear cold water. In a very short time the gentle stream will loosen the dirt and it will wash away with the water. Next rub the high finish with a clean sponge using all the while an abundance of water. To restore the luster rub the body dry with a clean chamois skin which has previously been wrung out of water. To obtain the best results make gentle strokes with the chamois and keep the rubbing motion in one direction usually lengthwise of the panel.



Think of the Pedestrian

A recent decision handed down by the courts is to the effect that operators who drive fast through puddles and mud holes splashing the mire on nearby pedestrians are liable. Any motorist who will give the matter the consideration for which it calls will realize that by applying the "juice" when operating in such places causes the mud and water to scatter for a considerable distance and that an indignant pedestrian may go beyond a mere verbal outburst. Therefore, when operating under such conditions be thoughtful, give the walker his rights and you will save yourself trouble and expense.

Questions Answered

CARBURETOR OVERFLOWS.—The carburetor of my Ford car does not leak when the engine is running, but as soon as the engine is stopped the gasoline leaks out of the carburetor; the leak is slow but continual when engine is not running. G. H., Mound City.

A.—An intelligent answer is impossible for the reason you have failed to state the year in which your car was manufactured or the make of carburetor used. You cannot go wrong however by removing the carburetor from motor and subjecting it to a thorough cleaning. It may be possible that a piece of dirt has become lodged between the inlet needle and its seat or that the needle is pitted or corroded. Make certain that the float is free to act, is not gasoline soaked and that the gasoline level is not set too high. Believe that a letter to the maker of the carburetor will bring complete descriptive literature on the care of the instrument.

Must Have Had Feet Like a Table

A young hunter went up into the hills of West Virginia to "try his luck." There was one "point" in the hills almost perfectly round, and the soil was so loose and dry that it was easily marked by the feet of a passing animal. The hunter saw turkey tracks the moment he had reached the point, and followed them. They circled and re-circled the point, and still no turkey appeared. The tracks were fresh, too.

"There's only one thing about it? That turkey just watches my tracks and keeps following just in back of me," thought the young man. Accordingly he took off his shoes, put them on backward, and so went round the point and got the baffled turkey!—Youth's Companion.

VETERINARY INFORMATION

Subscribers are invited to write to this department asking for any information desired relative to the treatment of animal troubles. Questions will be answered in these columns free by an eminent veterinarian. Describe the trouble fully, sign full name and give your address; direct all correspondence to the Veterinary Department, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

No atttention will be given any inquiry which lacks the sender's full name and address, but we will print only initials if so requested.

FOUNDER.—I am milking a cow that seems to be stiff in her joints. Her hoofs grow out too long. Her feet are so tender she can hardly walk. Her hoofs have been trimmed, once by a veterinarian, but have grown out again. What can be done for her? She is a good milker. C. L. B.

A.—Founder (laminitis) has caused the unsound condition of the feet and consequent lameness and the trouble is practically incurable. Keep the hoofs trimmed to as near normal shape as possible and let the cow stand during the daytime on a clay floor kept wet. At night allow her a box stall. Or let the cow run on a low, wet pasture. Treatment other than this will not be likely to help. At time of attack large doses of alum or saltpeter might have proved remedial.

TUMOR.—I have a cow that has a lump on her jaw which seems to be loose in the flesh, but is hard. It came suddenly, and the jaw was badly swollen for twenty-four hours. E. H.

A.—Paint the lump once daily with tincture of iodine and if it does not disappear the only resource will be to have it dissected out by a veterinarian.

SCOURS.—Please publish remedy for scours in calf or pig. F. O.

A.—We cannot give confident advice unless you give full particulars as there are many forms of scours and the causes are many and different. As a rule, however, a preliminary dose of Castor oil in milk proves most beneficial and should be followed by repeated doses of subnitrate of bismuth. The dose is 20 to 60 grains for a calf according to size and 10 to 20 grains for a pig.

LAMENESS.—I have a colt which was one year old last spring. It has the stifle out. It has been that way for six months. What will cure it? MRS. C. B. S.

A.—You do not describe the symptoms but were the stifle "out," or in other words, if the patella (knee cap) of the stifle had slipped out of place, the leg would be thrust stiffly backward and couldn't be advanced. We do not take that to be the condition. If there is enlargement and lameness of the stifle joint rub in 10 per cent iodine vasogen or petrogen twice daily. If, as often is the case, infection of the navel caused the diseased condition of the stifle it will be likely to prove incurable.

LUMP ON NOSE.—My mare five years old, has a hard lump on her nose which appeared within twenty-four hours. A year ago she got her nose hurt with a thorn or barb wire, leaving a thick hide. Six months ago pus appeared for a few days. The lump is the size of half of a hen's egg. It is on the center of her nose and seems to be on the bone. What can I do for it? J. B.

A.—Paint the lump with tincture of iodine and then have it opened for removal of a thorn, other foreign body or diseased bone. It should then heal readily.

SKIN TROUBLE.—I have a mule that has some kind of a skin trouble. The skin rises up in little bunches and the hair comes off, and white hair comes in, in the places where the bunches are. When the mule is working and is warm they seem to itch. He is in fair condition. W. H.

A.—Clip the mule at once and wash itching parts with a 1-100 solution of coal tar dip and repeat the application as often as found necessary. It is quite likely that chicken lice have caused the irritation and this should be made impossible.

DEATH OF HARE.—I have some Belgian hares and one of the mother rabbits died very suddenly leaving six baby rabbits. She didn't seem to be sick, just frothed at the mouth like she was poisoned and fell over dead. The baby rabbits have all died the same way. Can you tell me what the trouble was and is there any remedy for it? A Subscriber.

A.—The doe probably died from septic inflammation (metritis) of the womb and the young from starvation or sucking of poisonous milk. A vaginal injection of a lukewarm two per cent solution of boric acid given after birth of the young possibly might have prevented the attack. In our experience however, Belgian hares are very delicate and many of them afflicted with tuberculosis so that some deaths may be expected under such circumstances.

WARTS.—I have a yearling calf that has seed warts on her legs and between them. Please tell me a way to get rid of them.

A.—Once daily saturate the affected parts with best Castor oil, or fresh goose grease; or even with axle grease, and the warts will soon disappear. They are not due to "bad blood" and are not contagious. The exact cause of warts is unknown.

CHICKEN-EATING SOW.—I have a fine sow that has just begun to catch chickens. Is there a cure? MRS. D. C.

A.—This vice may be prevented by partially blindfolding the sow in the following way: Cover the forehead and eyes with the bent leather piece from the back part of a shoe, above heel, and fasten it to the ears by means of hognose rings so it will stay in place. The sow will be able to see to eat and graze but will be unable to catch chickens.

SCOURS.—I had two yearling calves that died, apparently from the scours. They were sick about three weeks. They were running on a dry pasture, where they had been all their lives. Thinking it might be something they were eating, I turned the other calves into another pasture; one of them is now affected in the same way. I did not give them as much salt as I should have done, because the hogs were in the same pasture. J. D. A.

A.—It is quite possible for calves to poison themselves by taking too much salt after having been deprived of it for some time. Scouring is a chief symptom of such poisoning.

STAGGERS.—Can you tell me what was the trouble with my cow? She had scours then went dry. Her kidneys did not act for a week. Her bowels seemed to be locked. She went wild and would run all over the pasture. She had fits running around in the stable and bawling until she died. (2) My dog takes spells of stretching his fore feet and groaning as though he was in great pain. Sometimes he will not eat. M. J. B.

A.—The cow ate something poisonous or that caused impaction stoppage of the bowels following scours. Some moldy feed might cause it as the symptoms are those of forage poisoning. Rabies from the bite of a mad dog would present somewhat similar symptoms. (2) The dog no doubt is troubled with worms. Starve him for eighteen hours or more and then give him one to two drams of freshly powdered kamala in cream or soup. Give commercial worm medicine if the druggist cannot supply kamala. Repeat the dose in two weeks.

OVERHEATED MARE.—I have a mare about twelve years old, weighing thirteen hundred pounds and in good flesh. She has been overheated at some time and so bad that when it is real hot I can hardly use her at all. She will not sweat and pants. Is there anything I can use, or is there any way of feeding her as I am short of horses? I feed corn and Timothy hay when not in use. Part of the time I use oil meal with the corn when feeding. J. H. C.

A.—A horse so affected never works comfortably in hot weather. Some improvement may follow if you feed oats in place of corn and work the mare only in the cool of the morning and evening. If you must work her in the sun sheet her body and shade her head. Allow a little drinking water often. She may sweat if three times a day for two or three days in succession you give her one half an ounce of aromatic spirits of ammonia and a teaspoonful of powdered ginger root in a pint of warm tea as a drench.

RUPTURE.—I have two mare mule colts that have enlarged navels; the pouch, if round, would be about the size of a small walnut with hull on, or about one and one half to two inches in diameter. This pouch contains a soft substance and is not tender nor sore. MISS S. A. F.

A.—Small umbilical (navel) ruptures are present and gradually will disappear without treatment as the mules develop.

SWOLLEN GLANDS.—I have a young mare which had distemper last spring. It left a lump on each side of her throat. I have tried blistering. Can you give a good distemper cure?

A.—The parotid glands have been left enlarged and may remain so. Clip off the hair and rub in some iodine ointment every other day. There is no cure for distemper (strangles). That disease has to run its course just as is the case with measles in a child, and good nursing and feeding are more important than medicine. The abscess should be poulticed until soft and then opened for liberation of pus after which recovery quickly occurs.

FITS; COLIC.—What ails my dog? Every spring he is all humped up, slobbering a little, and his head keeps jerking upward or backward. He refuses to eat anything. After getting better his hair will come out along his back. (2) What can be done for horses with severe colic? G. M. B.

A.—Worms probably cause the fits. To prevent them at the season of the year when they have been known to occur starve the dog for twenty-four hours and then give him one to two teaspoonfuls of freshly powdered kamala in cream or soup and repeat the dose in ten days. At time of fit give twenty grains of bromide of potash in water and repeat the dose in twenty minutes, if seen to be necessary. (2) There are several kinds of colic. Have on hand for immediate use a "Colic drench" bought from a graduate veterinarian. Laymen cannot now buy the narcotics used for colic. It is safe to give a pint of raw linseed oil containing a tablespoonful of turpentine or two and some essence of ginger.

at her as indifferently as if he were not taking in every point in her lovely, mutinous face.

"So would you be. At least, I don't know," with frank rudeness. "Perhaps at your age you would not care."

She bestowed a look on him for the first time, but without a shade of coquetry. The man might have been a tree or a stone for all she cared. It was not the way women usually regarded Lord Levallion, and it interested him. He turned his high-bred, worn face, with the lines of forty-seven years on it, toward her with a keen glance which somehow reminded her of Adrian. The thought brought a fresh lump in her throat.

"I wish I could go home," she said miserably. "I—I've lost something, and I'd like to get home and look for it. If it wouldn't make a hue and cry I'd walk home now."

She had not had one happy minute since discovering her ring was gone. Had turned from the wondering Tommy, digging for his beer in the parsley, and run up-stairs like a frantic, raging child, to the door of Lady Annesley's room. And there something stopped her like a tangible thing. She stood motionless, with clenched hands, felt cold in the warm May air that flooded through an open window. Why had she come running up here like a fool, when she knew she dared not open that shut door in front of her and demand her ring of the woman inside?

"If I said Adrian had given me a ring she'd never let me set eyes on him again!" she thought, with more truth than she knew. "She knows I never had a ring. She'd ask—and what could I say? I might lie, but it's no use to lie to a liar; they know too much. And, perhaps, she hasn't taken it—perhaps I dropped it! I was out in the garden before breakfast. I'll wait! I'll tell Adrian tomorrow. It's no use to give myself away for nothing."

And here was tomorrow—and no Adrian. Man her small, averted head. "Then I will smoke. Don't rub your eyes unless you want the whole world to know you've been crying," looking down his nose at the cigarette he was lighting. "And the more you have been crying the less you probably want people to know it."

"No one would have known it if you hadn't been here!" she said angrily. "Now I suppose you'll tell the duchess."

"Why the duchess?" Anything to make her talk. It was a sin to let so lovely a face be cried into hideousness. He hoped devoutly she would not blow her nose! Women usually did when they cried.

"It's her party, so you must know her. And I don't know whether you know any one else or not."

"I have not the honor of knowing you, at all events," he returned coolly. "So that I couldn't tell the duchess if I wanted to—which I don't."

"It doesn't matter who I am." She bit her handkerchief desperately. "I wish I was anybody—I wish I were dead!"

"That is a wish you are certain to get—in time! It's not worth while to cry because you despair of it," blandly.

"I'm not crying." She turned her small, white face to him, and her eyes were dry, if her lip still quivered.

"No, but you are extremely unhappy," looking

YOU HAVE A BEAUTIFUL FACE

But Your Nose?

Before After

IN THIS DAY AND AGE attention to your appearance is an absolute necessity if you expect to make the most out of life. Not only should you wish to appear as attractive as possible, for your own self-satisfaction, which is alone well worth your efforts, but you will find the world in general judging you greatly, if not wholly, by your "looks," therefore it pays to "look your best" at all times.

Permit no one to see you looking otherwise; it will injure your welfare! Upon the impression you constantly make rests the failure or success of your life. Which is to be your ultimate destiny? My new Nose-Shaper, "Trados" (Model 22) corrects now ill-shaped noses without operation, quickly, safely and permanently. Is pleasant and does not interfere with one's daily occupation, being worn at night.

WHAT OTHERS HAVE TO SAY:

Miss C. R.—After using my "Trados 22" for only two weeks sees a wonderful improvement in the shape of her nose.

Mr. R. P. writes—Your Nose Shaper is doing the work and I am certainly pleased with it; will recommend it to my friends.

Dr. F. D. G. writes and says that after he had used it for two weeks he thinks that "Trados 22" is fine and will recommend it to his patrons.

Mr. J. B. is very pleased with the Nose Shaper and his nose looks much better.

Miss K. W. says that she is getting fine results and is very much elated over the Nose Shaper.

Write today for free booklet, which tells you how to correct ill-shaped noses without cost if not satisfactory.

WILL MEND IT 10c

Conducted by Cousin Marion

In order that each cousin may be answered in this column, no cousin must ask more than three questions in one Month.

THE restful autumn days of October are with us again. Mellow sunshine, the fall russet colors of frost touched foliage, the lengthening evenings; all sounds so peaceful and doesn't it feel so when we can forget the awful war? I like to believe that before another year comes around the world will be at peace again and we will no longer have to be worrying about our boys who are so nobly doing their duty. But in the meantime we must be thankful that we have such a beautiful world to live in while we are knitting and otherwise making the winter comforts for our soldier and sailor friends. We must be grateful that we have the health and strength to do our "bit" in overcoming the dark forces that would ruin us if we were not awake. And now I must see what perplexities and questions I can solve from this great pile of letters I have received from you lately.

Loving-the-unknown-cousin, Cleveland, Ohio.—Tell your mother that your doctor kisses you when you are alone. She will know best whether it is right or not. His interest in you may be right but it doesn't sound right and I would definitely say it was not right if you didn't have a mother to confide in. Ask her at once. If he thinks it is right why does he omit the kisses when your mother is present?

D. B., Mineral Wells, Texas.—Put in all your spare time reading good books, newspapers and magazines. Be well informed in current events and learn to be a good listener. The intelligent girl never fails to be interesting if she can listen and can talk back interestedly. You apparently have a good foundation for enlarging upon your education. Don't think of yourself, but try to think how you can make others enjoy themselves. Go about all you can.

Blue Eyes and Blonde, Meridan, Texas.—One of you twenty-five and the other thirty years of age, and I certainly would never have suspected that you were graduates of a Normal School. Really you should keep up with your studies or be more careful. Just think of a school teacher telling me that one of the young men had proposed and the other "is being expected two." Dear, dear, you are old enough to know whether you love the men or not. If you do love them, marry them and rear all those children you speak about. If you don't love the men, don't be silly and sentimental, but wait until the right one comes along. Perhaps you won't be so "Oh so lone-ly and for-lorn" as you think.

M. E. T., Russellville, Ark.—Write to the sailor boy again if you want to. You have never met him and neither of you are in love with the other or likely to be. It helps to cheer the sailors and soldiers to receive letters. As a rule they do not take it seriously, so do not let it become too serious with you. The women of the European countries correspond with the fighting men and help to keep them cheery and interested.

Litle Sis, Janesville, Wis.—I can't think of anything more you can do to interest a shy young man. You can only hope that if he loves you, he will gradually outgrow his shyness.

Alpha Gamn., Janesville, Wis.—Perhaps if you gratify your desire to know that young man better, some of the glamour that surrounds him may wear off and you will return to your senses. You are a little sentimental over it, aren't you? I won't say it is "Puppy love" as you suggest, but I fear it is something that is likely to lead to disappointment. The best way to find out would be to become acquainted with the man. However I wouldn't make any sacrifice of opportunities in order to test the matter.

Brown Eyes, Bustwick, Nebr.—Because a man works on a train is nothing against him. Of course you should mind your parents and perhaps you are rather young, but unless they have something more awful to charge him with than being a railroad man, I fail to see that you are doing wrong to let him call.

Troubled Girlie, Trivoli, Ill.—I came very near to throwing your letter into the waste basket because you had not given any address and I had to puzzle out the postmark. You may gain confidence as you grow older. Learn to take part in conversation. But don't talk about yourself. You are already a good listener and if you will read the newspapers and magazines and follow what is going on in the world, you will soon find yourself included in the general conversation.

Mildred, Atlanta, Ga.—You are too young by several years to make the decision. Let him wait until you are older and then if he still loves you you may perhaps know whether or not you love him. As for the other man, it is not vulgar to resist and struggle if he tries to embrace you—you have every right to resist it. Better tell your parents.

J. K. K., Cottonwood, S. Dak.—How can you expect me to answer you if you fail to ask your question clearly? "Do I believe in a girl knowing her future husband, if so tell me how?" A girl surely ought to know her future husband before she marries him, but it is beyond my powers to divine what you want to know.

Flossie, Miami, Texas.—I would rather marry into a family that is respected, but if you are certain your fiance is honorable I would not hold his family against him. Especially as he apparently realizes what a handicap they would be to him and intends to move to some other town.

Inquisitive, Bridgeport, Oregon.—It is not I alone who objects to the practise of young girls allowing boys to promiscuously hug and kiss them. It is not good manners and is discountenanced in good society. It is a gross impropriety that often leads to great temptations and is sure to make a girl the subject of scandalous gossip. Don't you know how the boys boast over such triumphs at the cost of the girl's reputation?

There, that's all I shall have room for this month. There are some who write I would like to meet and have a real heart-to-heart talk with. And I am sorry to say there are a few so badly written that I really can't make anything out of them—and still a few more writers who need a real good scolding. But there, my dears, we all have to be foolish sometimes—I mustn't forget we all have to be young once and unfortunately we outgrow it too soon sometimes. So by, by, for another four weeks, and believe me to be always, Yours sincerely, COUSIN MARION.

Best Ways of Doing Things Around The Home

Castor oil applied to warts every night will remove them.

Apple butter applied to a burn will stop the smarting in a short time.

To remove shine from serge skirts, sponge with hot vinegar and rub until shine disappears.

When baking potatoes place a basin of hot water in the oven and the steam will keep the skins soft and smooth.

Polish your lamp chimneys with soft newspapers and see how it makes them shine.

Sweet Sixteen, Tenn.

I have discovered that a slice of lemon dropped into the aluminum pot in which potatoes are being boiled with their jackets on, will keep the pot bright and clean. Now that we are all trying to be economical, many women will be glad to know that they can cook potatoes with their skins on, and still not blacken their aluminum cooking utensils.

An Offer To Women Workers Of The Red Cross

OUR boys—your boys—will soon be at the front "somewhere in France." They will need all the comforts that busy hands at home can provide for them. Among other things there are sweaters and socks, helmets, mufflers and mitts to be knitted. Thousands of mothers, wives and daughters already are industriously plying the needles to good advantage.

You, of course, are doing your bit. Perhaps you would like to do more—and would—if you had the means to do with. Yarn for instance is pretty expensive just now. You may feel unable to buy enough for all the things you want to make.

This being the case why not let COMFORT help you out. We have the yarn—bought at the lowest wholesale price—guaranteed pure, all wool yarn in all the most desirable colors—light and dark grey, khaki, black, blue and white. It comes in large quarter-pound skeins. We will send you free of all cost any desired quantity in any of the above mentioned colors in return for a few subscriptions to COMFORT.

It will be the easiest thing in the world to get the subscriptions, especially when you tell your friends what you are working for. And look at the bargain they are getting in COMFORT for only 25 cents a year—when practically every other magazine in the country has raised its price. They will be glad to subscribe if you will but ask them. We have made our offer just as liberal as we possibly could—so it won't take you long to secure the few subscriptions required. You should start at once, however, because we shall soon be obliged to raise COMFORT'S subscription price, also the cost of yarn is going still higher so the chances are that next month we shall have to ask for larger clubs. Please be sure to give color wanted when ordering.

OUR OFFER. For four one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 25 cents each we will send you one large skein (one-quarter pound) of guaranteed pure wool yarn free by parcel post prepaid (Premium No. 7504). Or for eleven one-year subscriptions at 25 cents each we will send you three skeins (Premium No. 72011), or for fourteen one-year subscriptions we will send you four skeins (Premium No. 72514). When ordering please be sure to mention color or colors wanted.

How to Prepare for the Fur Season

Copyright, 1917, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

THE fur season, fast approaching, promises to be a good one and prices should be high. While the war, of course, will have its effect, it is expected that the commoner pelts will not suffer to any great extent. The wave of economy will exact its toll on such as black and silver fox, but skunk, civet, mink, muskrat, weasel, opossum and similar are almost a necessity and will be in demand.

Millions will be paid in the next few months for raw furs. A large per cent of this money will go directly into the hands of those who take the smaller animals. These trappers for the most part are farmer boys and those who live in the rural communities.

The first thing the pelt hunter should do is to locate his grounds. This ought to be done early; weeks or months before a set is made. By planning the "line," one can locate the various dens and runways and know approximately how many traps to employ.

Pelt hunters do not realize how great their loss by taking the skins before they are of good quality. Some states have laws prohibiting trapping until after the first of October—and some even later. Generally speaking pelts secured before the first of November any place in the United States are not of good quality.

Just before the first cold weather is probably the best time to study the actions of the fur bearers, for at this time they are especially busy storing up food and preparing their winter quarters.

As to the number of traps to set, one must decide largely for himself. No more sets ought to be made than can be attended to properly. For the beginner who has but a limited time at his disposal each day, probably a dozen or two traps will be enough. Of course if after muskrats a greater number of sets can generally be looked after than if the pelt hunter must cover miles in search of mink, skunk and raccoon. The fact that the "line" is near or far from home must also be taken into consideration, along with the character of the ground; whether hard to travel or easy.

The genuine Newhouse is the best trap manufactured. However, there are some cheaper brands on the market which will answer every purpose for smaller animals. Among these are the Victor, a choice of an army of pelt hunters; the High Grip so built that it catches high on the legs and lessens the chances of the fur bearers to pull out, etc., etc. All of these are of the Newhouse style. Then there are the popular Jump, Leap and Kangaroo traps. These actually leap when sprung, insuring a good hold on the animal. While the styles mentioned will be found sufficient, let me add that such as the Stop Thief, Tree Trap and others also merit attention.

In discussing size in traps, the novice had best use that which the makers recommend for the particular animals. Even professional pelt hunters disagree often as to size. For instance, I prefer the No. 0 for muskrats, as it is strong enough to hold the animals if properly set and does not break the leg bones so easily as the larger sizes. Unless the pelt hunter is experienced, I should not advise him to experiment with the small-sized trap when after muskrats, for it may cost him quite a few skins during the season.

Traps ought never to be set when new. Rust them first. Personally I prefer to wire my bunch together and bury for a week or so in slimy mud which will give them a dead, black color. Some rust their traps slightly, then stain with a "paint" made by boiling walnut husks and water. Test all traps before setting. If they spring too hard, bend the trigger slightly or use a file. If they work too easily, bend the trigger rest sufficiently in the proper direction. Search for defective chains. Should a trap not be in good working order, don't run the chance of losing a skin by employing it.

The amateur, no doubt, will want some information on where to locate the dens of the different fur bearers.

The skunk and civet cat—the latter, generally speaking, is confined principally to the territory west of the Mississippi river—is fond of rough, stony ground, especially if covered with weeds and brush. These animals seem to have no fear of man nor nearness of human habitation. It is not unusual to find them under houses, in barns, under hay and straw piles and similar places. Along old hedges seems a favorite place for the animals also.

The mink generally prefers to have its den along a small stream rather than a large, open one. The reason is that the first named offers it better opportunities for remaining concealed, there usually being plenty of driftwood and weeds, along the bank.

The raccoon is never found very far from woods and water. The opossum prefers the deep, dark forest. It is an old saying that "the thicker the trees the more "'possum."

The weasel (known also as the ermine) is found almost any place where there is food or something to be killed which it is large enough to handle. In sod fields, along dried-up creek bottoms, stone piles, etc., it may be trapped.

The muskrat is always near water. These animals are most numerous in swamps, shallow lakes and streams.

Melissa's Home Coming

no real joy or pleasure or happiness if you want to be a good girl. You can go to the movies and to the theaters, and you can go to public dance halls and sit there offering yourself to anybody who wants to dance with you. And even if you do happen to meet seemingly nice people, you've got to be careful that they are all that they seem to be."

Melissa's voice trailed off at the end there. Poor little girl! Her experience was that of thousands of country girls who find but little pleasure in the city if they wish to avoid its pitfalls.

Sylvester listened, and then when he heard that Melissa was free, all the tenderness of his big, kind nature rose within him, and a longing to sweep the staunch little struggler up into his arms and to his bosom there to protect her forever, thrilled him. And again the impulse was too strong to be resisted and he followed it, and his love making him eloquent, he cried:

"Oh, Melissy, Melissy! I love you! I always have. Don't slap me like you did the other time, but let me kiss you and tell me that you love me. I don't want you to be a hired girl somewhere. I want you to be my wife. Will you, Melissy? I'll build you a little home, maybe it won't be much bigger than the four small rooms you spoke about, but it'll be in God's great outside, in among the grass and trees and flowers. Tell me that you've really come home, to stay, to be my Melissy forever and forever."

Melissa did not repulse him. Often in the city when she sat alone in her tiny room, making her supper or breakfast upon a small oil stove, she conjured up the picture of Sylvester's broad bosom and of her mistake in having thrust it from her. So now, when it was offered again, she sighed happily and rested there, and then looking up into his eyes, she smiled, though tears were in her own: "I've come home to stay, Sylvester, and I'd go with you, even if you had offered me a job as a hired girl!"

She said no more for Sylvester stopped her with his lips.

The Girl He Loved

after man of his regiment she had seen, but she knew none of them. She could not go up to strange men and clamor for news of Adrian Gordon. Her heart felt like a stone when it grew too late to expect the man for whom she had come in that white gown that felt as if it burned her. She had slipped away from the crowd, away from Sylvia, like a child who cannot keep a brave front any longer. Where was Adrain? And how was she to bear the rest of this dreadful party?

"How far is 'home'?" Levallion said suddenly.

"I don't know. Five miles and more. I can't walk in these," with a sudden glance at her white suede shoes. "I'd ruin them—and they're not mine. They and everything else were put on me in hopes that a horrid old man might admire me. Thank goodness, I haven't even seen him! And I wouldn't have spoken to him if I had!"

A sudden light arose on Lord Levallion's horizon. This must be Sylvia's stepdaughter.

"Ah!" he commented grimly. "What old man? Levallion?"

Ravenel nodded.

"She did not say so, of course, but I feel sure of it. Why? Do you know him?"

"As well as most people." But he said it without much spirit. It did not somehow amuse him to be considered "a horrid old man." He got up, rather stiffly.

"If you want to go home," he said, "I will drive you. I am no more interested in this party than you. I will get a pony-cart at the stables and meet you at the turn of the avenue. It will fill up my time till dinner."

"There isn't going to be any dinner," crossly. "There's going to be supper, and the duchess has asked me to stay and dance afterward. If I have to stay here till eleven o'clock I sha'n't be able to stand it."

"Then don't stay. You don't"—the "horrid old man" rankled—"look fit to be seen in any case! If your chaperon is going to stay to supper, I will find her when I come back and tell her I took you home."

"Will you?" Her face grew almost happy. She cared nothing at all for appearances, or that she had not been introduced to this stranger, who stood looking at her with cynical kindness.

"Yes! Come along," he returned abruptly. "You needn't thank me. I'm very much bored, and I'm going for my own amusement."

"But how can you tell my stepmother, Lady Annesley? Do you know her?"

"You can write it," producing a neat gold pencil and note-book and tearing out a leaf.

He watched her while she wrote. Truly Sylvia had done well to dress her all in white! Most women tried to please you without consulting your tastes, but Sylvia had not forgotten that he thought white the only wear for a pretty woman.

"There!" The girl handed him a scribbled note nervously. "You will be sure to give it to Lady Annesley?"

"I promise you," with grave politeness. "Now, if you will be at the turn of the avenue in ten minutes I will have the cart there."

Ravenel nodded. If it were twenty miles she would go home. She could not bear another half-hour at this miserable party.

There was not a soul to be seen as she sprang lightly up into the high, two-wheeled cart, never even asking how her strange friend was able to order out the duchess' own pony. She leaned back wearily as they started, and the man beside her was too wise to try to make her talk.

In silence they drove through the quiet country lanes, the setting sun reddening the bronze of the girl's hair and lending a false color to her listless face. When they reached the open door of Annesley Chase, she was down like a flash before he could get out.

"Thank you—oh, a hundred times!" she cried gratefully. "You will give Lady Annesley her note at once, won't you?"

"At once," lifting his hat. But the girl had run into the house.

Now was her time, while Lady Annesley was out. She tore off the smart white gown she had put on so carefully, and threw it on the floor. Then she got out Adrian Gordon's letter and looked at it feverishly. There it was in black and white: "I can go to the duchess', I was afraid I couldn't manage it."

Well, something must have happened! But at least she was at home again; she could look for her ring. And suppose he had not been able to go today, what did it matter? Tomorrow would

Comfort's Home Lawyer

In this department will be carefully considered any legal problem which may be submitted by a subscriber. All opinions given herein will be prepared at our expense by eminent counsel.

Inasmuch as it is one of the principal missions of COMFORT to aid in upbuilding and upholding the sanctity of the home, no advice will be given on matters pertaining to divorce. Any paid-up subscriber to COMFORT is welcome to submit inquiries, which, so far as possible, will be answered in this department. If any reader, other than a subscriber, wishes to take advantage of this privilege, it may be done by sending twenty-five (25) cents, in silver or stamps, for a one-year subscription to COMFORT thus obtaining all the benefits which our subscribers enjoy including a copy of the magazine for one full year.

Full names and addresses must be signed by all persons seeking advice in this column but not for publication. Unless otherwise requested, initials only will be published.

J. H. M., Texas.—We think that in the absence of fraud, the man from whom you purchased the horse is entitled to pay for same, and can enforce such payment from any property you may own, not exempt by law from levy under execution; we think your giving of a check in payment for the horse would be considered as evidence that your minds had met and that the deal was closed, and that when you stopped payment of the check the holder thereof was entitled to recover the amount from you together with such taxable costs as the law allows in case the matter was prosecuted to a judgment through the courts; we think the deal was consummated when your minds met, and was closed then even though the check was not presented for payment until afterward, and, in the absence of fraud, we do not think you had any legal right to stop payment of the check, even though you afterwards changed your mind and offered to return the horse.

J. D. B., North Carolina.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that in the absence of any provision by will an illegitimate child has no rights of inheritance from the father's estate; nor do the children of the mother by a former marriage have any inheritance rights from the stepfather's estate.

Mrs. E. M., Illinois.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that a husband or wife can renounce the benefits provided for them, in the will of the other, within one year from the probate of the will, and elect to take, if there be children, dower of a one third interest for life in the real estate, and one third of the personal property absolutely, or if no child or descendant, one half of both the real and personal property absolutely; that children can be disinherited by will; that the will should be filed and probated after the death of the testator; that any party in interest has a legal right to contest the will if there are proper grounds for contest.

M. H. P., Mississippi.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that except as to some provisions for a husband or wife, a man can dispose of his property, by will, as he may see fit.

Miss K. M., Virginia.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that in the proper bastardy proceedings the father can be compelled to support his bastard children, but that the wife of the father of an illegitimate child cannot be compelled to support such child by another mother.

I. V. F., Ohio.—Under the laws of your state we think that if the piano you mention belongs to the daughter of the woman who died, the stepfather has no legal right to keep it; we think the daughter should bring an action to compel him to turn the piano over to her, but if the piano belonged to the woman who died, we think her husband, in the absence of a will, would be entitled to administer her estate, and after reducing the assets to cash, and after payment of debts and expenses, the balance would go to the persons entitled depending upon who was left, and the manner in which the property was acquired.

Miss B. C., Fish, Pennsylvania.—We think that property, owned by two persons as joint tenants, would, upon the death of one, all go to the survivor and that he could convey good title of the whole property, without the signature of the persons entitled to receive the estate of the person who died. We do not think the person entitled to a remainder interest in real estate has any legal right to remove buildings from the property or cut the timber during the lifetime of the life tenant without his consent.

S. L. R., Nebraska.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that in the absence of a will; lands descend as follows when husband or wife survive: one fourth part to the husband or wife if the survivor is not the parent of all the children of the deceased and there is one or more children, or the issue of one or more children surviving. One third part to the husband or wife if the survivor is the parent of all the children of the deceased and there be two or more children or one child and the issue of one or more deceased children, surviving, one half to the surviving husband or wife if the survivor is the parent of all the children of the deceased and there be only one child.

Mrs. F. M., Williamsport, Ind.—If, as your letter indicates, there is a contest of your father-in-law's will, we think it will be necessary that the will be established before your husband can qualify as executor and administer the estate and pay himself the moneys you mention.

Mrs. D. C. S., Alliance, Ohio.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion, that children may be legally disinherited by will.

W. O. M., Lothair, Mont.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that the signature of the wife is necessary to the conveyance of good title of the real estate belonging to the husband. Of course, if the marriage was dissolved by divorce, such signature might not be necessary.

Mrs. R. F. R., Wray, Ga.—Under the laws of your state, we do not think that your husband had any legal right to turn over his real estate to you if he did so in order to defeat his creditors, and we think that, if his creditors can show that this was done, any such conveyance would be set aside, and they could collect their claims against him from any property he may own not exempt by law from levy under execution.

Mrs. J. C. S., Milan, Ga.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that in a proper case, a woman would be entitled to damages against the person who alienated her husband's affections. We do not, however, think that the courts would award damages against the mother of the husband for making ill-will remarks against the wife, unless it was a very aggravated case. We think it is a very natural condition for the wife and mother-in-law to have differences and as above stated, we do not think that courts will pay much attention to these differences unless they were serious ones.

S. S. S., Viroqua, Wis.—Upon your statements we are of the opinion, first, that if you can prove the statements as you allege them against the young man who purchased the old buggy from you, we think you should proceed against him for procuring this property under false pretences. Second, we think you should post your land against trespassers and if they continue to cut the trees after such posting, we think you should proceed against the parties taking this timber for damages for their acts, or have them arrested for trespassing thereon.

Miss D. E. W., Palo Pinto, Texas.—We do not think there is any law in your state forbidding the marriage of a resident of your state to an alien or resident of another country, nor do we think there is any law requiring residents within your state for any considerable period of time before procuring a marriage license.

Comfort's League of Cousins

our country. War and a few million dollars to boot, gave us the great states of Texas, Arizona, New Mexico and California. War drove black slavery from these shores and gave us Lincoln and a united country. The Crimean War between Russia, France, England and Turkey in the '50's, resulted in the abolition of serfdom in Russia; the war between Russia and Japan, gave Russia the Duma, the first step towards constitutional government; the war between Germany and Russia, made Russia a republic. Whether or not Russia can maintain her freedom depends on more war, and the socialists don't believe in war, at least the red-eyed bug-house extremists don't. War however, has given Russia a wonderful opportunity, and it's her own fault if she does not take advantage of it to the full. It was war too that gave France her chance to get rid of Napoleon and become a republic, and so I could go on indefinitely. It was war, by the way, that welded Briton and Boer together and made South Africa a republic, and it is the lack of fighting ability that makes poor China the easy victim of Japan. War, too, drove Spain from these shores. More about this some other time. Please don't hold any more parades and don't display any American flags as the I. W. W. wobblers, peace-at-any-price lunatics, Kansas-made socialists and anarchists, and the German language newspapers object to our flag, and what these nuts and traitors say, has to go. America and Americans amount to nothing these days and Old Glory is a rag. If you don't believe it ask the Kaiser rooters and I Won't Work's.

Comfort's League of Cousins

The League of Cousins was founded as a means of bringing the scattered members of COMFORT'S immense circle of readers into one big, happy family. Its aim is to promote a feeling of kinship and relationship among all readers. It was primarily started as a society for the juvenile members of COMFORT'S family, only, but those of more mature years clamored for admittance so persistently that it was deemed advisable to impose no age limit; thus all are eligible to admittance into our League provided they conform to its rules and are animated by the child spirit.

Membership is restricted to COMFORT subscribers and costs thirty cents, only five cents more than the regular subscription to COMFORT which is included. The thirty cents makes you a member of the League and gives you an attractive League button with the letters "C. L. O. C.," a handsome certificate of membership with your name engrossed thereon, and the privilege of having your name in the letter list, also a paid-in-advance subscription to COMFORT. You continue a League member as long as you keep up your subscription to COMFORT. There are no annual dues, so after you have once joined all you have to do to keep in good standing is to keep your subscription to COMFORT paid up.

Please observe carefully the following directions which explain exactly

How to become a Member

Send thirty cents to COMFORT'S Subscription Department, Augusta, Maine, with your request to be admitted into COMFORT'S LEAGUE OF COUSINS, and you will at once receive the League button and your membership certificate and number; you will also receive COMFORT for one year if you are a new subscriber; but if you are already a subscriber your subscription will be renewed or extended one full year beyond date of expiration.

Or, if your subscription is already paid in advance, you can take a friend's one-year subscription at 25 cents and send it in with five cents of your own, thirty cents in all, with your request for membership, and we will send you the button and membership certificate, and send COMFORT to your friend for one year. League subscriptions do not count in premium clubs.

NEVER apply for membership without enclosing thirty cents to include a new subscription or a renewal.

The League numbering over forty thousand members, undoubtedly is the greatest society of young people on earth. It costs but thirty cents to join, and that gives you at least a one-year subscription to COMFORT also, without extra cost.

Never in the world's history was so much given for so little. Never could thirty cents be invested to such advantage, and bring such splendid returns. Don't hesitate. Join us at once and induce your friends to do likewise.

All those League members who desire a list of the cousins residing in the several states, can secure the same by sending a stamped addressed envelope and five cents in stamps to Nellie Rutherford, 1299 Park Place, Brooklyn, New York, grand secretary.

Special Notice

Never write a subscription or renewal order or application for membership in the body of a letter. Write your subscription or renewal and membership application on a separate sheet of paper, separate from your letter. We have to put all subscription orders on our subscription file at once; so if it is written on the same sheet as your letter, the whole letter has to go on to the subscription file at once and thus can receive no attention from Uncle Charlie.

Never send subscriptions to Uncle Charlie nor to the Secretary of the League; they bother him and cause confusion and delay.

Address all letters to COMFORT, Augusta, Maine, and they will promptly reach the head of the department for which they are intended.

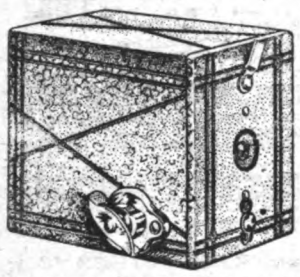
Free To Every Little Girl!

Golden Locks And Her Lovely Twin Babies!

All Three Dollies Given To You Without Cost!

Premium No. 4631.



Mothers, Don't Fail To Read This Offer!

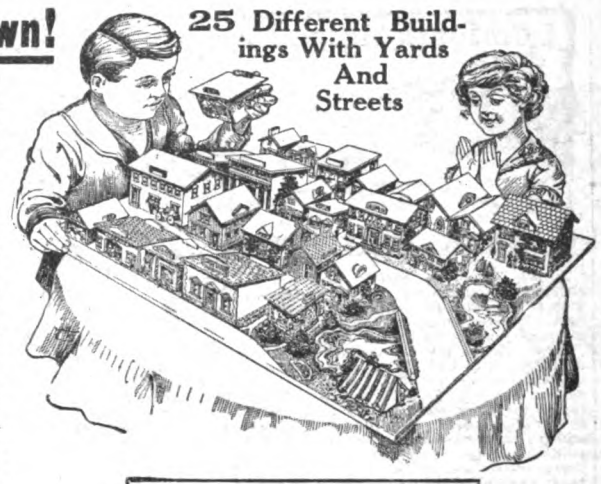
COMFORT wants to give free to your little girl and every little girl this handsome doll Family stamped in beautiful colors on strong cloth with full directions so that you can cut them out, stuff and sew them up in less than ten minutes. "Golden Locks" is almost as big as a real baby, for she stands one and one half feet high and her cute little twin babies which you see in the picture stand over half a foot high. These dolls cannot be broken no matter how much they are thrown around or dropped on the floor and you can make them bend their arms and legs, stand up and sit down in a chair and assume all sorts of natural positions. They have beautiful golden hair which hangs in the dearest curls you ever saw and fastened with a bright red ribbon bow that cannot get lost or become untied, handsome red cheeks, rosy lips and lovely blue eyes which smile at you in such a lifelike way that you would almost think they were ready to speak and say "Mama." As shown in above illustration they are dressed in dainty lace-trimmed underwear with bright red stockings and black buttoned boots. The three dolls together—"Golden Locks" and the two sweet Baby Dolls—make the cutest and prettiest Doll Family any little girl ever had to play with. They are lots better for the little folks than the more expensive bisque and china dolls because they will not break or snarl their pretty hair or lose their eyes. There is no little girl who will not instantly fall in love with this beautiful Doll Family and spend many happy hours with it, so we hope that every mother who reads this offer will take advantage of it at once. We will send you all three dolls free by Parcel Post prepaid on the terms of the following special offers.

Offer 4631 A. For one one-year subscription (not your own) to COMFORT at 25 cents we will send you all three dolls free by parcel post prepaid.

Offer No. 4631 B. For your own subscription or renewal or extension of your present subscription for one year at 25 cents and 10 cents additional (35 cents in all), we will send you all three dolls free by Parcel Post prepaid. Premium No. 4631. Address COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

PREMO CAMERA

Premium No. 7286



For a Club of Six!

We will also include free of charge one Six Exposure Roll Film Cartri ge and a complete Instruction Book. This is the well-known "Premo" camera, made by the Eastman Kodak Co., therefore you can depend upon it to produce the most pleasing and satisfactory results. It takes a picture 1 1-4 by 1 3-4 inches, is fitted with the best quality Meniscus lens and an automatic shutter adapted for snap shots and time exposures. The pictures may be taken either the long way or the short way of the camera. It uses the regulation roll film cartridge containing six exposures, and this may be put in the camera and taken out again in broad daylight, so that you don't have to go into a dark room every time you want to load the camera. Anybody can make good pictures with this camera. Being small and compact it is just the thing to carry with you to "snap" pictures of your friends, sports, etc., with. And remember, we send you not only the camera itself but also include One Six Exposure Roll Film Cartridge and Instruction Book, all packed together in a strong box and sent to you Free by Parcel Post, prepaid, on the terms of the following special

A Whole Toy Town!

25 Different Buildings With Yards And Streets

Premium No. 8522

Boys and Girls—Can You Imagine it? A Complete Village Of Houses, Stores, Shops And All! You Can Build And Re-build It As Often As You Like!

FUN, fun, fun—that's what you'll have when you get this wonderful new toy town, with its streets, yards, houses, stores, shops and men, women and children, just like any real town. Only think! Twenty-five different buildings—and you can build them, take them down and build them again as often as you please. You can call it "your own town" and talk to the people living in the houses, walking and driving in the streets and working in the shops—the blacksmith at his forge in the blacksmith shop, the children going to school, the customers in the stores and hotel and even the little boys and girls playing "Indian" and "soldier" in the dandy big tent on the bank of the beautiful river that flows under the bridge. Remember—twenty-five buildings make quite a big town—bigger than some real towns we know of.

In this wonderful toy town village there are thirteen handsome up-to-date houses, a tent, church, high school savings bank, hotel, clubhouse, barber shop, bakery, blacksmith shop, express office, garage and police station, besides all the streets, yards and flowers, river and bridge. They are made of thick heavy cardboard printed in natural colors so that they look like real houses while the streets, yards and flowers are colored true to life. Full directions tell you how to put all the different buildings together, how to lay out your town and place the houses on the streets. When the houses are all up your town will measure nearly three square feet in size.

We will give you this wonderful toy town complete as described above on the terms of the following special

Club Offer. For two one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 25 cents each we will send you this big toy town village of twenty-five different buildings free by parcel post prepaid. Premium No. 8522.

A Message to Club Raisers From COMFORT'S Publisher

COMFORT

Augusta, Maine

To COMFORT Club Raisers—

I wish I could talk to you all personally about publishing conditions, but I can't, of course, so I am writing you this letter.

I want to urge you to earn your premiums EARLY this season—to start out right NOW and get up your clubs. There are 3 strong reasons for this:

1. I may not for years be able to offer you such GOOD premiums for such few subscriptions as I am right now. I made some fortunate purchases in the Spring and Summer and am going to give you the benefit of them. The next time I buy these premiums I shall have to pay much more for them—and of course must charge more.

2. THE PRICE OF COMFORT MUST SOON GO UP. I promised my readers to keep back this raise just as long as I possibly could, and I have kept this promise. But price conditions are beyond my control. I have held out longer than most any other publisher. I am still holding out—but it is only a matter of a month or two now, before the price of COMFORT MUST be raised to meet the high cost of publishing.

3. Most farm families are extremely prosperous this season and will be glad to spend some of their surplus money for COMFORT. This will make it easier than usual for you to get subscriptions.

While I am yet giving the greatest possible premium value, while the price of COMFORT is still down, and while people are prosperous, is the time to get subscriptions and earn premiums. I know you plan to get some COMFORT premiums this Fall or Winter. I personally urge you to do it now—while COMFORT is still 25c a year.

Will you not look over the handsome premiums I am offering in this issue of COMFORT and start right out today, to earn one or more of them?

Very truly yours,

W. A. Gannett

Publisher of COMFORT

Birthstone Rings

Genuine Gold Filled

APRIL

Guaranteed For 5 Years

AUGUST

JANUARY

Given For A Club Of Two!

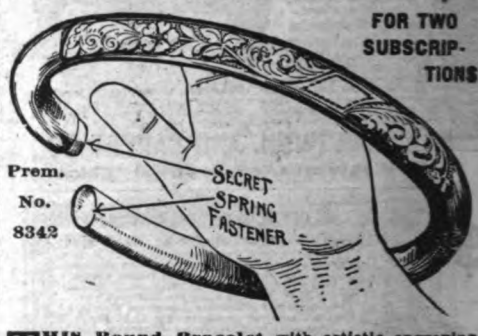
THE most popular lady's rings worn today are these beautiful birthstone rings. Not only is it considered lucky to wear one of them but they are now and always will be exceedingly stylish. We are able to illustrate only three of the rings but there are twelve in all—a different stone for each month of the year and of course you should wear the stone that is symbolical of the month you were born. The following is a list of the twelve rings, names of the stones, the month to which one applies and its symbol.

No. 7632. January, The Garnet, Symbol of Power.
No. 7642. February, The Ameythyst, Symbol of Pure Love.
No. 7652. March, The Bloodstone, Symbol of Courage.
No. 7662. April, The Diamond, Symbol of Purity.
No. 7672. May, The Emerald, Symbol of Immortality.
No. 7682. June, The Agate, Symbol of Health and Long Life.
No. 7692. July, The Ruby, Symbol of Charity.
No. 7702. August, The Sardonyx, Symbol of Happiness.
No. 7712. September, The Sapphire, Symbol of Constancy.
No. 7722. October, The Opal, Symbol of Hope.
No. 7732. November, The Topaz, Symbol of Friendship.
No. 7742. December, The Turquoise, Symbol of Prosperity,

Each ring is guaranteed genuine 12-Karat gold filled which looks exactly like solid gold and will wear for years. In fact we absolutely guarantee each ring for at least five years. The rings themselves are perfectly plain, the stones are solitaires and perfect imitations of the real gems. The setting of each ring is the ever popular "Tiffany" style. As a Christmas, Birthday or all-the-year-round gift for wife, mother, sweetheart or sister nothing could be more appropriate and acceptable than one of these beautiful guaranteed rings set with the birthstone of the person to whom it is given. And not only the women and girls but men and boys as well are now wearing them.

Please do not class these rings with the cheap "electro-plated" rings that turn brassy after they have been worn a month or two. Remember that every one of them is guaranteed to be 12-Karat gold-filled and positively warranted for five years. If you want a handsome birthstone ring for yourself or some dear friend or relative you will make no mistake in taking advantage of this offer at once. When ordering be sure to specify the size and number of ring wanted. You can easily tell just what size ring you wear by following the directions at the right.

RING MEASURE



By using the above diagram you can tell exactly what size ring you wear if you will follow these directions: Put a slip piece of paper around the second joint on your ring finger. Cut the paper off so that when drawn tight around your finger the ends exactly meet. Then lay the paper flat on the diagram, one end at the line O and the other end will indicate correct size. By following these instructions your ring will be a perfect fit.

Club Offer. For two one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 25c. each, we will send you one of these beautiful gold-filled birthstone rings by parcel post prepaid. Please be sure to give size and number of ring wanted. Address

This Great Illustrated Book Shows You War As The Camera Sees It!

Realistic! Thrilling! Inspiring!

Pictures Of The Great War And Our Country's Preparedness! More Than Two Hundred Wonderful Photographic Illustrations Of The Battle-Fields Of Europe And Views Of Our Own Army And Navy Now Taking Part In The Gigantic Struggle!

NOT pictures drawn from the imagination of some artist—but real photographs, finished in natural colors, showing with appalling vividness scenes of actual fighting in the trenches, the monster siege guns, giant Zeppelins, scouting biplanes, dreaded "tanks" or armored motor cars, deadly submarines and submarine chasers, the dead left on the battle-field, the wounded and captured, ruins of bombarded forts and villages—and last but not least Uncle Sam's own brave soldiers and marines who are now training to enter the great conflict in the cause of humanity, justice and freedom.

Almost as if it were happening before your very eyes, this wonderful book of over two hundred war pictures shows you British, Canadian, French, Belgian and German troops and artillery in action, the bombardment and defence of Antwerp, the battle of the Marne, Russian Cossacks on the march, flights of the great German dirigibles and French and British air scouts, anti-aircraft guns bringing down hostile aeroplanes, Red Cross nurses caring for the wounded, homeless Belgian refugees, German prisoners burying their own dead in France, execution of spies, ruins of once beautiful cathedrals, towns, forts and bridges after bombardment, and many other views equally as interesting and exciting and all taken with the camera so that they are absolutely true in every detail. And best of all are the pictures of our own brave army and navy boys training on land and aboard ship, at rifle and gun practise, bayonet charges, trench digging, field artillery and coast defense work, dirigible and biplane scouting together with views of some of Uncle Sam's newest and biggest battte-ships, submarines and submarine destroyers.

We will send you this wonderfully interesting war book of over two hundred pictures with the story of each picture told beneath it in a few well-chosen words, if you will accept either one of the following special offers.

Offer No. 8141A For one one-year subscription (not your own) to COMFORT at 25 cents we will send you this illustrated war book free by mail postpaid. Premium No. 8141.

Address COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

Comfort's Information Bureau

Under this heading all questions by COMFORT subscribers on subjects not related to the special departments elsewhere in the paper will be answered, as far as may be. COMFORT readers are advised to read carefully the advertisements in this paper, as they will often find in them what they seek through their questions addressed to this Bureau. They will thus save time, labor and postage.

NOTICE.—As the privileges of this Bureau and of all other departments of COMFORT are for subscribers only, no attention will be given any inquiry which does not bear the writer's correct name and address. Initials only, or a fictitious name, if requested, will appear in the published answer, but the inquiry must invariably be signed by the writer's true name.

Miss Nellie Ellis, 2611 25th Ave., N. Birmingham, Ala.—The question of keeping potatoes from rotting in storage is largely the matter of having a cool, dry cellar; not having them stored in too large bins; being sure they are dry, cool, and free from rot when placed in storage, and having as few as possible bruised and cut potatoes among the quantity stored. Potatoes may be dried, both in the cooked and uncooked condition, and directions regarding the methods to follow may be secured from bulletins issued by the Dep't of Agriculture, Washington, D. C. Write and say you wish to secure bulletins upon the subject of the home drying and preserving of vegetables. Other COMFORT readers note this, as these bulletins are worth having, and the methods taught should be followed, now that we are endeavoring by all means to conserve the food supply of the world.

M. G., Morgansville, W. Va.—No nurse will be accepted for any Red Cross work unless a course of training has first been taken, and an examination passed. The required courses are being given in most of the large cities.

E. S. C., Raven, Nebr.—You would require no government license to publish the book you write to us about. Any good printing house could do the work for you. The price would depend on the size of the book and the number of copies you wished printed. Should you wish to have the work copyrighted, you would have to make the regular application and pay the small fee, as per the copyright laws. Write to Librarian of Congress, Washington, D. C., for blank applications for copyright and instructions.

E. R. G., Thompsonville, Mich.—We cannot tell you if there is any value to the old bank bill that you have found. Show the bill to your local bank officials, and if they are in doubt, submit a description of it to some of the firms advertising in COMFORT who are experts in this line.

Mrs. C. E. Madden of Meridian, Idaho, wishes to ask COMFORT readers if they can tell her anything about the "Quaker Valley Mfg. Co.," whose address used to be in Chicago, Ill. where they dealt in silverware. Also the name of a firm manufacturing a rug machine that has two pieces of wood and a brass needle. The machine is used by hand in the making of rugs from rags and yarn. Can any of our readers give Mrs. Madden this information? Write to her direct.

C. F. B., Carmi, Ill.—It was difficult for us to judge of the value of your invention from the pencil sketch you enclosed. Write to the Commissioner of Patents, Washington, D. C., or take the matter up with a patent attorney. More money is generally spent than made in pushing inventions.

Curious, Gate, Okla.—Confederate money has no value except as relics. The crystals you submitted are apparently some drug or chemical substance, and appear valueless to us.. Show them to your druggist.

Inquirer, Shamokin, Pa.—Having had a little experience or knowledge of sickness would be a primary disqualification in taking up nursing. However, all Red Cross nurses have to undergo a course of training and pass an examination. Some of these courses are being furnished free in the larger cities. The salary of a visiting nurse varies with the size of the town or city in which the work is done. We know of a village of five thousand inhabitants where the nurse receives nine hundred dollars per year.

Mrs. O. L. M., Roanoke, W. Va.—This department knows of no legitimate value to cancelled stamps, of which you state you have a number.

Tu-Lips, Brooksville, Ky.—We cannot tell you how to read invisible writing. We have plenty of visible writing to read that keeps us busy. You might try moistening the paper and then passing a hot iron over it.

Mrs. J. A. M., Statesville, Tenn.—A course of training is necessary before becoming a Red Cross nurse, also an examination in first aid essentials.

M. G., North Yakima, Wash.—The corn remedy you saw advertised in COMFORT is not for sale by this office, but can be procured from druggists. If the stores in your part of the state have not got it in stock, perhaps they will send for it for you.

F. H., St. Joseph, Mo.—If you wish to purchase bees, or desire any information regarding bee-keeping, write to the A. I. Root Co., Medma, Ohio. This concern also publishes a periodical called "Gleanings in Bee Culture."

A. A. B., Foreman, Ark.—White writing ink is not a rare product, and can be procured at any first-class stationery store. Stafford's White Ink is a well-known article of this nature.

A. W., Baltimore, Md.—Although it is not necessary that a librarian be a college graduate, considerable knowledge and education is required for the work—more, we think, than your letter indicates. Large cities, like Boston, Chicago, and New York have what are known as "Library Schools" for the training of librarians. We believe that more than a grammar school education would be a pre-requisite to entrance to any of these schools.

M. E. L., Hesston, Kans.—We do not believe there is any market for chicken gizzards, unless in these war days, and with the shortage of leather, they could be utilized for the making of army shoes. If they have any medicinal value, the best way to use them is when they are made part of the gravy.

I. A., Kingman, Ind.—We do not understand exactly what you mean by "Government Matron." For any Federal or state position where a Civil Service examination must be taken to obtain appointment, you would be very likely to need more than a common school education to pass successfully.

The Girl He Loved

be her wedding-day, and after that nothing could come between them any more.

Pale, trembling, her heart heavy as lead, in spite of herself, she stole like a thief to her stepmother's room. The Umbrella was down-stairs, and Ravenel hunted quickly in every drawer and box. It never struck her as being odd that they should be all unlocked, exactly as if the more thoroughly they were searched the better for their owner's plans. And the girl, after thirty minutes, knew she looked in vain. Her ring was not in the room. Somehow and somewhere she must have lost it. She remembered that, like a fool, she had tied the ribbon in a bow. It was utterly inexplicable except for that.

"Virtue itself offends when coupled with forbidding manners."—Bishop Middleton.

In order to meet the demand for information made by COMFORT subscribers on the kindred subjects of Etiquette and Personal Appearance, this column will be devoted to them, and all questions will be answered, but no inquirer shall ask more than two questions each month. We would suggest to readers to cut this column out and paste it in a scrap book. Address letters to Etiquette Editor, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

Red Rose, Dunn, N. C.—If you have known this boy for only a few weeks, Red Rose, we do not think you can feel certain whether you are the flower he really wants. Surely we cannot tell you. Because he has not "hugged or kissed" you yet is no bad sign, but rather shows that he is the right sort.

Blue Violet, Granden, Mo.—Girls of fifteen and sixteen are much better off if they stick to their books and do not worry their young heads so about boys. Take notice of the many replies in this column that appear in answer to the letters of unhappy women that have married at too young an age and in disregard of their parents' advice. (2) A girl may invite a young man that has brought her home to enter the house, providing it is not too late.

Brown Eyes, Walpole, Ill.—A girl of nineteen and a young man of twenty-one are rather young to marry, but it is sometimes done. It is generally best to wait a year or two, however, and we would advise you to do this. Because you both have "yellow hair" will be no obstacle to your happiness.

"Yours for better," San Saba, Texas.—You are twenty, and you want to know whether a man of forty-seven is too old for you to marry. Always the matter of age is a matter of the individual, and some men at the age of the one you write about are far from being old, or even what we call middle-aged. The surest test is how much you care for him and if you think you could be happy together. If you are "settled" and industrious, and you are both members of the same church, and he "dearly loves" you, we do not think the matter of the difference in your ages should be a serious obstacle to your marriage or future happiness. But make sure he is the man you love and want to go through life with before the knot is tied. You cannot walk back up the church aisle as simply as you go down it.

Blue Eyes, Tulip, Ga.—It is perfectly proper to wear a ring on the little finger. (2) At nineteen, and with your weight and height, we think you may consider yourself at the witching age of womanhood and dress accordingly. However, the customs of your community and the wishes of your parents should always be considered. By a very sensible fashion, skirts are being worn shorter than they have been for years—and by grandmothers, too.

Beatrice, Auburn, Cal.—It is always best that girls and boys of fourteen and fifteen should have one or more older women with them at dances, or other forms of amusement and recreation. It would be permissible for you to carry on a friendly boy and girl correspondence with this fourteen-year-old boy, but don't forget your books, and that you are going to this training school to study. (2) You are far too young to wear your hair in any but the simplest schoolgirl fashion. The years fly by, and you will be "grown up" quite soon enough.

Cutie and Kewpie, Olate, Kan.—Here are six questions all about boys—which are too many to answer, even for two Kansas girls with such cunning names. If you have spoken to a boy once, and then meet again a short time after, you may certainly speak once more—if you have anything to say—or a smile would suffice, and perhaps he would like that better. (2) No; when you are walking with a boy and he meets another boy that he knows and you do not, you should not speak until he has had a chance to present his friend to you. (3) We do not think a girl should start in calling up a boy over the telephone and "ask him to take her to some place." (4) Most certainly you express your thanks for assistance with your "wraps" and for gifts of candy. But we would not thank him for the gum,—and we would not chew it in public places.

Green Eyes, Texas.—If you are "going with a boy that hugs and kisses you, and you are disgusted with him, as you say, we think you are quite right in feeling as you do, and the next thing to do is to tell him just how disgusted you are.

Play Piano In One Hour For One Cent

Would you give a penny to learn to play the piano or organ in one evening? Impossible? No, not at all. Hundreds of thousands of others who never played before played their first piece in just a few minutes. THEN WHY CAN'T YOU?

John H. Ferguson, Acme, Alta., Canada, says: "I was not a little amazed when I found I could play in a few minutes." C. Pitmann, Memo, Okla., says: "Have two children, one is 12 and the other 10, who in a very few minutes could play it well, and they did not know one note from another in the old music." V. R. Perkins, Romney, Ind., says: "I studied 'Easy Form' music fifteen minutes and then started to play."

Thousands of similar reports are in our files. Doesn't this convince you that you can play by this wonderful new method?

LEARN Piano or Organ the NEW WAY

This wonderful new EASY FORM MUSIC is written without notes. Any child can read it and play it. You do not need to know anything about ordinary note music to be able to play in one hour or less. No teacher. No correspondence lessons by mail. Pay not one cent for five days instruction free. Simply send us a penny postal, stating: "I do not read or play music and am interested in the new EASY FORM WAY to play." Also be sure to tell us the number of white keys on your piano or organ.

If you find you can play AT ONCE and wish to keep the 100 beautiful selections—songs and instrumental pieces—you can pay for them at our Special Reduced Price, only 6½c per copy, in monthly payments so small that you will never miss them. Otherwise, you can return them and owe us absolutely nothing for your instruction for five days. Send a postal today—now—before this remarkable offer is withdrawn. Address Easy Method Music Co., 223 Clarkson Building, Chicago.

Five Wheel Chairs in September

432 is COMFORT'S Total to Date

The five September wheel chairs go to the following shut-ins. The figures after their names indicate the number of subscriptions sent in by them or by their friends in their behalf.

Daniel Lewis Smith, Vanceburg, Ky., 200; Bertha Luella Stewart, Sardis, Ohio, 187; Willie Clinton, Omba, Mo., 134; Mrs. E. V. Stalnaker, Moscow, Kansas, 120; Lorena Campbell, Haskell, Tex., 118.

Daniel L. Smith, age 52, is crippled in his back so that he has almost no use of his legs. Has been a cripple ever since he was thirteen.

Bertha L. Stewart, age 12, is unable to walk as the result of infantile paralysis which attacked her eight years ago. She gets about some by crawling on her hands and knees. The wheel chair will be a great pleasure to her and a help to her mother in taking care of her.

Willie Clinton, age 9, is crippled in his legs by white swelling from which he suffers severely at times. He has six brothers and sisters, two older and four younger than he.

Mrs. Stalnaker, age 74, has been helpless for nearly two years. The wheel chair will be a relief to her and a help to her daughter, with whom she lives, in caring for her.

Lorena Campbell, age 11, has no use of her legs as the result of spinal trouble which developed in infancy. She has never walked.

This is a pitiful list of sufferers who are receiving relief. Many more on our list are equally in need of wheel chairs. Please help to make them happy with a COMFORT wheel chair.

The accompanying picture of Mollie McNeil shows her enjoying her COMFORT wheel chair. Her letter of thanks is printed below.

MOLLIE MCNEIL.

Give our Wheel-Chair Club a boost. It is doing lots of good.

Sincerely yours,

W. H. GANNETT, Publisher of COMFORT.

P. S. For the information of our many new subscribers let me explain that for each and every 200 one-year subscriptions to COMFORT, at 25 cents each, sent in either singly or in clubs by persons who direct that they are to be credited to COMFORT'S WHEEL-CHAIR CLUB instead of claiming the premiums to which they would be entitled, I give a FIRST-CLASS INVALID WHEEL CHAIR to some needy crippled Shut-in and pay the freight, too. It is a large and expensive premium for me to give for that number of subscribers, but I am always glad to do my part a little faster each month than you do yours.

Any shut-in who has friends to help him get subscriptions can obtain a wheel chair free. Write me for information.

Thinks "COMFORT Wheel Chair" Just the Right Name

DUKE, N. C.

DEAR MR. GANNETT:

My wheel chair came in good condition and I am much pleased with it. I think it real nice. I want to thank you and all my friends who helped me get it. With their help I got the 200 subscriptions in just a short time. I think "COMFORT Wheel Chair" is just the right name for it. I enjoy it very much as I can now go to church and Sunday school and get out in the air. Enclosed you will find my picture. May you live long and send out many chairs to shut-ins to help brighten their lives, and when you have finished your good work here, may you receive the welcome well done. With many thanks, your friend,

MOLLIE MCNEIL.

The Family Doctor

So many inquiries are received from COMFORT subscribers concerning the health of the family that this column will be devoted to answering them. The remedies and advice here given are intended only for simple cases; serious cases should be addressed to physicians, not to us.

Address The Family Doctor, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

NOTICE.—As the privileges of this and all other departments of COMFORT are for subscribers only, no attention will be given any inquiry which does not bear the writer's correct name and address. Initials only, or a fictitious name, if requested, will appear in the published answer, but the inquiry must invariably be signed by the writer's true name.

I. S., Hunter, Texas.—Daily nose-bleeding is almost always due to a weak condition of the vascular system of the nose. You should consult your local doctor and have him cauterize the offending blood-vessel and no doubt you will be cured for all time. Of course the doctor will look into your general physical condition, especially as to the coagulability of your blood.

L. E. D., New Braunfels, Texas.—There is no drug that causes blood poison in individuals or animals, hence there is no antidote. All medical schools have dissecting rooms. You could communicate with them for advice on the subject.

L. A., Pillzer, S. C.—Your main trouble is, as you think, nervousness and too much introspection. You have undoubtedly a nervous indigestion and the consequent formation of gas in the intestines. Your first concern should be to forget yourself, and if this cannot be accomplished in any other way, try a change of scene and surroundings. In the meantime, exercise in the open, eat suitable food, take some mineral oil with your meals, and before retiring add a cold spinal douche to the spine. This can be done by either using the ordinary bath sprayer or filling a sponge with cold water, and by squeezing the water out of the sponge in such a way that it will strike the back of the neck and flow down the spine. You should stand in hot water up to your ankles, while using the spinal douche to avoid shock.

A. M., Ironton, Ohio.—Convulsions coming on at or near the monthly period only, are probably due to some local obstruction to the natural menstruation. You should consult some good surgeon in your state, and if such a condition obtains, have an operation that will relieve any mechanical obstruction that may be present.

B. E. D., Clio, Ark.—Bronchial asthma can be cured by change of climate. As a rule a high, dry climate is to be preferred, and will do most good in the majority of cases. There are, however, idiosyncrasies. Some people will be cured by a change to the seashore, and any change to the mountains will be followed by an attack. The best and only way is for the individual to try out several locations and find the one most suitable to the given case.

E. P., Boon's Path, Va.—Warts may be removed by careful application of nitrate of silver, but are best removed by the electric cautery. Corns can be easily removed in about forty-eight hours by the application of a few drops of a good corn remover preparation. There are several excellent preparations of this kind on the market (see advertisements). This should be applied two or three nights consecutively, and then the corn will be soft enough to be easily removed.

G. H., Carterville, Mo.—You undoubtedly have some trouble with the mastoid portion of the temporal bone. Any discharge from the ear is dangerous and should have immediate attention. Consult some ear specialist. Do not on any account introduce a pin or anything of that kind in the wound. There is no danger of cancer, but there is danger of brain infection.

S. B., Isabella, Mo.—The itching may be due to your age, as you suggest, and probably so. A weak carbolic acid ointment, with attention to your physical condition, would help you. Drink plenty of water and avoid stimulants of any kind. Drink plenty of water always. You should avoid spices and pastry of all kinds. Eat green vegetables and use a mineral oil such as American Oil. Take a tablespoonful with your meals. The carbolic salve can only be obtained through a physician's prescription.

M. K., Bier, Mass.—Excessive accumulation of flesh is very frequently inherited, or at least the tendency to this condition is often hereditary. If your heart is strong enough to stand the strain, a daily or thrice weekly bath of very hot water, in which has been dissolved a pound of Epsom salts is very beneficial, and will often result in a marked loss of weight. This bath, however, should not be taken without the advice of a physician, and only after a thorough physical examination. Besides the bath, a diet of green vegetables, fruits of almost all kinds combined with a meat and egg diet would help you. Take also as much exercise as you can, drink plenty of water to keep your kidneys active and give up the use of sweets, pastry, as well as all starchy foods. Your period irregularity is undoubtedly due to your excessive accumulation of fat and poor circulation.

M. C. B., Lake City, S. C.—Acna Rosacea—which is probably the name of the condition to which you refer—is almost always due to some gastro-intestinal disorder. It may also be due to exposure to cold or heat, uterine disease, general debility, nasal disease and the excessive use of tea, coffee and alcohol. It naturally follows that the cause must be sought out, and the proper remedy be found, if possible. This trouble is chronic and very hard to help or cure. Electricity has been tried with much benefit in selected cases. But in every case the first thing is to determine the cause. If diatetic, the thing to do is to find the best diet in a given case, and follow this diet. In some cases the thyroid extract, in one grain doses, has been beneficial. Local applications of a sulphur lotion, known as lotio alba is in many cases beneficial. These are simply suggestions and may be tried, under the advice and care of some good physician only.

C. B. L., Winston-Salem, N. C.—Pain under the right shoulder blade, is almost always due to some liver trouble. You should ask your family physician for some good liver stimulant, or alterative such as calomel or phosphate of soda. The latter can be taken in teaspoonful doses three times a day, after meals, for some weeks with benefit.

Mrs. E. R., Neligh, Nebr.—Birthmarks can be removed, very thoroughly and without scar, by the use of carbon dioxide snow, so-called. This must be done by one who has had the necessary experience as well as the necessary apparatus for making and applying the same. The sooner the birthmark is removed, the better will be the result as to scar and space to be covered. Birthmarks grow and spread over large surfaces quite rapidly—hence the advice to have your child treated at once.

Mrs. M. C. C., New Market, Va.—Your nervousness, in fact all of your nervous symptoms, may arise from eye-strain. You should, at once, consult a competent oculist. By oculist we mean a doctor, who makes a specialty of diseases of the eye as well as the fitting of glasses. This would of course exclude the ordinary optician. In this way you may be cured. For if the condition is not due to eye-strain, the doctor through a careful examination of the eye can and no doubt will get at the true condition and advise you what to do further.

N. J. A., Big Sandy, Texas.—The question of climate for lung trouble can only be settled by an actual personal experience. One case may be cured by the climate of California and another made worse. In fact the climate of California does not cure in many cases. In general a high, dry climate is the one to be selected. In all cases the question, also, of proper food must be taken into consideration. People with lung trouble in any stage must be well nourished, and a climate selected without regard to state, but the one that will do the most good in the given case. This should be decided by the local doctor.

The Masked Bridal

my own, again, after so many years! that you were once the tiny baby that I held in my arms in Rome, and loved better than any other earthly object? It is wonderful! wonderful! and strangest of all is the fact that your heart turns so fondly to me! Are you sure, dear, that you can unreservedly accept and love your mother, in spite of those letters, and what they revealed regarding my past life?"

"I am sure that you never committed a willful wrong in your life," Edith gravely replied. "It was a sad mistake to go away from your home and parents, as you did; but there is no intent to sin to be laid to your charge—your soul shines, like a beacon light, through these dear eyes, and I am sure it is as pure and lovely as your face is beautiful."

"May He who always judges with divine mercy bless you for your sweet charity and faith," murmured Isabel Stewart, in tremulous tones, as she passionately kissed the lips which had just voiced such a blessed assurance of trust and love.

"Now come," she went on, a moment later, while, with her own hands, she tenderly removed Edith's hat and wrap, "we will make ourselves comfortable, then I will tell you all the sad story of my misguided youth."

Twining her arms about the girl's waist, she led her to a seat, and sitting beside her, she circumstantially related all that we already know of her history.

But not once did she mention the name of the man who had so deeply wronged her; for she had resolved, if it were possible, to keep from Edith the fact that Gerald Goddard, under whose roof she had lived, was her father.

The young girl, however, was not satisfied, was not content to be thus kept in the dark; and, when her mother's story was ended, she inquired, with gray face and clouded eyes:

"Who was this man?—why have you so persistently refrained from identifying him? What was the name of that coward to whom—with shame I say it—I am indebted for my being?"

"My love, cannot you restrain your curiosity upon that point? Will you not let the dead past bury its dead, without erecting a tablet to its memory?" her companion pleaded, gently. "It can do you no possible good—it might cause you infinite pain to know."

"Is the man living?" Edith sternly demanded.

"Yes."

"Then I must know—you must tell me, so that I may shun him as I would shun a deadly serpent."

"My love, I wish you would not press this point."

Edith turned and gazed searchingly into her eyes.

"Do you still cherish an atom of affection for him?" she inquired.

"No! a thousand times no!" was the emphatic response.

"Then you can have no personal motive or sensitiveness concerning the matter."

"No, my child—my desire is simply to save you pain—to spare you a shock, perchance."

"Do I know him already?—have I ever seen him?"

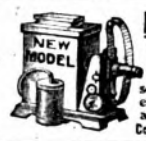
"Yes, dear."

"Then tell me! tell me!" panted the girl. "Oh! if I have spoken with him, it is a wonder that my tongue was not paralyzed in the act—that my very soul did not shrink and recoil with aversion from him!"

"Edith," she said, with gentle gravity, "the man is—Gerald Goddard!"

"He! that man my father!"

"It is true," was the sad response. "I would have saved you the pain of knowing this if I could."



"Oh! and I have lived day after day in his presence; I have talked and jested with him!"

"My child, pray calm yourself," pleaded her mother, regarding her with astonishment, for she never could have believed, but for this manifestation, that the usually gentle girl could have displayed so much spirit under any circumstances. "Come," she added, "sit down."

RECIPE FOR GRAY HAIR.

To half pint of water add 1 oz. Bay Rum, a small box of Barbo Compound, and ¼ oz. of glycerine. Any druggist can put this up or you can mix it at home at very little cost. Full directions for making and use come in each box of Barbo Compound. It will gradually darken streaked, faded gray hair, and make it soft and glossy. It will not color the scalp, is not sticky or greasy, and does not rub off.—Adv.

If You Are A Woman Who Loves Crochet And Tatting Here Is A Set Of Books You Will Be Delighted To Own!

ANY ONE of these books alone is a veritable treasure house of the newest, most beautiful designs. The seven books combined form a complete library in which you will find any pattern in crocheting and tatting you could possibly ask for. You will fairly revel in the many handsome designs shown. There are edgings, beadings, insertions and laces for every conceivable use. The illustrations are actual photographs of the finished work and show every thread so plainly that they are almost as good to work from as the directions themselves. The directions are adapted for either beginner or expert. They tell stitch by stitch how each pattern is worked, also the quantity and size of material required and the correct sizes of hooks to be used. Following is a description of each book. They are 8 by 10 1-2 inches in size with the exception of Volume I which is 9 1-4 by 12 inches. Please order by numbers.

Volume 1 Crocheted yokes for combinations, envelopes, nightgowns, corset covers, etc.—fifteen all different, exquisite designs.

Volume 2 Handsome crocheted edgings and insertions suitable for handkerchiefs, underwear, dresses and a multitude of other uses,—thirty-three different designs.

Volume 3 Eighteen lovely designs in Cluny insertions and laces for centerpieces, library scarfs, boudoir caps, corset cover yokes, piano scarfs, curtains, chemises, envelopes or combination suits.

Volume 4 Twenty-five handsome designs in artistic crochet for yokes, boudoir caps, candle shades, baby bonnets, bedspreads, dollies, library scarfs, pillows, centerpieces, portiere, medallions, curtains, etc., etc.

Volume 5 Twenty-five designs in novelty crochet, including mile-a-minute and clover leaf crocheted yokes, primrose and sunflower yokes; doilies, centerpieces, boudoir caps, unique edges and insertions for serving trays; novelty aprons and collars.

Volume 6 Thirty-two designs in tatting, Maltese and Irish crochet,—a varied and beautiful assortment of tatted handkerchief edges, edgings and insertions, tatted yokes, boudoir caps, towel edges, medallions; yokes, breakfast caps, centerpieces, edgings and lace in Maltese crochet and yokes in Irish crochet.

Volume 7 Thirty handsome novelty crocheted designs including rose, sunflower periwinkle, and Venetian yokes; boudoir caps, monkey face library scarf, and lace pillow; large and small baskets, hat pin holder, jewel box, vanity tray, coin purse, utility bag, star fish doily, pineapple centerpiece; edgings and insertions in pillow lace; daisy edging; spider, bell, rick-rack, novelty and coronation braid laces.

WE advise you to order all seven of these splendid books before the assortment is broken. If however you do not care for the whole library at this time we have arranged the following special offers which give you the opportunity to secure any two or any four of the books. When ordering please be very careful to state the number of each book desired.

Offer 8011A: For one 1-year subscription (not your own) to COMFORT at 25 cents we will send you any two books free by parcel post prepaid. Be sure to mention numbers of books wanted.

Offer 8011B: For your own subscription, or renewal or extension of present subscription for one year at 25 cents and 10 cents additional (35 cents in all), we will send you any two books free by parcel post prepaid. Be sure to mention numbers of books wanted.

Offer 8012: For two 1-year subscriptions at 25 cents each we will send you any four books free by parcel post prepaid. Be sure to mention numbers of books wanted.

Offer 8013: For three 1-year subscriptions at 25 cents each we will send you the complete library just as described above—seven different volumes in all, handsomely bound, printed on high-grade paper and containing nearly 200 beautiful photographic illustrations of all that is new and pretty in crochet and tatting designs with complete directions for working. When ordering please be sure to mention number of each book wanted.

Accidents Which Made Fortunes

How to make starch from corn was discovered accidentally by Thomas Kingsford, a mechanic. One day he threw a mess of corn meal mush in the garbage pail. His wife emptied some lye into the same pail and in the morning when he emptied the pail he was astonished to find a small quantity of starch at the bottom.

Thomas Bolsover, a Sheffield mechanic, was mending the handle of a knife made of copper and silver. He saw these metals fuse together and the idea of silver plating was born in his mind. He laid a thin plate of silver on a heavier one of copper and heated them till the edge of the silver began to melt. He took them from the fire, let them cool slightly, then rolled and hammered them to the desired thickness. This was the origin of "Sheffield plate," all of which was made in this way until electroplating was invented.

Cornelius Dubbel left a bottle of aqua regia (a mixture of nitric and muriatic acids) on a shelf. It fell over; the acid ran down over a window and dropped into a bottle containing an extract of cochineal. This turned to a vivid scarlet. Dubbel found that the acid had dissolved some of the tin of the window casing and the combination had produced the new color. A few experiments added the most brilliant color to the list of dyes.

Once a very youthful chicken fancier had in his possession a couple of bantam hens that laid very small eggs. He finally hit upon a plan to remedy this.

When the lad's father went the next morning to the chicken house he was surprised to find an ostrich egg tied to one of the beams and above it a card with this notice:

Didn't Know the Telephone

A large firm in Aberdeen, Scotland, engaged as office boy a very "green" youth. It was part of his duties to attend to the telephone in his master's absence. When first called upon to answer the bell, in reply to the usual English query, "Are you there?" he nodded assent. Again the question came, and still again, and each time the boy gave an answering nod. When the question came for the fourth time, however, the boy, losing his temper, roared through the telephone:

"Man, a' ye blind? I've been noddin' me head off for the last half hour!"

Color, Anyhow

The grocer had just put a new boy to work and among the other instructions was this:

"If you do not happen to have what a customor asks for suggest something else as nearly like it as possible."

Soon a woman came into the store and asked the boy: "Have you any fresh green stuff today?"

"No, ma'am," answered the boy, "but we have some nice bluing."

BULBS FOR WINTER

BLOOMING TO CHEER AND BRIGHTEN THE HOME

By Alfred Weston

Copyright, 1917, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

NOT even the best of house plants can quite give that cheerful "Spring-will-come" atmosphere to the home in winter that blooming bulb plants will do. They seem to be the connecting link between the last of the frost flowers and chrysanthemums out of doors, and the first crocuses that peep through the late spring snows on your lawn.

Many believe that bulbs are difficult to make bloom indoors. There is no good reason for this belief. The secret of making bulbs bloom in your home throughout the winter months is a simple one—that of knowing how long it takes from the planted bulb to the blossom, and of reckoning accordingly.

There are about seventy fairly well-known bulbs and forty of these will bloom in the house as readily as out of doors if started properly. Not that any woman could care for such a variety, but it offers her an excellent choice. The favorites are the hyacinth, tulip, jonquil, narcissus, Easter and Chinese lily and tuberose. To offer the reader a goodly variety I shall describe these and seven others.

The accompanying table for indoor planting of bulbs is as nearly a perfect guide as it is possible to compile for general use, but no table of this sort can be absolutely accurate. For example, a good tulip bulb may mature and blossom in three weeks in one home and not for five weeks in another, although the same variety of bulb is used. The reason of this is that the temperature in one place may be better suited than in another, more adaptable soil may have been used in the pots, better drainage given, more care taken to start the bulb in the dark and to bring it to the light after it has come up, by mild stages of semi-light before bringing out into the full daylight.

Fortunately there are general rules that cover the handling of nearly all bulbs. Soil and method of treatment are the first two principles to consider. Do not use manure. Many excellent and costly bulbs have been destroyed by this treatment. Better no fertilizer at all than planting with manure unless you are so skilled in its use with bulbs as to make no mistake. A very little, say as much as you could get in a small envelope, of thoroughly rotted manure mixed with the soil before putting in the pot, can be trusted to do no harm providing that it has been fire-dried and pulverized.

But leaf mold, such as you can scrape up in the woods anywhere, is far better as it will give the bulb the proper nourishment and in no way endanger rotting the bulb, such as ordinary manure is likely to do.

Plan for your bulbs now. Dig a goodly quantity of soil from your garden. Take it from an average spot. By that I mean that the soil should not be taken from a damp, moldy corner of the garden, nor from a dry sandy spot in it, but from a good average place. It involves a little labor to screen this soil and make sure that no slugs, cut and wireworms and other insects are in it, but it will insure you against loss of your bulbs when you plant them in the fall and winter months. One little nibble of the bulb by a worm and even if the bulb doesn't die, it will not produce a good bloom.

Put this prepared soil away in a shed or cellar, in readiness for your joyous winter bulb blossoms. Secure a goodly quantity of rich leaf mold from the woods and set that aside. Try this soil by mixing a little of the mold and the soil in your hands, before it dries up. If it is at all clayey or sticky, if it does not crumble apart easily, "shorten" it with sand. Put aside a bucket of clean white sand and then you will be quite well prepared.

When you fill the pots for the bulbs make the soil mixture as described—so that it will break apart in the hands and not be "doughy." If your garden soil is too dry a little more of the leaf mold will hold it together, while the sand will counteract too much stickiness. Sticky soil will sour, and sour soil will destroy the bulb.

Some go about filling the pots in a most methodical manner, first the little stones at the bottom for drainage, then some moss to keep the water from running out too quickly, then sand to keep the roots from rotting and then the soil. For my own part I think this is unnecessary. I have had excellent success with bulbs of almost every variety that will grow indoors and my method has been to omit the moss and clear sand and to use the soil mixed as I have described above, leaf mold, garden soil and sand if it is too sticky.

Bits of broken flower pots or pebbles in the bottom of the pot are necessary for proper drainage. Then the soil. I always save broken flower pots. You will notice that the pieces are curved. They form little arches or bridges. I put a good-sized piece over the hole in the bottom of the pot. This arches over it like a tiny Japanese bridge in a miniature garden and does not stop up the hole, but it allows drainage and prevents clogging and sour soil. A bit of charcoal along with the drainage bits in the bottom insures against sour soil.

Always use shallow pots.

If you will study the depths for planting given in the table and compare them with the bulbs, you will find that most of them match the size of the bulb. Some bulbs, like the yellow narcissus, keep over with a long white shoot on them. Others have practically no shoot at all. Those with shoots should be planted deep enough for only the tip of the shoot to stick out.

Do not claw into the pot to make a hole, and jab the bulb in. With a tiny trowel or an old case knife, make the hole and set the bulb in evenly, on a firm base and absolutely upright. If you plant the bulb at a slant the plant will have crooked stems, the flowers will slant and the natural beauty will be lost.

You have probably seen, in the spring, crocuses, tulips and similar bulb plants, in bloom with half the bulb protruding from the ground, and for this reason you have planted your bulbs with half of them out of the ground. Never do this. Those garden bulbs were well planted and they did not work themselves out until they had powerful roots to hold them in place. Snows and rains worked them out. If just the tip of the top of the bulb shows, about as large as the tip of your little finger, all will be well.

In potting large hyacinth bulbs, use a six-inch pot and put only three in a pot. Too many will stunt them and the blossoms will not be as large and handsome. The way I do is to arrange the drainage material in the bottom of the pots, then mix my soil and fill the pot half full. When ready to plant I set the bulb on this and fill around, loosening a place in the soil with a fork where the root base of the bulb will set. Never fill the pot to the top with soil, leave an inch rim above to hold water so that it will not run off on your table or window-sill and make more work for you.

When you fill the pot with soil, thump the sides gently a dozen times to settle the earth firmly in place but never press or push the soil down solid. Give a copious sprinkling of water when you plant the bulbs and then set them in a dark but well ventilated closet, on the floor, not on a shelf as the air is too hot up high. If you have a good cool cellar absolutely frost proof, place your pots of bulbs down there and keep them in the dark. When ready to force, bring them up into a semi-light, that is, not directly to a window, but in a far dim corner of the room. After a few days they will be ready for the window and the sunlight.

I have some city friends who live in apartments with neither cellars, nor closet room to spare, yet they had good success by tying over the top of the pot loosely, a piece of blue tissue paper, puncturing it to give air. This furnished the semi-light and helped the bulbs to thrive. But better the cellar or dark closet if you have it.

When ready to force them to bloom, bring them into the light. Be sure that your plants do not start in a warm room. A cool temperature is necessary for starting them. Consider how they start out of doors in the cold earth, almost before the snow is off the ground. When well grown, and good sturdy shoots are up, you may force them in the sun in a medium warm room.

Here is a good way to figure on making your bulbs bloom when you wish them. Suppose you have hyacinths, crocuses, jonquils, and Easter lilies and you want all four of them to be in bloom on Christmas Day. After they have been in the dark cellar five to eight weeks, bring them up as follows: Bring your hyacinths out into the sun and warm room on November 25th, bring your Easter lilies out on September first, your crocuses out on December seventh and your jonquils out on December first.

If you have planted properly, you can force them in the time given so that you will have all four in full bloom on Christmas Day.

The best bulbs are on the market from late in August right up to January and frequently well into February. You can get them easily enough, no matter how distant the dealer may be. His catalog will be accurate and they are sent by mail, parcel post, at a very small cost. They are well packed and seldom are injured in transit. Get your bulbs early. It won't hurt them to be in pots in a dark, cool cellar from five to eight weeks. They will sprout fairly early, but will then grow very slowly until brought out and forced as described.

If you have taken up bulbs from your spring garden out of doors, do not attempt to grow them in the house unless they have been thoroughly dried out and rested from ten to twelve weeks. Bulbs are so cheap these days that it doesn't pay to guess at what you'll get from your garden supply. If you are not sure and if they are not smooth, firm bulbs, take no chances. A dollar's worth of bulbs will keep blossoms in your home from Christmas into March when the crocuses begin to peek out to greet the first robins and bluebirds.

Here are a few things to remember about the fourteen bulbs listed in the following table:

Glory-of-the-snow. Never allow bulbs to freeze. Do not attempt to plant them indoors before November.

Spring crocuses. Plant six or ten in a six-inch pan, and force them in a temperature not over sixty degrees above. The "Cloth of Gold" is the best indoor variety of these, although a mixture will do quite well and afford a more "spring-like" appearance.

Amaryllis. This needs cold storage in winter, down between forty and forty-five above. They do best if no attempt is made to force them until well into January.

Dutch hyacinth. This needs a richer soil than most bulbs. It is not best to force until just before Christmas. The later forcing gives better results.

Roman hyacinth. An earlier flower. It needs the same soil and treatment as the Dutch, but can be forced a little earlier.

Easter lily. Pot these bulbs as soon as you receive them. It is difficult to get blossoms early. Try one for Christmas but keep the rest down cellar in pots until late in January before forcing.

Yellow narcissus. Not very hardy. Needs well-drained soil.

Paper white narcissus. The most successful variety. Quite hardy, can be forced to bloom before Christmas. Will grow in pebbles and water as readily as in soil, but will not keep in bloom as long.

Jonquils. Keep the soil well drained but always moist. Frequently have five or six blossoms to a stalk.

Tulips. Get the early variety of bulbs for indoor blooming. Too much heat will stunt their growth. Keep in a frost-proof room, but well away from stove, radiator or source of heat.

Tuberose. Pot from garden well before frost. It is preferable to give them six to eight weeks' rest. Pot in cellar, do not allow to get too dry. One of the few bulb plants likely to be bothered with lice (aphis). Tobacco water will remedy this.

Chinese lilies. Seldom satisfactory grown in soil as it needs muck and constant drainage which cannot be accomplished in the home. Better plant them in pebbles in shallow dish, keeping water only to top of pebbles. Start in dark closet.

English iris. This needs damp soil, so well drained that it will not sour and soil must be rich and well mulched.

Lily-of-the-valley. For indoor use, plant the pips, never the clumps. Store in sand in cellar after taking up from garden. Plant as soon as late summer pips are received. If forcing is started in September, blossoms should appear in February.

Hyacinths grown in hyacinth glasses are a delight. Do not make the common mistake of attempting to grow them in a plain, transparent glass. The daylight hurts the roots. Green, blue, amber or red glass is best. If you have not got it, cover glass with tissue paper. Keep enough water in the glass to touch the bottom of the bulb and no more.

Jonquils, paper white narcissus and crocuses can all be grown in pebbles and water. Hyacinths do better in glasses. Regulation hyacinth glasses can be secured for twenty-five cents each.
